GORELL BARNES, J.—I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are right in their contention. I think the action is properly founded against both defendants if there is a bonâ fide charge of negligence against both sets of defendants, which is the case presented on the part of the plaintiffs, and therefore I do not think that it can be said that the other defendants, viz., the French owners, are either improper or unreasonable or unnecessary parties. Of course they are not strictly necessary parties, the words in the rule being "necessary or proper," but they are proper parties to the suit brought in this court against both, and I think, after listening to the cases cited by counsel for the owners of the French ship, that the reasoning of those cases is that the attempt was there made to bring into play the sub-section of the rule when there was no real cause of action against the persons who were within the jurisdiction, and it was sought to bring the rule into operation, if it could by possibility be done, in order to enforce a remedy against the persons who were not within the jurisdiction. In Massey v. Heynes, 36 W. R. 834, 21 Q. B. D. 330, at p. 338, Lord Esher says: "The question whether a person out of the jurisdiction is a proper party to an action against a person who has been served within the jurisdiction must depend on this—supposing both parties had been within the jurisdiction would they both have been proper parties to the action? If they would, and only one of them is in the country, then the rule says that the other may be served just as if he had been within the jurisdiction. This is the legislation on the subject, and we are bound by it." Now there is one other consideration, apart from what may happen in the future if the plaintiffs succeed against the French shipowners in enforcing their rights. There can be no doubt that if this is a bonâ fide allegation of negligence against both sets of defendants it is quite the proper and right thing that the whole matter should be fought out once for all with everybody present who was concerned with the accident. Therefore, unless this is a mere attempt to bring in the outside person not subject to the jurisdiction without a shadow of right against the person who is within the jurisdiction, I think that it is quite a proper case for the process to be allowed to go against both. There may be the ultimate difficulty in enforcing the judgment if recovered, and at the present moment there is the difficulty on the part of the present appellants in setting aside this writ and enforcing what I understand is a judgment recovered by them in default of appearance in France against the present plaintiffs. It appears from the affidavits that some proceedings in France were instituted by the French company against the present plaintiffs, and an attempt is now being made to enforce that judgment in Belgium. I have not thought it necessary to adjourn this case in order to inquire what the rights of the parties are in Belgium, or to see what would be the result of the French suit; but it is a strong thing to say that the rights of the parties are to be precluded by default proceedings, and my decision, in the exercise of the discretion vested in me, is that the application on the part of the defendants, the French company, must be refused. The costs will be costs in the cause.

Solicitors for the defendants, W. A. Crump & Son.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Thomas Cooper & Co.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). Nov. 13.

NOTTINGHAM PERMANENT BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETY v. THURSTON. (a.)

Infant—Building society—Infant member—Advances—Mortgage—Infants' Relief Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 62), s. 1—Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), ss. 13, 38.

The Building Societies Act, 1874, enables an infant to become a member of a building society, where the rules do not prohibit it, but it does not authorize him to borrow money by means of advances on mortgage of his property, for it is not a necessary part of a member's position to do so.

An infant member of a building society purchased a piece of land by means of a loan from the society, paid to the vendor, and gave the society a mortgage to secure the loan and further advances, which were expended in building operations on the land.

Held, that the mortgage was void under the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, but that the society were entitled to a charge on the land for the purchase-money paid to the vendor, together with interest at 4 per cent. on that amount.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 50 W. R. 179, [1902] 1 Ch. 1, affirmed.

Appeal from an order of Court of Appeal, 50 W. R. 179, [1902] 1 Ch. 1.

The respondent, Mrs. Thurston, who attained twenty-one years only in March, 1900, was in June, 1898, admitted a member of the appellant society, which did not exclude minors.

Being desirous of purchasing certain land and erecting houses thereon, she applied for an advance of £1,200 on the security of the land. The advance was made to her, the land paid for and conveyed to her, and by mortgage the respondent conveyed to the society in fee the land and houses erected, or in course of erection, subject to a proviso of redemption.

The £1,200 was to be repaid by monthly subscriptions of £10 4s.

In October, 1898, the society discovered that Mrs. Thurston was still under age, and entered into possession of the property.

The respondent had performed her obligations under the rules or the mortgage.

The respondent brought an action and claimed that the mortgage was void and not binding upon her, and that she was entitled to have it delivered to her and cancelled.

She did not dispute the claim of the appellants that they were entitled to a lien for the purchase-money and expenses.

Joyce, J., was of opinion that the conveyances and mortgage were one transaction, and dismissed the action.

The Court of Appeal held the mortgage void and directed the appellants to deliver it up to the respondent to be cancelled.

By the Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), power is given under section 13 for persons to establish a society under the Act, whether terminating or permanent, for the purpose of raising by the subscriptions of its members a fund out of which loans should be made to members upon mortgage securities. Section 38 enacts: "Any person under the age of twenty-one years may be admitted as a member of any society under this Act, the rules of which do not prohibit such admission, and may give all necessary acquittances, but during his non-age he shall not be competent to vote or hold any office in the society."

The Infants' Relief Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 62), enacts that, from the date of its passing contracts entered into by infants, except for necessaries, are to be void, and that no action is to be brought whereby to charge any person upon any promise made after full age to pay any debt contracted during infancy.

Hughes, K.C., and G. Broke Freeman, for the appellants.

Badcock, K.C., and E. Ford, for the respondent, were not called upon.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I cannot doubt that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was right, and I move your lordships that the appeal be dismissed with costs. I really do not know that I can add anything to what the learned judges in the Court of Appeal have said. The real question seems to me to turn entirely upon the Act of 1874. That Act has, in terms, made the instrument which is put forward by the society as their security, and the foundation of their claim, absolutely void. The result is that there is no such obligation as has been insisted on at the bar against the respondent. I notice that Joyce, J., apparently, would not have disagreed with that proposition, but he gets out of the application of it by using a phrase which, to my mind, covers up the weakness of the argument. He says that what the court below, and your lordships here, are disposed to affirm, the right of the society to stand in the shoes of the vendor because they, as agents for the lady, paid the purchase-money, is a transaction which is not set aside and rendered void by the Act of 1874, and that is true. But then, in order to justify the judgment which he gave entirely against the respondent, he says: "But it is all one transaction, and this" (what I have now been describing) "being perfectly valid notwithstanding the Act, the whole claim must be rejected." That seems to me to be covering up in language things which are in their nature distinct. It is not true to say that it is one transaction. If it were meant that all the parties contemplated the things that were afterwards done, it is perfectly possible that it may be true, although I do not think that there is much evidence of it; but I will assume that it was so. What then? In order to make it one transaction so as to avoid the vice of infringing the Act of 1874, the transaction you are dealing with must be one which avoids that vice. Now, the transaction is a totally different transaction, according to the history of the matters as they occurred. There is one transaction in which, on behalf of the respondent, the building society buys from a stranger—I mean a stranger in the legal sense—land which belonged to that stranger. That stranger, at the instance of the society, conveys to this lady that land. Putting your finger upon that part of the transaction, what is there done is an absolutely separate transaction. The parties to it are different, and the nature of the transaction is different. It is a purchase of land. Then, in order to build upon that land, in order to make it available for the purpose for which the respondent desired it, money is borrowed from the society, and that money is secured by a mortgage on that which, by the transaction which I have just described, has become the property of the respondent. You cannot help analyzing the transaction for this purpose, and, so far as this part of the money now claimed is concerned, the only thing that one can say is that it is money borrowed. I agree that it is money borrowed for a particular purpose, but it is money borrowed, and the claim, in substance as well as in form, is that that money should be repaid. Therefore it is money borrowed by a minor; whether it is secured by a mortgage deed, or whether it is by mere parol, it is money lent by one of the parties to the other, a minor, and now reclaimed from the minor. That is within the express language of the Infants' Relief Act, and how it can be suggested that it is the same transaction as that which I have previously described, so as to cure the illegality of that part of it, I confess that I am not able to follow. Then if we come to that which is the substance of the matter, what can be clearer than this, that if the original thing without the mortgage is in itself void, you can neither make it better nor worse by the fact of there being a mortgage? Nor can you dismiss the mortgage, which is the only security that this society possessed, and say that simply as a member of the society the lady is liable to pay. The answer to that, I think, is in a word—there is no necessity for a member of the society to borrow at all. It is not a necessary part of a member's function as a member of the society to borrow, and therefore the two Acts of Parliament, the Act which legalizes a minor becoming a member, and the Act which renders the transaction of a minor borrowing money and having to repay it absolutely void, are quite reconcilable. The minor might be a member without having any necessity to borrow. Under those circumstances it seems to me that there is no answer to the judgment of the Court of Appeal, which affirms the subrogated right of the society to be repaid the money which they, standing in the shoes of the vendor, would have a right to claim as a lien upon the property conveyed. On the other hand, it is absolutely hopeless, as it appears to me, to attempt to get rid of the express language of the statute, which renders the loan, and the mortgage which was the security for the loan, absolutely and entirely void. For these reasons I think that the appeal must be dismissed, and the judgment appealed from affirmed.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. I think I am scarcely justified in interposing to add anything to what has been already said; but in a single word I should like to say that I think that in the vendor's lien to which this society succeeded, and had a right to succeed, in respect of the payment which they originally made, there was good ground of judgment so far as regards the sum paid for the purchase of the property, and that the judgment in the appellants' favour is right, so far as that goes. But I agree with your lordships that, while the society will take the benefit of that payment in succeeding to the vendor's lien, they cannot succeed on any other part of this case. I agree with the unanimous view of the Court of Appeal, that the money which was got and used for the purpose of making improvements on the property, or rather of adding buildings on the solum of the property, was really an advance to this lady during her minority, and consequently that she was not liable for the repayment of it, and, further, that the mortgage which she granted was a bad mortgage, and not in any sense a good security for the repayment of that money. These advances are expressly struck at by the provision in the Infants' Relief Act, which was passed a few days after the Building Societies Act. That being so, I see no answer, as Romer, L.J., has said, to the Infants' Relief Act. The language of that Act is too strong for the suggestion that the building society is to take the benefit of these advances. I do not see any possible answer to that Act. Therefore I agree with your lordships; and, for the reasons clearly stated by the judges in the court below, I am of opinion that this judgment ought to be affirmed.

Lord DAVEY.—The judgments which have just been delivered by your lordships who have preceded me, and the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal, appear to me to have entirely exhausted the subject, and I will only add this, that I think that Joyce, J., if he had not been misled by the impression that the transactions in question in this litigation could all be treated as parts of one transaction, would have been of the same opinion also. The learned judge thought that the transactions of purchase and of mortgage were all parts of one transaction, and that the lady, the minor, could not repudiate the mortgage transaction without repudiating in toto. It has already been pointed out, and it is only necessary to say, that the transaction between the vendor and the purchaser is one thing, and the transaction between the purchaser who acquires the property and the mortgagees is another thing. The transaction appears to me to simply mean this: a person without any means of her own contracts to buy a property; before the purchase is completed she is called upon to pay the purchase-money, and she goes to a moneylender, or, as in the present instance, to a building society, persons willing to advance the money on some terms, and she obtains a sufficient advance to enable her to complete the purchase. That seems to be a very simple transaction. Then the loan is so framed as to include a further sum of money to enable the purchaser to commence building operations on the land also. The transaction with the vendor was complete when the purchase-money was paid to him, and the transaction between the purchaser and the mortgagee was one with which the vendor had no concern whatever. The only question of general importance in the case is the question how far the permission which section 38 of the Building Societies Act, 1874, gives for an infant to be a member of a building society, authorizes the infant to do in relation to his or her membership everything which an adult could do. It is argued that the Act having enabled an infant to become a member has, by implication, enabled and empowered an infant to contract to pay his or her fines, and to enjoy all the privileges of membership, including that of obtaining an advance; and it is said, on the principle, I suppose, that generalia specialibus non derogant, that this so, notwithstanding the absolute and positive declaration in the Infants' Relief Act of the same year that contracts by an infant for the repayment of money borrowed are void. I am not of that opinion. It is not necessary, as has been pointed out in the judgments in the court below, that a member of a building society should obtain an advance. He may be a member without obtaining an advance; it is entirely in his own option whether he will obtain an advance or not, and that option, as has been pointed out by Romer, L.J., can only be exercised on the condition that he is able to comply with the requirements or conditions on which alone an advance is given, one of which is that he shall be able to make an effectual mortgage to the society. He may possibly obtain an advance by getting a mortgage made by some friend or relation, but if he cannot do that—it may be his misfortune, or it may be his good fortune—inasmuch as the law prevents an infant from entering into a contract for the repayment of money borrowed, he cannot exercise that particular privilege of obtaining an advance until he becomes of age, simply because he is unable by law to comply with the conditions upon which alone that advance can be made. I ought to mention only one more point which was made. It is said that the mortgage is not for the repayment of money borrowed, but for the repayment of instalments in respect of the shares. No doubt in form it is so, but when the value of the share, as it is called, has been advanced, those payments on the share assume and bear the character of repayment of money borrowed, and it would be trifling with the plain words of the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, if we said that an infant might contract for the repayment of a loan in that form by calling it payments on the share. On the whole, I agree so entirely with the judgments which have been delivered, and I am so well satisfied with the reasoning of Romer, L.J., in his judgment, with every word of which I agree, that I do not think that I ought to trouble your lordships at any greater length.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I entirely agree.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Peacock & Goddard, for Rothera & Sons, Nottingham.

Solicitors for the respondent, Beyfus & Beyfus.

---

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Feb. 7.

SURTEES v. WOODHOUSE. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Covenant by lessee to pay present and future outgoings charged on the premises—Expenses of private street works—Works completed before commencement of term—Final apportionment made afterwards—Private Street Works Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 57), ss. 6, 12, 13, 14.

A lease of certain premises contained a covenant by the lessee to "pay and bear all present and future rates, taxes, duties, assessments, and outgoings charged upon the said premises or the owner or occupier in respect thereof." Before the commencement of the term certain private street works, executed under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, had been completed, and the expenses thereof became, from the date of completion, a charge upon the premises, though the final apportionment of the expenses was not made until after the commencement of the term. The lessor, having paid the amount of the expenses apportioned in respect of the premises, sued the lessee to recover the sum so paid as being an outgoing which the lessee was liable to pay under his covenant.

Held, that the covenant did not apply to an outgoing which was charged upon the premises before the commencement of the term, though not payable until afterwards.

Appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Walton, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by the plaintiff, Mrs. Surtees, against the defendant, who was the occupier of a house at Maidenhead under a sub-demise from the plaintiff, to recover £60, being the cost apportioned to the premises in respect of certain private street improvement works carried out by the corporation of Maidenhead.

The facts, so far as material, were as follows: By an indenture dated the 16th of May, 1891, one Ward demised to the plaintiff the premises in question for the term of seven years from the 25th of March, 1891. By the terms of the indenture the plaintiff covenanted during the term to "pay and bear all present and future rates, taxes, duties, assessments, and outgoings charged upon the said premises or the owner or occupier in respect thereof." By a supplemental lease dated the 9th of September, 1892, the term was extended to twenty-one years, the plaintiff covenanting to perform all the covenants in the original lease. By an indenture dated the 30th of November, 1899, the plaintiff sub-demised the premises to the defendant for the remainder of the term less one day from the 30th of November, 1899, and the defendant covenanted that he would pay the rent "and will at all times during the said term hereby granted observe and perform all the covenants and conditions contained in the said recited indentures of lease on the lessee's part to be observed and performed (except the covenant for the payment of the rent thereby reserved), and will keep indemnified the lessor from and against the said covenants and conditions and all claims and demands in respect thereof." In September, 1899, the corporation of Maidenhead executed, under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, certain private street improvement works in the neighbourhood of this house. The works were completed on the 7th of October. The final apportionment of the expenses thereof was made on the 11th of December, 1899, after the date of the sub-demise, and the amount payable in respect of this house was £60. The plaintiff paid to the successor in title of Ward, her lessor, this £60, as being an "outgoing" which she was liable to pay under the terms of the covenant in the original lease of May, 1891, and she sought in this action to recover this sum from the defendant under the terms of the indenture of sub-demise of November, 1899.

Walton, J., held that, though the effect of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, as interpreted by the case of Stock v. Meakin, 48 W. R. 420, [1900] 1 Ch. 683, was to make the amount of the apportioned expenses a charge on the premises as from the date of the completion of the works, still the amount was not payable until the final apportionment, and these expenses, therefore, became due and payable after the 30th of November, 1899; and in his opinion, upon the true construction of the covenant, the defendant covenanted to pay all liabilities which accrued due after the commencement of the term, even though such outgoings arose in respect of an obligation created before the term. He accordingly held that the defendant was liable on his covenant, and he gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Scarlett, for the defendant.—In Stock v. Meakin, this court held that the expenses of private street works executed under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, become a charge upon the premises from the date of the completion of the works, and not from the date of the final apportionment. The expenses here were outgoings charged upon the demised premises before the 30th of November, 1899, the date of the sub-demise to the defendant. The covenant by the defendant during the term to observe and perform the covenants in the leases of 1891 and 1892, and to keep indemnified the plaintiff therefrom, applies, so far as material to the present case, to the covenant by the plaintiff in the lease of 1891 to pay and bear all present and future outgoings charged upon the premises. Those words mean charged upon the premises during the term. They do not cover an outgoing charged upon the premises before the commencement of the term, and becoming due and payable afterwards. The words are outgoings "charged" upon the premises, not outgoings "payable." Those words mean charged during the term. The words "present and future" do not operate so as to include an outgoing already charged on the premises at the commencement of the term, but refer to outgoings of a kind that are then in existence or may come into existence in the future: Brewster v. Kitchin, 1 Ld. Raym. 317; Mile End Vestry v. Whitby, 78 L. T. Rep. 80. The learned judge was wrong in holding that an outgoing becoming due and payable after the commencement of the term, though charged on the premises before, comes within the covenant.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They also referred to Hornsey Local Board v. Monarch Building Society, 38 W. R. 85, 24 Q. B. D. 1.

J. E. Bankes, K.C., and E. Morten, for the plaintiff.—The defendant is liable to pay this outgoing upon any one of four grounds. First, he undertook on the 30th of November, 1899, to pay all present and future outgoings charged upon the premises. The word "present" means existing, and this charge was existing on the 30th of November. Secondly, the covenant is that he will "pay" all outgoings charged upon the premises. These expenses became payable on the 11th of December, when the final apportionment was made. The meaning of the covenant is that he will, as between himself and the plaintiff, pay any outgoing which is charged upon the premises and which becomes payable in respect thereof after the 30th of November, 1899. Thirdly, the word "charged" means imposed as an obligation upon the owner or occupier, and that cannot be until the outgoing becomes payable. Until that time the local authority cannot claim it from the owner or occupier. Fourthly, under the plaintiff's covenant in the lease of 1891 she was liable to her lessor to pay these expenses. The defendant by his covenant in the sub-lease of 1899 has covenanted to indemnify the plaintiff against the covenants in her lease. Under section 14 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, the local authority can recover the amount of the apportioned expenses from the "owner" of the premises, who is defined by section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875, as the person in receipt of the rack-rent of the premises. The plaintiff being therefore liable to pay this sum to her lessor, the defendant must indemnify her.

Danckwerts, K.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 7.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question which we have to decide is as to the liability of the defendant to indemnify the plaintiff against the payment of certain moneys which had become payable under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, and which the plaintiff had to pay to her superior landlord, who was the successor in title of the person who granted her the lease in 1891. The defendant is sought to be made liable on a covenant in a lease of the 30th of November, 1899, by which he covenanted to observe and perform all the covenants and conditions contained in the said recited indentures of lease and on the lessees' part to be observed and performed, and to keep indemnified the lessor from and against the said covenants and conditions and all claims and demands in respect thereof. The two recited indentures of lease are those of 1891 and 1892, under which the plaintiff became the lessee. It is not, in my opinion, material to consider how far the words of the covenant in the lease of 1899 ought to be treated as merely repeating the covenants contained in the deeds of 1891 and 1892, because in my judgment the defendant is entitled to succeed upon another ground, whatever may be the true construction of the covenant of indemnity in the lease of 1899. I agree with Walton, J., that we must go back to the original deeds of 1891 and 1892 and see what would have been the position of the lessee under those deeds in respect of private street improvement expenses of this kind. The real question we have to decide is whether the covenant by the lessee in the deed of 1891 covers a charge in respect of private street works completed before the commencement of the tenancy but not payable until afterwards. If it does, then the defendant is liable in this action; if it does not, then he is not liable. I treat, for this purpose, the covenant in the lease of 1891 as being written in, in terms in the sub-lease of 1899. The words of the covenant are: "During the said term pay the said rent in manner aforesaid, and also will pay and bear all present and future rates, taxes, duties, assessments, and outgoings charged upon the said premises or the owner or occupier in respect thereof." In my judgment those words do not cover a rate or charge which has become effective before the commencement of the term by reason of the completion of the works. This court decided in Stock v. Meakin, which was a case between vendor and purchaser, that the implied indemnity which a vendor gives to a purchaser would cover a sum chargeable in respect of private street works which were completed before the date of the sale, though the final apportionment of the expenses was not made until after that date. That case does not necessarily govern the present case, because this is not a case of vendor and purchaser, but turns entirely upon the construction of the particular words of the covenant in the lease. It was suggested that the words "all present and future rates, &c., charged upon the premises or the owner or occupier in respect thereof," were inserted for the purpose of covering a rate or charge of this kind which became chargeable on the premises on the completion of the works under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, but which had not become payable at the commencement of the term because the final apportionment of the expenses had not then been made. I cannot agree with that contention. The words "present and future rates" were put in for the purpose of covering the case of rates, taxes, &c., of a kind not existing at the date of the lease, and I do not regard those words as referring in any way to charges on property before the commencement of the term, though not payable until after. It seems to me that, when the books containing the precedents of leases are looked at, they provide in plain and simple language for a case where a tenant is intended to bear charges to which the property has become liable but which had not at the time become payable. I do not think that the words in the present covenant have any reference to such a case. If one construes the covenant apart from the words "present and future" the covenant seems to me to be perfectly plain, and does not impose upon the tenant the obligation to pay charges to which the property has been assessed for private street works before the commencement of the term, though they do not become payable until after. For these reasons I think that the judgment of Walton J., must be reversed.

STIRLING, L.J., read the following judgment: I agree. I think that the case of the plaintiff cannot be placed higher than if the defendant had by the lease of the 30th of November, 1999, entered into a covenant with the plaintiff in the same terms as the covenant on the part of the lessees contained in the lease of the 16th of May, 1891—namely, a covenant on the part of the lessees during the term granted by the lease of the 30th of November, 1899, to "pay and bear all present and future rates, taxes, duties, assessments, and outgoings charged upon the said premises or the owner or occupier in respect thereof." The plaintiff contends that the sum sought to be recovered is an "outgoing charged upon the premises or the owner in respect thereof." It is not disputed that that sum is an outgoing within the meaning of the covenant. The nature of the outgoing in question was considered by the Court of Appeal in the case of Stock v. Meakin, and it was held that the amount of the expenses incurred under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, becomes a charge on the premises on which they are apportioned as from the date of the completion of the works, and not from the date of the final apportionment. It was not expressly decided in that case whether or not the amount is "charged on the owner in respect of the premises" as from the same date. By section 12 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, it is provided that "the sums apportioned . . . shall be recoverable in manner provided by this Act, or in the same manner as private improvement expenses are recoverable under the Public Health Act, 1875." Section 14 of the same Act provides that the local authority may from time to time recover "from the owner for the time being of any premises in respect of which any sum is due for expenses of private street works the whole or any portion of such sum," together with interest from the date of the final apportionment till payment. The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 257, provides that private improvement expenses may be recovered, together with interest from the date of service of a demand for the same, "from any person who is owner of such premises when the works are completed for which such expenses have been incurred." It appears to me that, by the combined effect of this last section and section 12 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, the apportioned amount became charged on the owner at the time of completion of the works as from that date; and this view is supported by the reasoning of Vaughan Williams, L.J., who delivered the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Stock v. Meakin. There is nothing in the Private Street Works Act, 1892, to charge the expenses on the occupier. It was not disputed that at the date of the completion of the works the plaintiff was the "owner" within the meaning of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, of the premises in respect of which the sum sought to be recovered was apportioned; and it follows that the plaintiff had before the commencement of the term granted by the lease become charged with that sum in respect of the premises comprised in the lease. It is said that, although both the premises and the plaintiff as the owner thereof had become charged with the sum sought to be recovered before the date of the lease to the defendant, yet the sum was not payable until after the date of it. But the covenant is during the term to pay and bear, not "outgoings payable," but "outgoings charged"; and this particular outgoing, which is not of a recurring nature, became charged both on the premises demised and on the owner thereof before the commencement of the term. It is true that the charge could not be enforced against either the premises or the owner until the final apportionment was made, but still it does not seem to me that it is one which the defendant as lessee took upon himself. The learned judge attached great weight to the word "present" which occurs in the covenant contained in the lease of the 16th of May, 1891. If full effect were given to this word the lessee would be liable for arrears of rates and taxes due and payable at the date of the lease, a conclusion from which the learned judge himself shrank, and which was admitted in argument to be inadmissible. The main object of the introduction of the words "present and future" in covenants such as these is to impose on the lessee the liability to pay, not only taxes, rates, &c., existing at the date of the lease, but also all taxes, rates, &c., subsequently imposed, whether or not of the same nature or for the same purposes as those in existence at the granting of the lease (see Davidson's Precedents in Conveyancing (3rd ed.), vol. 5, Part I., p. 22, note c.); and, without saying that the effect of those words is in all cases necessarily so limited, I think that this affords a sufficient explanation of them in the present case.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question turns upon the construction of the covenant in the lease of 1891 which has been imported into the sub-demise of 1899 as a covenant to be performed by the defendant during the term comprised in the sub-demise. Before the commencement of that term the private street works were completed, and according to the case of Stock v. Meakin the expenses thereof had then become a charge upon the premises, though the final apportionment was not made until after the commencement of the term. It must be taken that the defendant entered into a covenant in terms similar to that entered into by the plaintiff in the lease of 1891—namely, during the term comprised in the sub-lease to pay and bear all present and future rates, taxes, duties, assessments, and outgoings charged upon the premises or the owner or occupier in respect thereof. In my opinion that covenant does not impose upon the tenant the obligation to pay and bear a charge upon the premises existing at the commencement of his term, but only refers to future charges. The sub-lease all through is limited to what happens during the term. The plaintiff therefore fails in the action.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Lowe & Co.

Solicitors for the defendant, Willis & Willis, for A. Fossick, Maidenhead.

---

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Dec. 2.

REX v. ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY. (a.)

Solicitor—Treasury solicitor—Acting for individual—Costs—Duly qualified solicitor—Revenue Solicitors Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 25), s. 1—Solicitors Acts, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), ss. 2, 47, and 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 68), s. 12—Treasury Solicitor Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 18)—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 43, sub-section 3.

Where the Solicitor to the Treasury acts, under the directions of the Crown, for a private individual, he is to be deemed to be a duly qualified solicitor for all purposes, though he is not on the roll of solicitors and has not taken out a certificate authorizing him to practise as such.

Appeal from an order of Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., at chambers, refusing to review the taxation of costs.

Upon the confirmation of the election of the bishop-elect of Worcester, Alexander William Cobham and Edward Henry Garbett appeared before the Vicar-General of the Province of Canterbury for the purpose of raising certain objections, relating to doctrine, to the confirmation. The vicar-general refused to entertain the objections. Two rules nisi were accordingly obtained on behalf of the objectors, directed to the Archbishop of Canterbury and the vicar-general, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding them to hear and determine the objections proposed to be made to the confirmation. Cause was shown against the rules by the law officers appearing on behalf of the Crown, and cause was also shown on behalf of the archbishop by separate counsel instructed by the Solicitor to the Treasury, the Crown having thought it desirable in the public interest that it should take up the case of the archbishop so as to ensure its being fully and properly placed before the court. The bishop-elect was also represented by counsel. The rules were discharged with costs to the archbishop, but the court held that the Crown was not entitled to costs, there being no jurisdiction to give costs either to or against the Crown. The case is reported in 50 W. R. 348, 476, [1902] 2 K. B. 503.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Upon the taxation of the bill of costs of the archbishop, the master taxed the costs as if they had been incurred by an ordinary solicitor. Cobham thereupon carried in the following objections to the taxation: (1) Because the Treasury solicitor, who purported to act as solicitor for the archbishop, was not qualified to act as such solicitor. The Treasury solicitor was unable to recover costs from the archbishop, and neither the Treasury solicitor nor the archbishop through the Treasury solicitor was entitled to recover costs from Alexander William Cobham. (2) Because the whole of the costs in the bill were in fact incurred by the Crown and not by the archbishop. An affidavit was made by a clerk of Cobham's solicitors to the effect that he attended at the office of Messrs. Lee, Bolton, & Lee, the solicitors to the archbishop, for the purpose of serving them with a copy of the rule nisi, and saw Mr. Harry Wilmot Lee, who, after having accepted service, informed him that he (Mr. Lee) had seen the Treasury solicitor that day and was handing over the matter to him, as he (Mr. Lee) did not see why the archbishop should have to pay costs and be charged with the same when all the archbishop had to do in the matter was to carry out a mandate from the Crown.

The taxing-master overruled the objections, stating as his grounds that the rules were directed to the archbishop, and that the archbishop was separately represented upon the argument of the rules, and though it was at first contemplated that the archbishop's solicitors—Messrs. Lee, Bolton, & Lee—would act for the archbishop, almost immediately after the rules had been obtained the Treasury solicitor took charge of the archbishop's case as well as that for the Crown; that he did not think that Messrs. Lee, Bolton, & Lee ever really acted for the archbishop in the case; that there were a few items in the bill of costs of the archbishop which were common to the cases for the archbishop and the Crown, and these he (the taxing-master) had, in accordance with the practice, apportioned in moieties; that in all other respects the costs he had taxed were distinct from the costs of the Crown, and were in fact incurred on behalf of the archbishop; and that with regard to the objection that the Treasury solicitor was not qualified to act as solicitor for the archbishop, he could find no authority for it, it being a very usual thing for the Treasury solicitor to act for magistrates and others in similar positions, and having regard to the King's position as head of the Church and the close connection between the interests of the Crown and the archbishop in the litigation, it seemed to him that the Treasury solicitor was acting within the ambit of his duties in representing the archbishop and instructing counsel on his behalf.

Upon appeal Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., affirmed the decision of the master.

Cobham appealed.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Morton Smith, for the appellant.—First, the costs were incurred by the Crown on its own behalf and in its own interest, and were not incurred on behalf of the archbishop: Dixon v. Farrer, 35 W. R. 95, 18 Q. B. D. 43; Paddock v. Forrester, 1 Man. & G. 583, 8 Dowl. 834. Secondly, it is unlawful for the Treasury solicitor, who does not hold a certificate authorizing him to practise as a solicitor, to act for a private individual as his personal solicitor, and therefore the costs so incurred cannot be recovered. The Act of 1729, 2 Geo. 2, c. 23, which regulated the admission of attorneys, contained a provision (section 28) that the requirements of the Act were not to extend to the examination, swearing, admission, or enrolment of persons to be solicitors of the Treasury, Customs, Excise, Post Office, &c. That Act has been repealed by the Solicitors Act, 1843, but by section 47 the same exemption is continued. The Revenue Solicitors Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 25), and the Treasury solicitor Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 18), deal with the appointment and status of the Treasury solicitor, making him a statutory person with powers limited by statute. The earlier of the two statutes, by section 1, authorizes a person appointed to be solicitor on behalf of his Majesty, under the orders and directions of the Commissioners of the Treasury, to act and practise as such solicitor under such orders and directions in any court; and the later statute, by section 1, incorporated the Treasury solicitor, making him a corporation sole. Under those statutes the Treasury solicitor can act for those persons or departments of state for whom he is authorized to act by a Treasury minute: see Pulling on Solicitors (3rd ed.), pp. 27, 28. It is no part of his statutory duty to act for the Archbishop of Canterbury. He therefore comes within the provisions of the Solicitors Act, 1843, section 2 of which makes it a misdemeanour for an unqualified person to act as a solicitor (Reg. v. Buchanan, 8 Q. B. 883); and sections 35 and 36 make it a contempt of court for him so to act, and render him incapable of recovering his fees. By section 12 of the Solicitors Act, 1874, no costs on account of any act done by an unqualified person shall be recoverable by any person whomsoever. The Treasury solicitor, in order to recover his costs, must be acting as solicitor for his Majesty's affairs within his statutory authority, otherwise he is not a duly qualified solicitor. The order appealed from was therefore wrong.

They also referred to Galloway v. Mayor, &c., of London, 15 W. R. 1032, L. R. 4 Eq. 90, at p. 95; Fowler v. Monmouthshire Canal Co., 27 W. R. 659, 4 Q. B. D. 334; and Irvin v. Sanger, 58 L. J. Q. B. 64, 37 W. R. Dig. 60.

Sir Edward Carson, S.G., and H. Sutton, for the archbishop.—The Crown thought it right to have the archbishop's case placed fully before the court, and therefore the Treasury solicitor was instructed to act for him. At the same time it was felt that there might perhaps be some conflict between the rights of the Crown and the duties of the archbishop, and therefore it was thought proper that the archbishop should be separately represented by counsel. The Treasury solicitor is to be treated as a duly qualified solicitor for all purposes so long as he acts under the directions of the Crown. This is clear from section 1 of the Revenue Solicitors Act, 1828, section 47 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, section 12 of the Solicitors Act, 1874, and section 43, sub-section 3, of the Stamp Act, 1891. Those statutes qualify the Treasury solicitor to act as a solicitor in all courts without taking out a certificate or being enrolled as a solicitor under the Solicitors Acts.

Danckwerts, K.C., replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of the Lord Chief Justice in chambers overruling certain objections taken to the taxation of costs. The question arose in this way. Captain Cobham obtained a rule for a mandamus against the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Crown being interested, and having been served with notice of the same, appeared to show cause against it on its own behalf. The Crown being also interested in the case to be set up by the archbishop, in the exercise of its undoubted right where someone in his public capacity is the object of the proceedings, took up the case for the archbishop in order that his case might be fully placed before the court. In the result the rule was discharged with costs to the archbishop, but it was held that, as the Crown could neither pay nor receive costs, apart from any statute expressly authorizing it, the Crown was not entitled to costs. Upon the taxation of costs the master allowed to the archbishop such costs as were properly payable to him in the same way as if he were represented by an ordinary solicitor.

Objection was taken that the costs could not be recovered on the ground that the archbishop had appeared by a person who was in law debarred from acting for him—namely, the Solicitor to the Treasury. It is contended in support of that objection that, inasmuch as the Crown appointed the Solicitor to the Treasury to represent the archbishop, and as that solicitor was debarred by law from acting as solicitor for the archbishop, the latter must be deemed not to have been represented by a solicitor at all, and is not entitled to recover any costs. The question therefore comes to this: Was it competent for the Solicitor to the Treasury to appear as solicitor for the archbishop, because if it was, the archbishop was entitled to his costs as against the other side?

It is contended on behalf of the appellant that, as section 2 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, debars any person from acting as a solicitor for another unless he is duly qualified, and as it is a necessary qualification that the person so acting should be enrolled as a solicitor and should hold a certificate, the Solicitor to the Treasury, who is not enrolled as a solicitor and does not hold a certificate, cannot act as a solicitor for the archbishop. It seems to me that, if it were made out that the Solicitor to the Treasury was not a "duly qualified" person, the appellant would be entitled to succeed. However, in the Solicitors Act, 1874, there is a section which appears to me to be practically conclusive of the case. Section 12 enacts that any person who wilfully and falsely pretends to be or takes or uses any name, title, addition, or description implying that he is duly qualified to act as a solicitor, shall be guilty of an offence under the Act, and no costs on account of any act or proceeding done or taken by any person who acts as a solicitor without being duly qualified so to act shall be recoverable by any person whomsoever. Now comes the most material clause: "For the purposes of this section a person shall be deemed to be duly qualified to act as a solicitor if he shall have in force at the time at which he acts as solicitor a duly stamped certificate authorizing him so to do, pursuant to the provisions of the stamp laws and the laws for the time being relating to solicitors." That is one qualification. Now comes another, which is an equally good qualification, "or shall have been appointed to be Solicitor of the Treasury, Customs, Inland Revenue, Post Office, or any other branch of her Majesty's Revenue, or of any other public department, including the department of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and of the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, or if he be a clerk or officer appointed to act for the solicitor for any public department as hereinbefore described." Therefore there are two qualifications, each equally good, one the general qualification dealt with in the first part of the section, and the other the special qualification by reason of holding the appointment of Solicitor to the Treasury or other public office. Therefore the archbishop was represented by a duly qualified solicitor, and unless there is some other ground of objection, the objection must fail. Now what other ground is there? The Solicitor to the Treasury was appointed originally under 9 Geo. 4, c. 25. Section 1 of that Act says that "whereas it has been found greatly conducive to the public interest that persons specially appointed by the Commissioners to the Treasury, or by the several commissioners to his Majesty's Revenue, to be solicitors or attorneys on behalf of his Majesty, should act and practise as such solicitors or attorneys without being admitted and enrolled as solicitors or attorneys, and without being subject, by reason of such acting or practising, to any of the regulations in force in any part of the United Kingdom relating to solicitors or attorneys: Be it therefore enacted . . . that whenever any person has been or is or shall be appointed to be solicitor or attorney on behalf of his Majesty, under the orders and directions of the Commissioners of the Treasury . . . it is and shall and may be lawful for such person to act and practise as such solicitor or attorney under such orders and directions in all and every court and courts, jurisdiction and jurisdictions, place and places, in any and every part of the United Kingdom, anything in any Act of Parliament, or in any order or rule of any court of justice, or any law, usage, or custom in force in any part of the United Kingdom relating to solicitors or attorneys, or to the admission or practice of such solicitors or attorneys, to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding." Therefore that section authorizes the appointment of a person who would otherwise not be a solicitor at all to be solicitor for his Majesty, and this gives him the rights of a solicitor in all courts. It is contended that the Solicitor to the Treasury was not acting in the present case on behalf of his Majesty, but on behalf of the archbishop. In my opinion it is on behalf of his Majesty, because the Crown thinks it is to the advantage of the public, which is only another name for the Crown, that the archbishop's case should be fully and properly heard. That is the reason why the Crown has intervened, and it intervenes by appointing the Solicitor to the Treasury solicitor for the archbishop. No wrong is done by that because the Solicitor to the Treasury is on the same footing as a duly qualified solicitor. Under the statute he is qualified to act and practise as such solicitor under the orders and directions of the Crown, and when the Crown thinks it expedient in the public interest to appoint him to act in a given case, he has to appear in the only way in which he can appear in the particular case, namely, by becoming solicitor on the record for the particular person in whose case the Crown is interested.

That really disposes of the case. The Solicitor to the Treasury is none the less a duly qualified solicitor because he has not got a certificate. He is none the less appearing at the instance of the Crown because he has been put on the record as the solicitor for the party. The only possible ground of objection would be the law of maintenance, but that law has no application to cases where the Crown appoints the solicitor. The objections therefore fail. It is clear that the Crown can intervene in the public interest where some public functionary is made defendant to an action. It can intervene in his behalf. The method by which it intervenes may be by appointing its own solicitor to act for the party. It seems to me, therefore, that all the conditions are fulfilled which entitle the archbishop to his costs. The appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Putting aside for a moment the question of the personal capacity of the Solicitor to the Treasury, we find this: The archbishop is being proceeded against under circumstances which might make him personally liable for costs, and which, if he succeeded, would entitle him to receive costs, if so decreed by the tribunal which heard the case, from the persons who were proceeding against him. In these circumstances the Crown, for what appears to me to be good and sufficient reasons, came to the conclusion that it was to its interest that it should, at its own expense, defend on behalf of the archbishop. Now I want to point out that, in my opinion, when the Crown made the offer to the archbishop to conduct at its own expense the defence of the archbishop, the latter was not bound to have accepted that offer. If he chose he could have defended at his own expense and declined the assistance of the Crown. He did not do so; he accepted the Crown's offer, and he left it to the Crown to act for him. The result was that the Crown acted by its usual and proper solicitor, but still in this matter, and so far as I am considering the case, on behalf of the archbishop. I should point out that so long as the Crown was acting in that proceeding on behalf of the archbishop, it would have been bound to have regarded the archbishops' interests, even if it turned out that they were not absolutely identical with or were even in some respects opposed to the interests of the Crown. If the Crown found that the interests were so conflicting that it would not be proper to continue to act for the archbishop, it might have receded from that position; but so long as Crown was acting by its solicitor for the archbishop, it was bound to regard the archbishop's interests. The archbishop remained a party after the Crown had taken up his defence, liable to pay costs if he failed and entitled to receive costs if he succeeded, his solicitor being the Solicitor to the Treasury, acting by the authority of the Treasury. In those circumstances, which made the Treasury really liable for the expenses of the defence, the solicitor would naturally look, not to the archbishop personally for costs if he failed, but would look to the Treasury. So it appears to me that if the archbishop succeeded, they would, as his solicitors, be, in the ordinary course, entitled to receive the costs payable by the other side, if those costs were awarded, and would then have to come down on the Treasury under the indemnity only for the difference between the costs they received from the other side and the costs incurred on behalf of the archbishop.

The case cannot, to my mind, be substantially differentiated from that of a person in the position of a master against whom proceedings have been taken by a servant, where the master is insured against liability. There the insurance company defends on behalf of the master, and it generally employs its own solicitor, but although the insurance company in such a case employs its own solicitor, and that solicitor would primarily not look to the defendant personally for costs, yet when the solicitor acts for the defendant, so far as the plaintiff in that action is concerned, that solicitor is, for all purposes, as between the plaintiff and the defendant, the ordinary and proper solicitor for the defendant. In such a case, if the defendant is awarded costs, those costs would be recoverable by him, and in estimating what the amount of those costs are, he would naturally and properly include the costs of the solicitor who acted for him in that case, although, as between him and the insurance company, the solicitor was the solicitor for the insurance company, and the insurance company had to see that the costs were provided for by them if the defendant did not succeed.

It follows that in this case the appellants must fail unless they can establish that the Solicitor to the Treasury has a personal incapacity for appearing for the archbishop under such circumstances as those I have indicated. Was he under such incapacity? In my opinion, he was not. It appears to me that where the Crown for good and sufficient reasons thinks it is for the interests of the Crown that the defence of an individual in an action or proceeding against that individual should be undertaken, and the Treasury solicitor is delegated by the Treasury authorities to act as solicitor for that individual, that is within the rights of the Crown, and is within the purview of the ordinary duties of the Treasury solicitor. So that, when the Treasury solicitor, in such a case as that, acting on the directions of the Treasury, appears and takes up the defence of an individual, it is part of his duty to act for that individual, and he is none the less acting for the individual as between the individual and the person who is proceeding against him because the solicitor is the Treasury solicitor acting in the interests of the Crown by the directions of the Treasury. Nor, on the other hand, is the solicitor the less acting as Treasury solicitor on behalf of the Crown and by the directions of the Treasury authorities because he acts for a private individual under the circumstances which I have indicated. In my opinion the statute of 9 Geo. 4, c. 25, has no such limited application, when properly regarded, as that contended for by the appellant. It seems to me clear here that the Treasury solicitor, as part of his duty, was entitled to act as solicitor for the archbishop in the circumstances indicated, and in so doing he incurred no liability because he had not taken out a certificate and was not duly qualified as an ordinary solicitor.

I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case the appellant seeks to get rid of the costs which were properly incurred in repelling the attack that has been made in the court below. It could not be disputed that the archbishop was attacked. The archbishop remained, as it were, the defendant on the record, and if the appellant had been successful the costs must have been paid by the archbishop. Now it was said that in the course of the proceedings it was ascertained that the Crown had intervened through the Solicitor to the Treasury. In what capacity? It was urged as representing the Crown. On the other hand, it is clear to my mind that the Solicitor for the Treasury intervened as solicitor for the archbishop, bound to protect the archbishop in the course of the proceedings, and that being the state of things, if there were no further technical difficulties in the way it would appear to be the proper course, according to the established practice of the courts, to direct the costs to be taxed as the master has taxed them. But it is said that it cannot be done because the solicitor that appeared for the archbishop was not a duly qualified solicitor—he was only the Solicitor to the Treasury. When that matter comes to be investigated it appears that, as Solicitor to the Treasury, he received instructions from the Crown to conduct the defence of the archbishop in the proceedings. On reference to section 12 of the Solicitors Act, 1874, it is perfectly clear that he occupied the position of a solicitor of the court, although he did not possess the qualification ordinarily necessary for that position. Parliament makes him a solicitor for the purposes necessary for the discharge of his duties as Solicitor to the Treasury, and here under his instructions from the Crown he appeared as solicitor for the archbishop. In my opinion the taxation was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Wainwright & Co.

Solicitor for the respondent, Solicitor to the Treasury.

---

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew, L.J.) Dec. 1.

HARRISON v. ALLIANCE ASSURANCE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Insurance — Life — Payment into court — Opinion of directors—Reasonable ground for opinion—Costs—Life Assurance Companies (Payment into Court) Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 8), s. 3—Ord. 54c, rr. 3, 5, 7.

A life assurance company, against whom an action has been brought on a policy, are entitled to an order under Ord. 54c, r. 3, giving them leave to pay the insurance money into court, under section 3 of the Life Assurance Companies (Payment into Court) Act, 1896, if it is shown that in the opinion of the board of directors no sufficient discharge can otherwise be obtained. It is not necessary to show that the directors have reasonable grounds for being of that opinion.

Any prejudice to the claimant by reason of the directors having acted unreasonably in the matter may be remedied by an order as to costs on the subsequent application for taking the money out of court.

Appeal from an order made by Darling, J., under ord. 54c., r. 3, in an action on a policy of life insurance.

In 1875 a policy of insurance on the life of one Paynter was granted by the defendant company to one Prince.

Prince died shortly afterwards, and in the administration of his estate the policy was assigned to trustees subject to the trusts of a family settlement.

The trustees paid the premiums on the policy regularly to the defendant company, and continued to do so during the life of Paynter, but about twenty years before the death of Paynter the policy was lost, and notice of the loss was duly given by the trustees to the defendant company.

On the death of Paynter, which happened in September, 1901, the plaintiff, who was the sole surviving trustee, made a claim under the policy and brought this action.

The defendant company, being desirous of availing themselves of the benefit of the Life Assurance Companies (Payment in Court) Act, 1896, took out a summons in the action under ord. 54c, r. 3, asking for leave to pay the moneys payable by them under the policy into the High Court.

Section 3 of the Life Assurance Companies (Payment in Court) Act, 1896, is as follows: "Subject to rules of court any life assurance company may pay into the High Court, or where the head office of the company is situated within the jurisdiction of the Chancery Court of the County Palatine of Lancaster either into that court or into the High Court, any moneys payable by them under a life policy in respect of which, in the opinion of their board of directors, no sufficient discharge can otherwise be obtained."

Order 54c of the Rules of the Supreme Court is headed "Life Assurance Companies (Payment into Court) Act, 1896," and rule 3 is as follows: "No payment shall be made into court under the Act where any action to which the company is a party is pending in relation to the policy or the moneys thereby assured except by leave of the judge to be obtained by summons in the action."

An affidavit used in support of the summons stated that, in the opinion of the board of directors of the company, no sufficient discharge could be obtained otherwise than by payment into court under the Act.

Darling, J., made an order giving the defendant company leave to pay the insurance money into court, and reserving all costs.

The plaintiff appealed.

Disturnal, for the plaintiff.—This is not a case in which payment into court under the Life Assurance Companies (Payment into Court) Act, 1896, ought to be allowed. The directors are acting unreasonably and attempting to avail themselves of the Act in a case to which it can never have been intended to apply. The company had notice of the loss of the policy twenty years ago, and since that time the premiums have been regularly paid by the trustees of the settlement, and latterly by the plaintiff himself as the last surviving trustee. It is admitted that the company have no record of having ever received any notice of any other claim under the policy, and the mere suggestion which appears to be now made that they may have received some such notice and forgotten it ought not to be attended to. Under the circumstances there is no reason why the company should not at once pay the insurance money to the plaintiff. Before the directors of an insurance company can avail themselves of the Act of 1896, they ought to show that they have some reasonable ground for believing that they cannot obtain a proper discharge for the insurance money otherwise than through the instrumentality of the court. In the present case there is no reasonable ground whatever for supposing that the directors are in any risk of not being able to get a good discharge from the plaintiff without the protection of the court. Further, the company are fully protected by section 3 of the Policies of Assurance Act, 1867.

Whately, for the defendants.—The order gave leave to the defendants to pay the money into court, and all costs were reserved. That order was rightly made, the case coming expressly within the terms of section 3 of the Act of 1896. Even if the plaintiff is right in his suggestion that the directors are acting unreasonably, he is not thereby prejudiced. The practice is that, when the company have paid the money into court, the claimant applies to the Chancery Division by petition or summons for payment out, under rule 5 of order 54c. In ordinary cases the company pay the money into court at their expense, and the claimant takes it out at his expense. But by rule 7, if the claimant "asks for payment of a further sum of costs by the company," he may serve the petition or summons on the company. The effect of the rules is that, on the hearing of the application for payment out, if the court should think that the company acted unreasonably in paying the money in, that matter may be set right by an order as to costs.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. The case clearly comes within the words of section 3 of the Life Assurance Companies (Payment into Court) Act, 1896. That section provides that "Subject to rules of court any life assurance company may pay into the High Court . . . any moneys payable by them under a life policy in respect of which, in the opinion of their board of directors, no sufficient discharge can otherwise be obtained." In this case an affidavit has been made on behalf of the company which states that the board of directors are of opinion that no sufficient discharge can be obtained in respect of this insurance money otherwise than by payment into court under the Act. It is contended that the directors have not shown that they have any reasonable ground for being of that opinion. But the statute does not say that they need have any reasonable ground for their opinion. If it appears that they are in fact of that opinion, the directors bring themselves within the Act, and they are entitled to pay the insurance money into court and to obtain from the court an absolute discharge for the insurance money. This does not operate unfairly to the claimant, even though the company should have acted without sufficient reason in resorting to the Act, for the want of sufficient reason can be shown by the claimant in the subsequent proceedings for payment out in the Chancery Division, and then any prejudice to the claimant can be remedied by an order as to costs. If the plaintiff is right in his suggestion that the company are acting unreasonably, the result will be that the company will have obtained the protection of the court on payment of his costs.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MATHEW, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Church, Rendell, & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Powell & Burt

---

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Oct. 27.

In re HUXTABLE.

HUXTABLE v. CRAWFURD. (a.)

Will—Charitable legacy—Evidence—Admissibility.

A testatrix bequeathed £4,000 to C. "for the charitable purposes agreed upon between us":—

Held, that evidence was admissible to show what were the charitable purposes referred to in the will, but no further; and that as the subject-matter of the legacy on the face of the will was £4,000, evidence was not admissible to show that it was only the income of £4,000 that the testatrix had agreed should be applied for charitable purposes.

Decision of Farwell, J., on this point, 50 W. R. 185, [1902] 1 Ch. 214, reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of Farwell, J. (reported 50 W. R. 185, [1902] 1 Ch. 214).

The testatrix, Mrs. Huxtable, by her will, dated the 7th of August, 1899, made the following bequest: "To my friend the Rev. Charles Hubert Payne Crawfurd I leave the sum of £4,000 sterling for the charitable purposes agreed upon between us." Testatrix died in March, 1901.

Crawfurd made an affidavit stating that about the year 1891 the testatrix first verbally informed him of her intention to leave him a sum of £4,000, the income of which he was to apply during his life for the relief of sick and necessitous persons, being members of the Church of England; and that he was to dispose of the capital after his death as his own private property. On subsequent occasions the testatrix declined to give him more specific directions about the income, stating that she was unwilling to fetter his discretion in the matter; but that at no time did she indicate any intention that the corpus of the bequest was to be applied for any charitable purpose.

The executors took out an originating summons in order to have the validity of the bequest to Crawfurd determined; the latter did not claim any beneficial interest whatever in the £4,000.

Farwell, J., held that the gift of the £4,000 to Crawfurd was for a limited charitable purpose, not for charitable purposes generally, and that evidence was admissible to show what the purpose was; and upon the evidence he held that there was a good bequest to the charitable purpose of the income of the £4,000 during Crawfurd's life; and that on his death the corpus would fall into the residuary estate.

The Attorney-General appealed.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., and R. J. Parker, for the appellant.—The will shows on the face of it a good bequest of the whole of the £4,000—not merely the income of it—for general charitable purposes. Evidence is not admissible to limit the general character of the gift expressed in the will. The whole fund is impressed with a charitable trust, and a scheme for the administration is necessary. [They were stopped by the court.]

Butcher, K.C., and Christopher James, for the next-of-kin.—The gift is for a limited charitable purpose only, and evidence is admissible to show what that purpose was. The evidence of Crawfurd shows what the intention of the testatrix was, and is not inconsistent with the words of the bequest. Either the income of the £4,000 must be applied as the testatrix intended for limited charitable purposes, or the gift must fail altogether. To hold that this is a gift for general charitable purposes would be going beyond any of the cases, and would really be frustrating, not effectuating, the intention of the testatrix.

They referred to Attorney-General v. Syderfen, 1 Vern. 224; In re White, 31 W. R. 163, [1893] 2 Ch. 41; In re Rymer, 43 W. R. 87, [1895] 1 Ch. 19.

Ashworth James, for Crawfurd, did not claim any beneficial interest in the £4,000, but submitted he had a discretion as to the mode of application of the income thereof.

Errington, for the executors.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I regret to say that I cannot agree with the conclusion at which Farwell, J., has arrived. [The Lord Justice read the terms of the gift in the will, and continued:] I cannot doubt that the affidavit of Mr. Crawfurd is admissible in evidence, but it is admissible only for the purpose of proving matters which are not defined by the will. Evidence is admissible to show what in fact were the charitable purposes agreed upon between the testatrix and Mr. Crawfurd, but not to show what was the amount of the legacy. That is a matter which to my mind is disposed of by the plain words of the will. Then, when one looks at the affidavit and asks oneself what were the charitable purposes which were agreed upon between the testatrix and Mr. Crawfurd, those are perfectly plainly defined. They were primarily "for the relief of sick and necessitous persons, being members of the Church of England, and also towards the support of charities connected with the Church of England." To that extent this affidavit is admissible, and does define those purposes. But the affidavit goes on to deal with other matters. It deals with other matters which are plainly dealt with in the will by the testatrix herself, and which, to my mind, contradict her will in a very plain manner. By the will, what was left for these charitable purposes was a sum of £4,000. There is not a word about the subject-matter of the legacy being only the income of that £4,000. But in the affidavit of Mr. Crawfurd, after stating the will, he says: "She intended to leave me a sum of £4,000, the income of which I was to apply during my life." Then he goes on to say: "I was to dispose of the principal after my death as my own private property." It seems to me that the effect of that statement is plainly to contradict the will of the testatrix. He substitutes for the £4,000, which was the subject-matter of the legacy, the income of that sum. And therefore, when I find in the judgment of Farwell, J., 50 W. R. 185, [1902] 1 Ch. 214, at p. 216, these words, "I do not see that there is any contradiction of the will in saying that 'the charitable purposes agreed upon' exhausted the whole income of the fund, but lasted only for a limited time, and did not go on for ever," I cannot agree with that statement. It seems to me that it does contradict the words of the will in which the subject-matter of the legacy for this purpose is the £4,000, and not the income of the £4,000.

(a.) Reported by H. W. LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Now, a good deal has been said about the question of whether there is a general charitable purpose here. I do not propose to say anything upon that subject at all, and for this reason: It seems to me that in this will, supplemented by so much of the evidence of Mr. Crawfurd as defines the object, you have plainly a limited charitable purpose defined, and that that charitable purpose so defined, in the absence of anything in the will to the contrary, is one which would go on for ever. If there was a difficulty as to how the money was to be applied, or anything else of that sort, I take it that there is amply sufficient definition here of the charitable purpose agreed upon to enable the court to direct that that purpose should be carried out, notwithstanding any deficiences there might be in the statement of the mode of application.

I think, therefore, that the decision of Farwell, J. must be reversed, and I think that there ought to be an order for a scheme here, not limited to the income of the fund, but dealing with the whole.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and really I have nothing to add. In fact I should say nothing were it not for the most unfeigned respect I feel for any judgment of Farwell, J., from whom on this occasion I am constrained to differ. Now, if there is anything which is plain on the face of this will it appears to me to be this, that the subject-matter of this legacy was £4,000 and not any limited interest in £4,000. The whole sum of £4,000 was to be devoted to the charitable purposes referred to, whatever they might be. In the face of that Farwell, J., has made an order by which he has held that what is applicable for charitable purposes is only the income of the fund during the lifetime of Mr. Crawfurd. I confess I am unable to see how that is consistent with the will. The question arises in this way: Mr. Crawfurd has made an affidavit to the admission of which I understand the Attorney-General makes no objection. Mr. Crawfurd says that conversations took place between the testatrix and himself with reference to the legacy of £4,000 which the testatrix said that she meant to leave him; and that he was to apply the income of that £4,000 during his own life for certain charitable purposes which he names, and at his death he was to be at liberty to dispose of it as his own private property. I am of opinion that that affidavit is only admissible for the purpose of ascertaining what the charitable purposes were which are referred to in the will, and no further. The fact that those charitable purposes were only to continue during the lifetime of Mr. Crawfurd, and that on his death the fund was to cease to be a charitable fund, is entirely irrelevant for the purpose for which this evidence is admissible. If the affidavit, for instance, had said that a conversation had taken place with reference to £2,000, and by her will the testatrix had left £4,000 for charitable purposes, it never could be contended, as it seems to me, that the legacy was to be cut down, and that the charities were only to have £2,000, because the conversation related to £2,000, whereas by her will she expressly said that £4,000 was to be applied to charity. It seems to me, in like manner, that as the will says that the capital sum of £4,000 was to be applied to charitable purposes, it is not competent for the court to look at this evidence for the purpose of cutting down the charitable interest to the income of £4,000 during the life of the legatee. For those reasons I entirely agree with what has been said by my lord, and I think that this appeal ought to be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. It seems to me that the will fixes absolutely the subject-matter of the gift—viz., £4,000, and that Mr. Crawfurd's affidavit may be referred to for one purpose only—i.e., to ascertain what are the charitable purposes. Looking at that affidavit, those charitable purposes are perfectly clearly defined. I think, therefore, that the order of Farwell, J., must be reversed so far as it is complained of. There must be a declaration that the corpus and income of the £4,000 are held upon the charitable trusts mentioned in the affidavit of Mr. Crawfurd. And a scheme can be settled in chambers.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellant, Solicitor to the Treasury.

Solicitors for the respondents, H. S. Clutton & Johnson; Walters, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton; Bridges, Sawtell, & Co.

---

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Nov. 6.
Byrne, J. }

In re PYNE.
LILLEY v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL. (a.)

Charity—Disposition—Trustees—Scheme by court or sign-manual.

Where a testator gives property to trustees on general charitable trusts, but indicates no definite objects, the proper mode of carrying out the objects of the testator is by a scheme of court and not by sign-manual.

This was a summons to determine whether the trusts of a gift of the ultimate residue of a testatrix's estate (which the court had previously held to be a good trust for charitable purposes) should be carried out by a scheme under the court or by the king's sign-manual.

The facts of the case were as follows:

By her will, bearing date the 9th of September, 1897, Sarah E. Pyne appointed the plaintiffs executors and trustees thereof, and after certain specific devises and bequests, gave the residue of her freehold estates and all her leasehold estates (if any) and the residue of her personal estate to her trustees upon trust for sale and conversion, and directed that after payment of debts and funeral and testamentary expenses the said trustees should stand possessed of the "residue or surplus thereof in trust for such charitable purposes and in such shares and proportions as may be hereafter set forth in any codicil or codicils to this my will." Testatrix died on the 4th of May, 1899, and the will was duly proved.

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Methold, for the plaintiffs.—It is the usual practice in these cases to direct a scheme: Moggridge v. Thackwell, 7 Ves. 36; Paice v. The Archbishop of Canterbury, 14 Ves. 364; In re White, 41 W. R. 683, [1893] 2 Ch. 41.

R. J. Parker, for the Attorney-General.—Moggridge v. Thackwell is not clear, and the older cases are conflicting. It is desirable that the rights of the Crown as to directing a scheme by sign-manual, and of the court to direct a scheme should be determined.

[BYRNE, J., referred to In re Davis, 50 W. R. 378, [1902] 1 Ch. 876.]

BYRNE, J. (after stating the facts).—The leading case on the subject is Moggridge v. Thackwell. There a testatrix gave "all the rest and residue of my personal estate unto James Vaston, of Clapton, of Middlesex, gentleman, his executors and administrators, desiring him to dispose of the same in such charities as he shall think fit, recommending poor clergymen who have large families and good character; and I appoint the said John Moggridge and Mr. Vaston before-mentioned executor of this my will; and I desire Robert Woodford, of Taplow, Bucks, Esq., and the aforesaid Richard Wicherley to aid and assist my executors." A decree was made by Lord Thurlow that the residue of the testatrix's personal estate passed by her will and ought to go and be applied in charity, regard being had to clergymen with good characters and large families, according to the recommendation in the will; and that the master should approve of a scheme to effect the purposes of the said charity, with liberty for the parties to lay a scheme before him for that purpose. The case was brought before Lord Rosslyn for directions on the master's report, and ultimately before Lord Eldon, who considered the question by what means the general charitable intention was to be carried into effect. After referring to cases on the question of the construction of the will, Lord Eldon says: "These cases call upon me to say that the general intention of the testatrix, who seems to have been saturated and satiated with the idea of charity, and yet not to have had mind enough herself to determine upon the particular objects, was to devote her property to charity; and according to these precedents Vaston was only the means and instrument by which that general intention was to be executed; and therefore this court will carry this general intention into effect." He goes on: "The next question, by what means that is to be done, is a most difficult question; for it being established that when money is given to charity generally or indefinitely without trustees or objects selected, the king as parens patriæ is the constitutional trustee, it is very difficult to raise a solid distinction between an original gift absolutely indefinite and without qualification and a case in which by matter ex post facto the gift stands before the court in consequence of that accident, as if it had originally been given indefinitely, without any means for carrying it into execution prescribed. All I can say upon it is, I do not know what doctrine could be laid down that would not be met by some authority upon this point; whether the proposition is that the Crown is to dispose of it, or the master by a scheme." Then, after referring to authorities, he concludes: "Therefore I rather think the decree is right. I have conversed with many persons upon it. I have great difficulty in my own mind, and have found great difficulty in the mind of every person I have consulted, but the general principle thought most reconcilable to the cases is, that when there is a general indefinite purpose not fixing itself upon any object, as this in a degree does, the disposition is in the king by sign-manual; but where the execution is to be by a trustee with general or some objects pointed out, then the court will take the administration of the trust." In Paice v. The Archbishop of Canterbury executors were appointed and the gift was "All the remainder of my different bequests I give and bequeath to the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Archbishop of York for the time being in trust for charitable purposes, and anything not specified I commit to the discretion of my executors." That is to my mind very similar to the gift in the present case, for I read it as equivalent to a gift for general charitable purposes. In giving judgment the Lord Chancellor (Lord Eldon) says: "Therefore, after the donation to be made by the executors to the poor, the extent of which is almost unlimited, the general residue is to go to charitable purposes, and must be the subject of a scheme before the master. Where the bequest is to trustees for charitable purposes, the disposition must be in that mode; but where the object is a charity without a trust interposed, it must be by sign-manual. That is the distinction which I adopted in the case of Moggridge v. Thackwell." So Lord Eldon explains any difficulty which might have arisen as to what it was he decided in Moggridge v. Thackwell. I think the present is a case in which a scheme ought to be directed.

Solicitors, Alfred Jonas; Solicitor for the Crown.

---

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } Dec. 4.

In re SMYTHIES.
WEYMAN v. SMYTHIES. (a.)

Will—Legacy—Ademption—Particular purpose.

A testator gave a legacy of £500 to his great-niece; by a subsequent settlement he settled a sum of £500 for her benefit.

Held, that the legacy was not adeemed.

Originating summons.

This was an originating summons to determine the question whether a legacy of £500 given by a codicil had been adeemed by a subsequent settlement by the testator of a sum of £500 in favour of the legatee.

The testator, George Smythies, by a codicil dated the 23rd of June, 1896, bequeathed a legacy to his great-niece as follows: "I give and bequeath to Mrs. Georgina Sophia Smythies the legacy or sum of £500 free of all estate or other duty, in trust for my great-niece, Eva Marion Smythies, for her own sole use and benefit, and I direct that such legacy shall be paid to the said Eva Marion Smythies either in whole or in part at such time or times and in such manner as the said Georgina Sophia Smythies may in her discretion think fit."

By a settlement dated the 24th of October, 1900, and made between the testator of the one part, and Georgina Sophia Smythies of the other part, it was provided that the said Georgina Sophia Smythies should retain a sum of £500 in trust to invest the same and to pay or apply the income arising therefrom to or towards the maintenance, education, and benefit of Eva Marion Smythies until she should attain the age of twenty-four years or marry under that age, and on her attaining that age or marrying to pay the principal to her.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The testator died on the 18th of December, 1900.

Clare, for the executors.

Hon. Frank Russell, for the residuary legatees.

Brinton, for the great-niece and her trustee.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, said: As the testator was not in loco parentis to his great-niece, the legacy is not adeemed unless it appears on the face of the codicil to have been given for a particular purpose. [His lordship referred to the cases of Pankhurst v. Howell, 19 W. R. 312, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 136, 138; and In re Pollock, 28 Ch. D. 552, at p. 556, 33 W. R. Dig. 242 ] A mere general legacy to A. for the benefit of B., an infant, is not given for a particular purpose within the rule. The legacy in question is not for a particular purpose. The legacy is therefore not adeemed.

Solicitors, Chester & Co; Hewlett, Birch-Reynardson, & Bucknill.

---

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) Nov. 3.

REX v. JUSTICES OF THE TEWKESBURY DIVISION OF GLOUCESTERSHIRE. (a.)

Poor law—Rating—Appeal to special sessions—Notice of appeal to parish council—Parochial Assessment Act, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96), s. 6—Local Government Act. 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 6, sub-section 1; s. 52, sub-section 5.

In all cases where an appeal is made under section 6 of the Parochial Assessment Act, 1836, to special sessions against a poor rate made in a rural parish having a parish council, it is, since the passing of the Local Government Act, 1894, a condition precedent that notice of appeal should have been given to the parish council.

Rule for a mandamus to justices of the Tewkesbury Division of Gloucestershire calling upon them to hold a special sessions and hear a rating appeal.

On the 17th of October, 1901, a poor rate was made and published by the overseers of the parish of Leigh, which is a rural parish having a parish council, wherein William Clifford was rated in respect of the Swan Inn.

Clifford gave notice of objection to the valuation list to the assessment committee, but they refused to give any relief in respect of the matter of the objection.

Clifford then caused notice of appeal to the special sessions against the rate to be served on the assessment committee and on the overseers of the parish.

On the 12th of June, 1902, the appeal came on for hearing, when counsel for the assessment committee, who appeared as respondents, objected that the justices had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal, on the ground that it was a condition precedent to the hearing of the appeal that the parish council should be served with notice of the appeal, which had not been done.

The justices upheld the objection and dismissed the appeal.

The appellant thereupon obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus.

C. F. Vachell shewed cause.—It is, since the passing of the Local Government Act, 1894, a condition precedent to the hearing of an appeal at special sessions against a poor rate made in a rural parish having a parish council that notice of the appeal should have been served by the appellant on the parish council. By section 6 of the Parochial Assessment Act, 1836, the justices are to hold four special sessions in the year for hearing appeals against rates, and at such sessions they are to hear and determine all objections to any rate, provided that "no such objection shall be inquired into by the said justices in special session unless notice of such objection in writing under the hand of the complainant shall have been given seven days at least before the day appointed for such special session to the collector, overseers, or other persons by whom such rate was made." Then by the Local Government Act, 1894, it was provided by section 6, sub-section 1, that upon the parish council of a rural parish coming into office there should be transferred to it "the powers, duties, and liabilities of the overseers, or of the churchwardens and overseers of the parish with respect to . . . (i.) appeals or objections by them in respect of the valuation list, or appeals in respect of the poor rate." Reg. v. De Grey, 48 W. R. 348, [1900] 1 Q. B. 521, is distinguishable from the present case, as in the former the appeal was not to special sessions but to quarter sessions: see 17 Geo. 2, c. 38, s. 4. In Reg. v. Justices of Kent, 80 L. T. Rep. 622, 47 W. R. Dig. 108, it was held that notice to the parish council was necessary.

He also cited Reg. v. The Justices of Surrey, 29 W. R. 260, 6 Q. B. D. 100, and Reg v. The Justices of Salop and Wood, 12 Times L. R. 526.

Brook Little, in support of the rule.—The fact that an appellant has under section 6 of the Act of 1836 to give notice of appeal to the overseers does not constitute that obligation a power, duty, or liability of the overseers. Section 6 of the Act of 1894, therefore, does not substitute the parish council for the overseers as the persons on whom notice of appeal should be served. The expression "parish council" must not be read into section 6 of the Act of 1836 in place of the words "collector, overseers, or other persons by whom the rate is made." To do so would involve an absurdity, as the overseers still have to make a rate; the parish council have no power to do so. The Legislature never intended such a thing. "Overseers" can only be read as referring to the parish council where some "liability" of the overseers has been transferred to the parish council.

He referred to Reg. v. Trafford, 15 Q. B. 200, and Reg. v. Eyre, 5 W. R. 55, 6 E. & B. 992.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case a rule for a mandamus was obtained calling upon the justices to hold a special session and hear a rating appeal. The principal question we have to consider is whether it is necessary that notice of appeal should have been given to the parish council.

Counsel in support of the rule contended, firstly, that even if the Local Government Act, 1894, had not been passed, the justices in session would still have been bound to hear and adjourn the appeal, because the provision in section 4 of the Poor Relief Act, 1743 (17 Geo. 2, c. 38), as to adjourning where reasonable notice has not been given must be taken to have been imported into the Parochial Assessment Act, 1836. In my opinion the Act of 1836 was intended to give a special remedy with special limitations. The language of the proviso is distinct. The justices are to hold four special sessions in the year for the hearing of appeals and objections to rates, "Provided always, that no such objection shall be inquired into by the said justices . . . unless notice of such objection in writing under the hand of the complainant shall have been given seven days at least before the day appointed for such special session," to the overseers. It is too late now to suggest that, although the justices are not to inquire into such an objection, they are bound to enter and adjourn the appeal.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Secondly, it was contended that even if notice to the overseers was necessary before the Act of 1894, it need not now be given to the parish council. Section 6, sub-section 1 (c), of the Act of 1894 provides that upon a parish council coming into office there shall be transferred to it "The powers, duties, and liabilities of the overseers . . . of the parish with respect to (i.) appeals or objections by them in respect of the valuation list, or appeals in respect of the poor rate, or county rate, or the basis of the county rate." It is difficult to see why these words do not include, with respect to appeals and objections, the duty of the overseers to maintain the correctness of the rate. There may no doubt be duties which are not transferred, but in my opinion this particular duty was so transferred. I think that it was intended by that section that the parish council should have a voice in saying whether an appeal should be resisted. Then, by section 52, sub-section 5, it is provided that "All enactments in any Act, whether general or local and personal, relating to any powers, duties, or liabilities transferred by this Act to a parish council . . . from justices, or the vestry, or overseers, or churchwardens and overseers," are to be construed as if any reference therein to justices or to the vestry, or to the overseers, or to the churchwardens and overseers referred to the parish council. It seems to me to be obvious, from the general words here used that they are meant to apply in all cases where it can reasonably be said that the duties transferred are duties in which the parish council are interested. If the duty of maintaining the correctness of the rates is one of the duties transferred, it is clear that it is one which relates to the powers of the parish council. I think that under the provisions of section 6 of the Act of 1836, and of section 6 of the Act of 1894, notice should have been given to the parish council. This rule must therefore be discharged.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion.

CHANNELL, J.—I also agree.

Rule discharged.

Solicitors for the justices, Badham & Comins, for Brookes & Badham, Tewkesbury.

Solicitors for the prosecutor, Peacock & Goddard, for Arthur Lamb, Cheltenham.

---

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) — Nov. 3.

TROMANS (Appellant) v. HODKINSON (Respondent). (a.)

Gaming—Betting—Place used for betting—Bar of public-house—Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), s. 3.

A bookmaker was in the habit of frequenting the bar of a licensed house at certain hours for the purpose of there carrying on a ready-money betting business with persons who resorted thereto, and who knew that he carried on such business there. The carrying on of this business was also known to the landlord, and pursued under some arrangement or understanding with him.

Held, that the bookmaker used the bar for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, contrary to the provisions of section 3 of the Betting Act, 1853.

Belton v. Busby, 47 W. R. 636, [1899] 2 Q. B. 380, approved and followed.

Case stated.

At a petty sessions held at Old Hill, in the county of Stafford, two informations were preferred against the appellant by the respondent Hodkinson (inspector of police) that the appellant on the 26th and 31st days of March, 1902, at Cradley Heath, in the county of Stafford, being a person using the Railway Inn, Cradley Heath, did unlawfully use the same for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, contrary to section 3 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119 (the Betting Act, 1853).

At the same court four informations were also preferred by the respondent that one Thomas Insull, on the 26th and 31st of March and on the 1st and 5th of April, 1902, did at the Railway Inn commit offences against section 3 of the same Act similar to the offences preferred against the appellant, and four informations were also preferred at the same court by the respondent against one Thomas Scriven for permitting the Railway Inn to be opened, kept, and used for the purpose of betting on certain events and contingencies of and relating to certain horse-racing, contrary to section 3 of the same Act.

These informations against the appellant and Scriven and Insull were (at the request of the defendants) heard together in the month of April, 1902, when the justices convicted each of the defendants, and fined the appellant £200 and costs, Scriven £100 and costs, and Insull £25 and costs.

Upon the hearing of the informations the following facts were proved or admitted.

Thomas Scriven was occupier and proprietor of the Railway Inn, a fully-licensed house, in which among other rooms was a room known as the bar or taproom, to which customers of the hotel as such had access, and Scriven was the person licensed in respect thereof. The appellant was a ready-money professional bookmaker, and Insull was a clerk employed by the appellant in his said business.

The appellant was on the 26th of March, 1902, from about the hour of 1 p.m. until about 2.30 p.m., at the Railway Inn, and his clerk Insull was also there. The appellant was for part only of such time present in the bar or taproom of the hotel, but his clerk Insull was there present during the whole of such time. The appellant and Insull went to the bar or taproom for the purpose of making, and each of them there made ready-money bets with persons resorting thereto, and Insull in so acting was acting for and on behalf of the appellant, the payments—being winnings on bets made on some former occasions—were then made by the appellant to applicants in the bar or taproom of the inn after referring to a certain book in his possession.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appellant and Insull were on the 31st of March, from about 1.30 p.m. to 2 p.m., in the bar or taproom. Each of them went to the bar or taproom for the purpose of making ready-money bets with persons resorting thereto. Ready-money bets were there made by Insull, and payment being winnings on a bet made on the preceding day with Insull was there made by the appellant, and such bets and payments were made by Insull acting for and on behalf of the appellant.

The appellant was in the habit of frequenting the inn for the purpose of there carrying on, and he carried on in the bar or taproom thereof at stated hours, a ready-money betting business with persons resorting thereto, the carrying on of which in the bar or taproom was known to such persons, and was known to and pursued under some arrangement or understanding come to with Thomas Scriven, the landlord.

At the hearing before the justices no evidence was given that the appellant when at the inn obtained refreshments or used the house for that purpose or was a customer thereof, nor did it appear that the appellant had any interest in the Railway Inn or the business of the inn, or that he had any control over or took any part of the management of the inn, or that in the betting business carried on in the bar or taproom he occupied any specific part of the bar or taproom.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that he could not be convicted on the grounds that the bar or taproom was not a "place" within the meaning of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, and that the use of the bar or taproom by the appellant was not a user by him thereof for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto within the meaning of that Act.

The following cases were called to the attention of the justices: Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co., 47 W. R. 585, [1899] A. C. 143; Belton v. Busby, 47 W. R. 636, [1899] 2 Q. B. 380.

The justices, acting on the authority of Belton v. Busby, were of opinion and held that such bar was a "place," and that the appellant's actions amounted to a user of the same for the purpose of betting, contrary to the provisions of section 3 of that Act, and they convicted the appellant. From this decision the appellant now appealed.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the justices, upon the above statement of facts, came to a correct decision in point of law.

G. H. Stutfield, for the appellant.—The decision of the justices was wrong. They did not find that the appellant had any control of, or that he was owner or occupier of the bar or part of the bar or of the place so as to bring him within the meaning of the Act. The person "using the same" means a person who is in control and occupation of the place using the same. In the present case the appellant was neither owner nor occupier, nor was he a person in control and occupation of this bar or taproom, and not being so, he cannot be convicted as a person using the same: vide judgment of Lord Halsbury, L.C., in Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co. Standing by while the betting is taking place does not bring a person within the Act so as to make him a "person using the place" within the meaning of the Act. The appellant was present merely as an ordinary customer. In the case of Belton v. Busby there was much stronger evidence of a contract and of a user than in the present case. In that case the defendant had the permission of the landlord to use the bar for his betting business. In the present case the appellant ought not to be convicted as there is no evidence that he was in any way in possession, occupation, or control of the place.

W. Shakespeare, for the respondent, was not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case, counsel for the appellant was not in a position to dispute that the bar of this public-house was a "place" within the meaning of the Act, but he contended that because the appellant had not been proved to have had a distinct license from the landlord of the house, he, therefore, had no interest in the house, and ought not to be convicted. It seems to me, however, that apart from the decision in the case of Belton v. Busby the facts found by the magistrates in the present case bring it within the rule laid down by this court, that if it is found that a person is using a place within the meaning of the Act for the purpose of carrying on his betting business, then the case does not come within the rule laid down in the case of Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co. In the present case the magistrates have found that the appellant was in the habit of frequenting the inn for the purpose of there carrying on, and that he did carry on, in the bar or taproom thereof, a ready-money betting business with persons who resorted thereto for such purpose, and that the carrying on of such business was known to and pursued under some arrangement with the landlord. In my opinion such statement of facts conclusively shows that a breach of the statute took place. The decision in Belton v. Busby was upon similar facts to those in the present case, and is an authority to show that this ruling is a proper one upon such facts. I therefore think that the conviction in this case was right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I also think that the decision in the case of Belton v. Busby was right. The mere fact that the appellant in this case did not take any refreshment does not seem to me to be a cardinal fact.

CHANNELL, J.—I also am of the same opinion. The facts found in this case clearly show that this place was used by the appellant as if it were a betting office, which, according to the test laid down in the case of Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co., is sufficient to bring the case within the Act.

Conviction affirmed and appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for appellant, Judge & Priestley, for Philip Baker & Co., Birmingham.

Solicitors for respondent, Wainwright & Co, for J. W. Clulow, Brierley Hill.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

K. B. Div. (Wright, J.) Dec. 3.

In re SALMON.
Ex parte THE TRUSTEE.

Bankruptcy—Mortgage reserving right of consolidation—Subsequent mortgages of same property—Third mortgage including other property—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 17.

The provisions of section 17 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, enabling a mortgagor to redeem one mortgage without redeeming other mortgages made by him, only applies where there are several mortgages on different properties of the same mortgagor.

Where a first mortgage contains a proviso excluding the operation of section 17, that proviso is to be applied to subsequent mortgages by the same mortgagor, though they may not contain similar provisions.

Motion by the trustee in the bankruptcy of R. H. Salmon for a declaration that he was entitled to redeem the property comprised in a mortgage dated the 23rd of February, 1901, without redeeming two other mortgages dated the 9th of May, 1883, and the 19th of March, 1900.

On the 9th of May, 1883, the bankrupt executed a first mortgage of a freehold house, which contained a proviso that the mortgagor or any person taking title under him should not, "in respect of the redemption of the mortgage hereby created, have or be entitled to any of the powers expressed to be conferred on a mortgagor by section 17 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881."

On the 19th of March, 1900, the bankrupt executed a second mortgage of the same premises to the respondents to the present application; and on the 23rd of February, 1901, he executed another mortgage on the same house, an annuity, and a policy of insurance on his life to a third party. Neither the second or third mortgages contained any proviso excluding the operation of section 17 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

A receiving order was made against Salmon on the 24th of July, 1901, and he was subsequently adjudicated bankrupt.

By two indentures, dated respectively the 11th and 18th of August, 1902, the first and third mortgages were transferred to the respondents, the second mortgagees.

The trustee in the bankruptcy now claimed to redeem the third mortgage without redeeming the first and second.

Hansell, for the trustee.—By section 17 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, a mortgagor seeking to redeem any one mortgage is entitled to do so "without paying any money due under any separate mortgage made by him or by any person through whom he claims, on property other than that comprised in the mortgage which he seeks to redeem." In the present case that section is only excluded by the proviso in the first mortgage, which must be limited to the property comprised in that mortgage, and cannot extend to the other mortgages, which comprise other property.

He cited Farmer v. Pitt, 50 W. R. 453, [1902] 1 Ch. 954.

Clauson, for the respondents.—Section 17 has no application to the present case; it is limited to cases where there are several mortgages on differen properties of the same mortgagor. Further, the proviso in the first mortgage expressly excludes the operation of that section.

He cited Pledge v. White, 44 W. R. 453, [1896] A. C. 187.

Hansell replied.

WRIGHT, J.—It seems to me that section 17 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, does not apply to a case like this, but only to cases where there are several mortgages, each on different properties of the same mortgagor. I think the language of the section indicates that intention, and it seems to me that that view is borne out by sections 1 and 2. Moreover, in this case the first mortgage contains a clause which reserves the right of consolidation, an express contract excluding the operation of section 17. It has been argued that that clause should be limited to the property comprised in the first mortgage, but, in my view, if that contract were to be confined to the first mortgage it would have no effect at all, because it is impossible to give any effect to it until other mortgages come into existence to which it can be applied. In my judgment there is nothing here to exclude either the second or the third mortgage from the operation of the proviso in the first, and the respondents, therefore, by virtue of that contract, have expressly reserved to them the right to consolidate all three mortgages. It must follow, then, that the trustee cannot redeem the third mortgage without redeeming the first and second as well.

Application dismissed. The order dismissing the application was, by consent of the trustee, drawn up in the common form of a foreclosure judgment.

Solicitors for the trustee, Simpson & Cullingford.

Solicitors for the respondent, Collyer-Bristow & Co.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Privy Council.

(From the Supreme Court of Canada.)

Nov. 13.

THE IMPERIAL BANK OF CANADA v. THE BANK OF HAMILTON. (a.)

Banker—Cheque—Certification—Fraudulent alteration of amount—Negligence—Notice to bank giving credit—Mistake of facts—Actual knowledge.

A cheque for a specified sum drawn upon the Bank of H. was certified by that bank, but was afterwards fraudulently altered by the drawer to a larger amount than that for which originally drawn and certified, and was paid by him into his account at another bank, which gave him credit for the larger amount and passed the cheque so altered through the clearing house in the usual way, and obtained payment thereof from the Bank of H. The Bank of H. were not actually aware of the fraud at the time of payment, but ascertained it from their books next day, when they required repayment of the increase from the other bank.

Held, that as the money was honestly paid by the Bank of H. under a mistake of facts, it could be recovered back, there being no negligence or want of notice to prejudice this right.

Appeal from the Supreme Court of Canada.

The facts are given in their lordships' judgment.

Blake, K.C., and Bucknill, K.C. (both of Colonial bar), for the appellants.

Sir R. Reid, K.C., and Douglas, K.C. (of Colonial bar), for the respondents.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords MACNAGHTEN, ROBERTSON, and LINDLEY, and Sir ARTHUR WILSON) was delivered by Lord LINDLEY.—The question raised by this appeal is whether the Bank of Hamilton is entitled to recover from the Imperial Bank of Canada a sum of 495 dollars paid to it in respect of a cheque under the following circumstances:

One Bauer was a customer of the Bank of Hamilton, and he drew a cheque upon that bank for five dollars. The word five was written and a considerable space was left between that word and the next words printed on the cheque. The cheque was dated the 25th of January, 1897, and on that day Bauer took it to the Bank of Hamilton and got it marked or certified with the bank's stamp; he then took it away with him. The effect of this marking or certifying was examined and explained by this Board in Gaden v. Newfoundland Savings Bank, [1899] A. C. 281, at p. 285, 47 W. R. Dig. 9. The effect was to give the cheque additional currency by showing on its face that it was drawn in good faith on funds sufficient to meet its payment, and by adding to the credit of Bauer who drew it the credit of the Bank of Hamilton on which it was drawn. The cheque was a good cheque for five dollars, and if it had not been altered the Bank of Hamilton would have paid it as a matter of course and no difficulty would have arisen. But after Bauer had got it marked, he wrote in the word "hundred" after the word five. The cheque then appeared to be a certified cheque for 500 dollars. There can be no doubt that the condition of the cheque when certified afforded opportunity for this fraudulent alteration; and if the principle laid down in Young v. Grote, 4 Bing. 253, could still be acted upon, the Bank of Hamilton would as between themselves and an innocent holder for value be estopped from denying that the cheque was a certified cheque for 500 dollars. But after the decision of the House of Lords in Scholfield v. Earl of Londesborough, 45 W. R. 124, [1896] A. C. 514, it was hopeless to contend that by the law of England the Bank of Hamilton was not at liberty to prove that the cheque had been fraudulently altered after it had been certified by the bank. Whether the French law which prevails in Lower Canada is the same in this respect as the law of this country and of Ontario has not to be determined, for the French law has no application to this case.

Bauer took the cheque as altered to the Imperial Bank of Canada and opened an account with it. The cheque was placed to his credit; he forthwith drew cheques upon the account so opened and those cheques were honoured in the usual course of business. The cheque in question was passed by the Imperial Bank of Canada through the clearing house at Toronto and was paid by the Bank of Hamilton on the morning of the 27th of January, 1897, the fraud not having been then discovered.

It is proved by the evidence that certified cheques apparently in order and presented through the clearing house are paid as a matter of course, and that it is not usual with bankers to turn to their customers' accounts on the day marked cheques are presented for payment through the clearing house to see whether there is anything wrong before paying them. It is, however, usual to check the returns with the customer's accounts the next day, and then to enter the cheques paid the day before. In conformity with this practice the Bank of Hamilton paid the cheque on the 27th of January without looking at Bauer's account in their ledger; but on the next day—i.e., the 28th of January—they turned to it, and at once discovered the fraud. The Bank of Hamilton immediately gave notice to the Imperial Bank of Canada, and demanded repayment of 495 dollars, being the amount paid by the Bank of Hamilton in respect of the cheque less the five dollars for which it was drawn and certified. This demand not having been complied with, the present action was brought by the Bank of Hamilton to recover the 495 dollars. The action was defended on three grounds—viz., 1st, because the Bank of Hamilton was negligent in marking the cheque with the blank in it; 2nd, because the Bank of Hamilton was negligent in paying the forged cheque without first turning to Bauer's account; 3rd, because notice was not given to the Imperial Bank of Canada on the 27th of January, the day on which the cheque was paid.

The action was tried by McMahon, J., without a jury, and he gave judgment for the plaintiffs—i.e., the Bank of Hamilton. From this judgment the Imperial Bank of Canada appealed, and the Court of Appeal affirmed the judgment of McMahon, J., but Armour, C.J., dissented. From this decision the Imperial Bank of Canada again appealed to the Supreme Court, which again affirmed the decision appealed from, Gwynne, J., however, dissenting. The present appeal is from their decision.

The learned counsel for the appellants did not seriously rely upon the first of the three grounds of defence, feeling it to be untenable after the decision in Scholfield v. Earl of Londesborough, to which reference has already been made. They relied on the second and third grounds, on which alone there was any difference of opinion in the courts below.

As regards negligence in paying the cheque: It cannot be denied that when the Bank of Hamilton paid the cheque on the 27th of January it had the means of ascertaining from its own books that the cheque had been altered. But means of knowledge and actual knowledge are not the same; and it was long ago decided in Kelly v. Solari, 9 M. & W. 54, that money honestly paid by mistake of facts could be recovered back, although the person paying it did not avail himself of means of knowledge which he possessed. This decision has always been acted upon since, and their lordships consider it applicable to the present case. There was nothing on the face of the cheque to excite suspicion, nor to lead the clerk who cashed the cheque to take the unusual course of referring to Bauer's ledger account to see if all was right before cashing it. Moreover even if negligence in this respect could be imputed to the Bank of Hamilton, such negligence did not induce the Imperial Bank of Canada to treat the cheque as good and to give Bauer credit for its amount. That has been done already. These were the reasons which induced the courts below to decide against the second ground of defence, and their lordships have no hesitation in coming to the same conclusion.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

There remains the third ground, which is based upon a supposed hard and fast rule referred to by Armour, C.J., who said: "In my opinion this case is governed by the rule laid down in Cocks v. Masterman, 9 B. & C. 902, where it is said 'But we are all of opinion that the holder of a bill is entitled to know on the day when it becomes due whether it is an honoured or dishonoured bill, and that if he receives the money and is suffered to retain it during the whole of that day the parties who paid it cannot recover it back.' This rule, rigorous though it may be, has been adhered to in England ever since: see Mather v. Lord Maidstone, 18 C. B. 273, 4 W. R. C. L. Dig. 144; Durrant v. Ecclesiastical Commissioners, 29 W. R. 443, 6 Q. B. D. 234; Leeds Bank v. Walker, 11 Q. B. D. 84, 31 W. R. Dig. 8; London and River Plate Bank v. Liverpool Bank, [1896] 1 Q. B. 7, 44 W. R. Dig. 20; Byles on Bills (16th ed.), 353. The application of this rule does not at all depend upon whether the holder of the bill is or is not in fact prejudiced by the delay, for the conclusion in law is that he may be prejudiced, and this is the reason of the rule. In this case the defendants, the holders in due course of the cheque, presented it to the plaintiffs on the 27th of January through the clearing house, and it being due on presentation, the defendants were entitled to know on that day whether it was honoured or dishonoured. The plaintiffs paid the cheque through the clearing house on that day, but this payment was, in my opinion, conditional upon their right to dishonour the cheque during that day, but not having dishonoured the cheque during that day such payment became absolute, and the defendants having received the money for the cheque from the plaintiffs, and being suffered to retain it during the whole of that day, the plaintiffs cannot recover it back."

The prejudice which it is suggested that the Imperial Bank of Canada may have suffered from want of notice of dishonour on the 27th of January consists in their inability to take proceedings on that day against Bauer for the fraud which he had committed. But no one suggests that Bauer could have paid anything if he had then been proceeded against. The bank was not deprived of any of its rights against him, nor was its position altered by reason of notice of the forgery not being given until the day after the bill was paid. But quite apart from the fact that the appellants were not in any way prejudiced by want of notice on the day of payment, it appears to their lordships that the stringent rule referred to in the foregoing extract from the judgment of Armour, C.J., does not really apply to this case. The cheque as drawn and certified—i.e., for five dollars—was never dishonoured, and no question arises as to that. The cheque for the larger amount was a simple forgery; and Bauer, the drawer and forger, was not entitled to any notice of its dishonour by non-payment. There were no indorsers to whom notice of dishonour had to be given. The law as to the necessity of giving notice of dishonour has therefore no application. The rule laid down in Cocks v. Masterman, and recently re-asserted in even wider language by Mathew, J., in the London and River Plate Bank v. Bank of Liverpool has reference to negotiable instruments on the dishonour of which notice has to be given to some one—viz., to some drawer or indorser who would be discharged from liability unless such notice were given in proper time. Their lordships are not aware of any authority for applying so stringent a rule to any other cases. Assuming it to be as stringent as is alleged in such cases as those above described, their lordships are not prepared to extend it to other cases where notice of the mistake is given in reasonable time and no loss has been occasioned by the delay in giving it.

Their lordships, therefore, will humbly advise His Majesty to dismiss this appeal and the appellants must pay the costs.

Solicitors, S. V. Blake; Harrison & Powell.

---

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Nov. 11.

MOREL BROTHERS & CO. v. EARL OF WESTMORLAND. (a.)

Married woman—Authority of wife to pledge husband's credit—Necessaries—Action against husband and wife jointly, severally, and in the alternative—Presumption of agency—Presumption of authority to pledge joint credit—Judgment against wife—Right to proceed against husband—Election—Practice—Ord. 14, r. 5.

A husband, by arrangement with his wife, made an annual allowance of a substantial sum for the expenses of their household. Tradesmen who supplied goods for the use of the household on the orders of the wife sued the husband and wife for the price, claiming against them jointly. The plaintiffs obtained judgment against the wife under order 14 and proceeded with the action against the husband.

Held, that the ordinary presumption that a wife has authority to pledge her husband's credit for necessaries was rebutted.

Held, also, that, even if any such presumption could be made, at any rate the presumption that the wife had authority to pledge the joint credit of her husband and herself could not be made.

Held, also, that, if the plaintiffs' claim could be amended by adding a claim against the defendants severally or in the alternative, the plaintiffs, having obtained judgment on their several claim against the wife, were debarred from setting up an inconsistent claim against the husband.

The special provision contained in ord. 14, r. 5, that a plaintiff who has obtained judgment under that order against one of two defendants may proceed with the action against the other, does not apply where the plaintiff claims against the defendants in the alternative.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Application by the defendant, the Earl of Westmorland, for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Phillimore, J., with a jury.

The plaintiffs, who were wine merchants and provision dealers, brought the action against the Earl and Countess of Westmorland jointly to recover £455, balance of an account for goods sold and delivered between May, 1897, and September, 1901, on the orders of the Countess of Westmorland.

On an application under order 14 leave was given to the plaintiffs to sign judgment against Lady Westmorland. Judgment was signed accordingly, but was not satisfied.

The earl's defence, so far as material, was that no one had authority to pledge his credit for the goods; and that by suing the countess to judgment the plaintiffs had made their election and were not entitled to recover from him.

All the goods were in fact ordered by Lady Westmorland, and nearly all of them were delivered at Apethorpe Hall, Northamptonshire, where the defendants resided. During the whole of the period in question the defendants were living together as man and wife. In July, 1899, Lord Westmorland, finding that the expenditure of his household was extravagant, determined to limit it, and at the same time to make his wife a regular allowance for that purpose. His net income amounted to £2,500 a year, and Lady Westmorland had an income of her own of £400 a year. He accordingly agreed to allow his wife £2,000 a year for household expenses, and told her that if she incurred further expenses he would not be liable and would not pay them. In pursuance of this arrangement the annual sum of £2,000 was regularly paid into a banking account, and Lord and Lady Westmorland had power to draw on that account for household expenses only. This arrangement was not communicated to the plaintiffs.

At the trial certain questions were left by the learned judge to the jury, which, with their answers, were as follows:

1. Was the earl liable for goods supplied prior to July, 1899?—Yes.

2. As to goods supplied since that date—(a) Were they necessaries?—Yes; (b) Did the earl give his wife a sufficient allowance for household expenses?—Yes; (c) Did the earl prohibit his wife from incurring any household expenditure except out of the agreed allowance?—Yes; (d) Did the countess in ordering from the plaintiffs act as agent for the earl jointly with herself, or for the earl only, or for herself only?—For the earl and herself jointly; (e) To whom did the plaintiffs give credit?—To the earl in the name of the countess.

3. Is the earl liable for goods sent to the countess elsewhere than to Apethorpe?—No.

On further consideration Phillimore, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs against Lord Westmorland for the price of the goods supplied both before and after July, 1899.

Lord Westmorland applied for judgment or a new trial.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and G. A. Bonner, for the defendant, Lord Westmorland.

Macaskie, K.C., and Montague Shearman, for the plaintiffs.

The following cases were cited: Jolly v. Rees, 12 W. R. 473, 15 C. B. N. S. 628; Debenham v. Mellon, 29 W. R. 141, 6 App. Cas. 24; Kendall v. Hamilton, 28 W. R. 97, 4 App. Cas. 504; Scarf v. Jardine, 30 W. R. 893, 7 App. Cas. 345.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal by the defendant, Lord Westmorland, from a judgment of Phillimore, J., in favour of the plaintiffs. The action, as appears from the writ, was based on a claim on the joint liability of the earl and countess in respect of necessaries supplied by the plaintiffs on the orders of the countess. The claim is divided into two parts, one part being for the price of goods supplied up to July, 1899, the other for goods supplied after that time. The action having been started on the footing of joint liability, Lady Westmorland submitted to summary judgment being signed against her under order 14. We must now consider the case against Lord Westmorland on the footing upon which the plaintiffs have all along put their case—viz., on that of a joint liability of husband and wife. It is for the plaintiffs to establish such joint liability, and to give evidence of it. With regard to the first part of the claim, the evidence does not point at all in the direction of joint liability. Up to July, 1899, Lord Westmorland is not introduced into the discussion at all. It appears that husband and wife lived together in a common establishment, and that goods were supplied to that establishment by the plaintiffs on the orders of the wife. At most this is some evidence of authority by the husband to the wife to pledge his credit, but it is no evidence of authority to pledge their joint credit. The plaintiffs now insist that the answer of the jury to the first question must mean that the earl was liable for the goods supplied prior to July, 1899, jointly with the countess. But that will not avail them, for, in my opinion, with regard to the first part of the claim, there is no evidence of joint liability.

I now come to the second part of the claim—viz., the price of goods supplied after July, 1899. Here the earl comes into the discussion. The evidence of his solicitor and confidential adviser shows that in July, 1899, the earl was much distressed at the great expenditure incurred in the household, and he came to an arrangement whereby the countess was not to pledge his credit any longer, and a fund was to be provided for the household expenditure. He was to provide out of his income an allowance of £2,000 a year for necessaries to be supplied to the household, and the countess was to have her own income of £400 a year for her personal expenses. That arrangement, as it appears to me, negatived her right to pledge his credit at all. It substituted the allowance of £2,000 a year for any possible implied or primâ facie authority she might otherwise have to pledge his credit. I think that the fair interpretation of the findings of the jury on this part of the case is that they thought that such was the arrangement.

The existence of any actual authority being thus rebutted, is there any evidence of any ostensible authority in the wife to pledge the joint credit of herself and her husband? It seems to me that there was no evidence of a holding out of the wife as having authority to pledge their joint credit, neither was the question of any such holding out left to the jury. The case must be treated as one of joint liability or nothing, and in my opinion there is no evidence of joint liability, neither do I think that the jury found it.

If, however, by an amendment the case could be treated on the footing of there being an alternative claim for a several or alternative liability on the part of the two defendants, I do not think that this would carry the plaintiffs any further. They have signed judgment against the wife for the whole amount claimed; and for the purpose of this part of the case the claim against the wife must be treated as a claim against her severally as a principal. The plaintiffs having obtained judgment against her as a principal cannot now turn round and say that she was an agent for the purpose of imposing liability on her husband as principal.

The judgment obtained against the lady seems to me to be a bar to the plaintiffs setting up any inconsistent alternative. In my opinion this is a case of election, and the plaintiffs, having taken judgment against the lady on a several cause of action, are debarred from setting up an inconsistent alternative for the purpose of making her husband liable. The plaintiffs sought to make out that this bar was removed by ord. 14, r. 5, which enables a plaintiff who has obtained judgment under that order against one of two defendants to go on with the action against the other; but in my opinion that special rule does not apply to a case of alternative liability, and the plaintiffs, having exercised their election, are debarred from proceeding with an inconsistent claim. The plaintiffs' case having entirely failed, judgment must be entered for the defendant, Lord Westmorland.

ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

Application for judgment allowed.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, A. L. Rayner.

Solicitors for the defendant, Royds & Rawstorne.

---

From P. D. & Ad. Div. (Vaughan Williams and Mathew, L.JJ.) } August 11, 1902.

ASHCROFT v. ASHCROFT. (a.)

Divorce—Husband's petition—Permanent alimony for wife—State of wife's health and other circumstances—Discretion of court—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 32.

The court has an absolute discretion under section 32 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, as to ordering the husband to grant permanent alimony to his wife on a decree for dissolution of the marriage, and may suspend the making absolute of the decree until the husband makes provision for her if the wife is in ill-health and cannot support herself, even though she be the guilty party and his own conduct be irreproachable, and though he has derived no pecuniary benefit from the marriage and has obtained no damages from the co-respondent.

Robertson v. Robertson, 31 W. R. 652, 9 P. D. 94, discussed.

This was an appeal from an order of Barnes, J.

The facts were as follows: A husband obtained a decree nisi for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of adultery. No misconduct on his part was suggested. The wife afterwards made an application for permanent alimony. The parties had been married for over twenty years and had five children, the custody of the infants among whom, was given to the husband by the Divorce Court until further order. The wife had no means of subsistence or relatives of her own to support her and was in bad health; and the husband had only a business income of about £500 a year.

Barnes, J., held that the court had an absolute discretion as to the order to be made, and in view of the wife's health and the other circumstances refused to make the decree nisi absolute till the husband secured to the wife by deed £1 a week dum sola et casta vixerit.

The husband appealed, being granted leave to do so on the ground that the question was left open by Robertson v. Robertson, 31 W. R. 652, 8 P. D. 94.

Newson, for the appellant.—In no case has such an order been made for the benefit of a guilty wife unless the husband has also been guilty of misconduct or has benefited pecuniarly from the marriage or obtained damages from the co-respondent. The order here was not based on the conduct of the parties at all. The practice is correctly stated in the argument in Robertson v. Robertson.

He also cited Latham v. Latham, 9 W. R. 680, 30 L. J. P. & M. 43, 163; Winston v. Winston, 30 L. J. P. & M. 109, 9 W. R. Dig. 12; Bent v. Bent. 2 Sw. & Tr. 392, 9 W. R. Dig. 18; Keats v. Keats, 7 W. R. 377, 28 L. J. P. & M. 57; and Parry v. Parry, [1896] P. 37, 44 W. R. Dig. 52.

Barnard, for the wife, was not called on.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Under the terms of section 32 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, the court has an absolute discretion. The language of the section is quite plain. It enacts as follows: "The court may, if it shall think fit, on any such decree, order that the husband shall, to the satisfaction of the court, secure to the wife such gross sum of money, or such annual sum of money for any term not exceeding her own life, as, having regard to her fortune (if any), to the ability of the husband, and to the conduct of the parties, it shall deem reasonable." That being so, the objection that is made here to the order pronounced by the learned judge in the court below is really only based upon the practice of the court. It is said that that practice was correctly stated by Mr. Inderwick in his argument in the case of Robertson v. Robertson, 31 W. R. 652, 8 P. D. 94, at p. 95, thus: "The practice under the Divorce Act in this respect has not been similar to that of the House of Lords under the old law. Up to this time permanent alimony for a guilty wife has not been ordered except with the consent of the husband, or under special circumstances." Thereupon Jessel, M.R., says: "I am sorry to hear it. I am not giving a final opinion, but it appears to me that section 32 was intended to give the court discretion which was to be exercised according to the circumstances of each case, and that it was not intended that a guilty wife should be turned out in the streets to starve." Then, when the Master of the Rolls came to deliver his judgment, he says (at p. 96 of 8 P. D.): "Now, under the 32nd section the practice seems to have grown up of not allowing maintenance to the guilty wife unless a special case is shown. I am not prepared to say on the present occasion that this is the correct rule. I am not going to lay down that it is not. I should require further consideration and argument before doing so, but it appears to me that the 32nd section of the Act has left an absolute discretion in the court." Then he goes on to deal with the intention of the Legislature in passing the Act, and says he thinks the court ought to act on a rule similar to the old rule of the House of Lords, and at the end of that paragraph he says: "I am only stating my present impression that the court, under section 32, has full discretion, and is under no obligation to require special circumstances to be shown to entitle the guilty wife to some provision." Then he goes on to deal with the particular case then before the court, and he deals with it so that it was not necessary to decide as a part of that case whether there was the discretion referred to, for he says: "Now, considering the learned judge's acquaintance with all the facts, and his great experience in these matters, we should be very slow indeed to interfere with his discretion, either as regards enlarging the time or as regards the circumstances which in his opinion disentitled the wife on the merits to any allowance, and therefore it appears to me that we ought not to interfere." When you come to Lindley, L.J.'s, judgment you see that he refused in that case to give any sanction to what Mr. Inderwick had stated was the practice of the court, for he says (at p. 97 of 8 P. D.): "I agree. The question whether what we understand to be the ordinary practice in the Divorce Court is right or wrong is to be considered as left an open question; but I am not prepared to dissent from the conclusion of the President on the present occasion." Therefore the court has an absolute discretion and special circumstances need not be shown. In the particular case now before us there is no suggestion of misconduct on the part of the husband. But the learned judge in the court below was of opinion that it had been proved before him that the wife had no means of subsistence, and could not support herself or earn her own living. In some cases a guilty wife has no difficulty in obtaining employment and earning her own living. But there is a difference where the wife has not the health to earn her own living. In these circumstances we ought in my judgment to affirm the order of Barnes, J., on the ground that the court has an absolute discretion, and we cannot recognize any practice which interferes with that discretion.

(a.) Reported by H. W. LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The order for an allowance to the wife is purely a matter of discretion; and the learned counsel for the husband has been wholly unable to find judicial authority to limit the discretion of the judge. I think it is clear that to the exercise of that discretion there is no such limitation as is contended for. The learned judge saw the wife, heard the evidence, and had no doubt that she was wholly unable to support herself. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Jaques & Co., for W. & E. W. Bullen, Liverpool.

Solicitor for the respondent, J. Sykes, for Pennington & Higson, Liverpool.

---

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Aug. 2, 1902.

CHURCH'S TRUSTEE v. HIBBARD. (a.)

Practice—Attachment—Debtor—Committal for default to obey an order for the payment of money—Release of debtor by mistake—Second order for attachment—Re-arrest—One year's imprisonment—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 4.

A debtor had, under section 4, sub-section 3, of the Debtors Act, 1869, been sentenced to imprisonment under a writ of attachment for default in payment of a sum of money in his hands which he had been ordered by the court to pay. Before the expiration of one year—the period limited for imprisonment by the section—he was released owing to a mistake by the governor of the prison.

Held, that attachment under section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, was in its nature punishment for an "offence," and, consequently, that there was no jurisdiction to issue a second writ of attachment against the debtor in respect of the same default.

Semble, an order for re-arrest might have been made under the original writ of attachment, but in that case the time during which the debtor had been at large should be included in the period of the twelve months' imprisonment limited by the section.

Appeal from Swinfen Eady, J.

(a.) Reported by H. W. LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question raised by this appeal was whether under the exceptions specified in section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, the court had jurisdiction to issue a second writ of attachment for the same default or contempt.

The plaintiff, the trustee in bankruptcy of Charles A. Church, on the 6th of December, 1901, obtained an order from Swinfen Eady, J., that the defendants, Montague Hibbard & Co., a firm of auctioneers, should pay to the plaintiff on a specified date the sum of £1,200 admitted by the defendants to be in their hands as agents for the plaintiff in respect of goods of the bankrupt sold by them. The defendants paid a portion of this sum, but made default in payment of the balance amounting to £775.

On the 12th of February, 1902, Swinfen Eady, J., on the motion of the plaintiff, gave the plaintiff leave to issue a writ or writs of attachment against Montague Hibbard and Harold Vickers, the partners in the defendant firm—who had entered an appearance in the action separately in their own names—for their contempt in not having paid the full amount specified in the order of the 6th of December, 1901. In pursuance of this order writs of attachment were issued against Hibbard and Vickers respectively on the 25th of February, 1902. On that day (25th of February) Hibbard was arrested and lodged in prison under a writ of attachment issued against him and Vickers in pursuance of an order of Byrne, J., dated the 7th of February, 1902, for contempt in not having complied with an order for delivery of accounts in another action.

On the 26th of February the sheriff lodged a warrant or detainer against Hibbard with the governor of the prison under Swinfen Eady, J.'s, writ of attachment, and made his return accordingly. Subsequently Vickers was also arrested and lodged in prison.

On the 15th of March, 1902, Byrne, J., made an order in the other action for the discharge from custody of Hibbard and Vickers in respect of the contempt committed in that action.

On the 18th of March Swinfen Eady, J., made an order in the present action for the discharge of Vickers alone, so far as concerned his contempt of the order the 6th of December, 1901. The governor of the prison misapprehending the effect of these orders, released both Hibbard and Vickers on the 18th of March, 1902.

The plaintiff then moved for leave to issue a further writ of attachment against Hibbard alone, for his contempt in not having complied with the order of the 6th of December, 1901, notwithstanding the issue of the previous writ of attachment under that order, the lodging of the warrant on the 26th of February, 1902, with the governor of the prison, and Hibbard's subsequent release from prison. Upon that motion, Swinfen Eady, J., on the 29th of July, 1902, made the following order:

"This court doth order that the plaintiff be at liberty to issue a further writ or writs of attachment against the said Hibbard in respect of his contempt in the said order of the 12th of February, 1902, mentioned: but that the writ or writs to issue under this order shall not authorize the imprisonment of the said Hibbard for any longer period than such time as with the period from the 26th of February, 1902, to the 18th of March, 1902 (being the time during which the said Hibbard was imprisoned under a writ of attachment issued on the 25th of February, 1902, pursuant to said order dated the 12th of February, 1902), shall together amount to one year; and notice to this effect is to be put in such writ or writs of attachment."

From this order Hibbard appealed.

Bray, K.C., and Eustace Smith, for the appellant.—There was no jurisdiction to make the order now appealed from. The order of the 12th of February, 1902, was still in force and no further order for imprisonment can be made in respect of the same offence, under section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869. When the penalty has once been inflicted by an order for imprisonment under section 4, the jurisdiction of the court ceases: Horsnail v. Bruce, 21 W. R. 296, L. R. 8 C. P. 378. Again, the order now appealed from is bad because it directs imprisonment for twelve months—the longest period allowed by section 4—without taking into account the time during which the debtor has been out of prison through the mistake of the governor, and that period should have been taken into consideration.

Micklem, K.C., and Edward Clayton, for the plaintiff.—Attachment under the Debtors Act is a civil and not a criminal process: Pooley v. Whetham, 29 W. R. 296, 15 Ch. D. 435. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred to Middleton v. Chichester, 19 W. R. 369, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 152; and In re Smith, 41 W. R. 289, [1893] 2 Ch. 1, at p. 17, as showing that an order under section 4 of the Debtors Act was "punitive" in its character.] Still the remedy given is a creditor's remedy. The sheriff had no power to retake the debtor after being released by a mistake on part of the governor; but the creditor can pursue his remedy under section 7 of 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 27: Filewood v. Clement, 6 Dowl. 508. Under the old practice of ca sa an application might be made either for an order under the old writ, or for a new writ, for rearrest of the debtor. The modern writ of attachment is merely the Chancery form of the old common law writ of ca sa.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case Eady, J., made the following order: [His lordship read the order, and continued:] The question which we have to determine is whether or not that was an order which the learned judge had jurisdiction to make, having regard to the provisions of the Debtors Act, 1869. I want at once to say that we have not to-day to decide in any way whether the creditor here has any right to ask that the debtor be sent back again to prison to endure the punishment which was awarded to him under the original writ of attachment which is mentioned in this order—that is, the writ of attachment of the 25th of February, 1902. We have not got to decide that. It may very well be that, if proper application was made, an order might be made by the court by which the debtor might be sent back to serve the residue of his imprisonment. Moreover, I do not express at the present moment any opinion whether the residue of that imprisonment—which we know cannot continue for more than the term of one year—would expire in one year from the date of the original writ of attachment, or whether it would not. The only question to which I propose to address myself is whether or not this was an order which the court had jurisdiction to make.

Now, in order to arrive at a conclusion upon this point, one must look at the Debtors Act, 1869. The 4th section runs thus: "Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt.—With the exceptions hereinafter mentioned, no person shall after the commencement of this Act be arrested or imprisoned for making default in payment of a sum of money." Then follow the exceptions: "There shall be excepted from the operation of the above enactment: (1) Default in payment of a penalty or sum in the nature of a penalty, other than a penalty in respect of any contract. (2) Default in payment of any sum recoverable summarily before a justice or justices of the peace. (3) Default by a trustee or person acting in a fiduciary capacity and ordered to pay by a court of equity any sum in his possession or under his control. (4) Default by an attorney or solicitor in payment of costs when ordered to pay costs for misconduct as such or in payment of a sum of money when ordered to pay the same in his character of an officer of the court making the order. (5) Default in payment for the benefit of creditors of any portion of a salary or other income in respect of the payment of which any court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy is authorized to make an order. (6) Default in payment of sums in respect of the payment of which orders are in this Act authorized to be made."

Now, it was remarked a long time ago by Lord Hatherley, L.C., in Middleton v. Chichester that in the case of every one of these exceptions "there is something of the character of delinquency pointed out, and one cannot see that it makes a shadow of difference with reference to the question of delinquency, whether the person has the money in his possession." That is a matter which is immaterial. But what is indicated by Lord Hatherley is that, in the case of all the exceptions from the abolition of imprisonment for debt, what the Legislature did was to except those cases where a debtor deserved to be punished. To use the words of Lord Hatherley, "the debts in question were debts the incurring of which was in some degree worthy of being visited with punishment." Then in Marris v. Ingram, 28 W. R. 431, 13 Ch. D. 338, Sir George Jessel, M.R., takes the same view. He says at p. 341 of 13 Ch. D.: "I wish to say one or two words about the view that I take of the law, because I do not think that the Debtors Act, 1869—which, though it abolished imprisonment for debt in certain cases, was, as it in fact says in so many words, legislation 'for the punishment of fraudulent debtors'—did not mean punishment. Now, when we come to look at the Act, we find that it contains different provisions to meet different classes of debtors, there being one set of provisions in the case of defaulting debtors of a certain class, and special provisions being made in the case of debtors guilty of misdemeanour or other misconduct, and, looking at these provisions, it is impossible to suppose that punishment for misconduct was not intended to be meted out. That it was contemplated by the Act is clear, because the fourth section, which abolished punishment for debt by imprisonment where a man could not pay, contains the following exceptions"—then he reads the exceptions, and as to the third—namely, default by a trustee ordered to pay money in his control, he says: "Why is such a person as the last excepted? Simply because he is a dishonest man. He need not perhaps be called a thief in so many words, but he is a man who takes or keeps money belonging to other people, and he is to be punished as such." Then the same view—I do not want to read any more quotations from cases at length—is confirmed by the judgment of Lindley, L.J., in the case of In re Smith, Hands v. Andrews, [1893] 2 Ch., at p. 17. After pointing out that Mellish, L.J., had taken a different view at one time, he says: "The punitive character of section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, which was pointed out in Middleton v. Chichester"—that is, in the judgment of Lord Hatherley which I have read—"has been since so often recognized that it cannot now be questioned: see Marris v. Ingram; In re Gent, 37 W. R. 151, 40 Ch. D. 190." And it is to be noted, as giving emphasis to these cases, that in most of them the application had relation to the discharge of a debtor from prison, or to his non-liability to be imprisoned, in cases where he had been adjudged bankrupt. The decisions were that he was not entitled to freedom or to be discharged, for although the Bankruptcy Acts under certain circumstances relieve the debtor from every remedy against his person or property, they do not relieve him from the stringency of these orders under section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, inasmuch as those orders are not in the nature of remedies for the recovery of debts, but are in the nature of punishment.

Now, that being the nature of these cases, in my judgment you can only punish for fraudulent offences of this sort once; you cannot punish twice in respect of the same offence, or give two sentences in respect of the same offence. I say nothing about what you might or might not do in some cases of continued offences. Here, upon the face of this order, it is made perfectly clear that the offence for which the debtor is being attached is the identical offence for which he was punished under the first order that was made. The second order says so in terms. According to my judgment—a view which I will say is entirely in accordance with the decision in Horsnail v. Bruce there cannot be a second writ of attachment issued in respect of the same offence. In my judgment, therefore, this order was not an order which ought to have been made. As I said before, I am very far indeed from asserting that such an order might not be made as would cause the debtor here to serve the residue of his punishment. But, in my opinion, in these matters of the liberty of the subject it is essential that the form should be strictly followed. And, although it may very well be that the debtor under this writ would be no worse off than if he had simply been rearrested under the old writ, I do not think the fact that his position would be substantially the same, if such be the case, would justify us in supporting this order of Swinfen Eady, J., if such order is not an order which is justified under the Debtors Act, 1869. The appeal will therefore be allowed; but, under the circumstances, there will be no order as to costs.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have arrived at the conclusion not without considerable reluctance, because this is mere form. The debtor here has not expiated his offence to the court by enduring the imprisonment which was ordered to be inflicted upon him. And it has hardly been disputed that if another mode were taken for continuing his imprisonment, the result that is desired might be arrived at. But I agree with my lord that, before we hold that writs of attachment can issue in succession, we should see that the Act of Parliament—the Debtors Act, 1869—permits it to be done. Now, nothing is clearer to my mind than that the Act of Parliament only contemplated one writ of attachment. Any other conclusion would lead to this, that a judge or court might order an imprisonment in the first instance, say, for six months, and, if that were not found to be effective, might issue another attachment for another six months, and that is a thing which, although in the first instance twelve months' imprisonment might have been given, the Act of Parliament does not justify. With reference to the position of the delinquent in question, it does not appear to me to be open to much doubt—although I am not called upon to pronounce an opinion upon it—that the learned judge would have the power to order a rearrest under his original writ of attachment. The offence offered to the court has not been atoned. I am further of opinion that, if any such order should happen to be made, the period of imprisonment should end with the twelve months from the date of the original imprisonment, and that the order in question is irregular on the ground that it seeks to make the period of imprisonment last for twelve months, disallowing the period of time during which the debtor was at liberty. I agree that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Dyson, Smith, & Marchant.

Solicitors for the respondent, Edward Lee, Davis, & Lee.

---

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — Dec. 5.

PARDY'S MOZAMBIQUE SYNDICATE (LIMITED) v. ALEXANDER. (a.)

Practice—Discovery—Several defendants—Discovery by one defendant—Deposit—Inspection by co-defendant—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 31, rr. 12, 14-18, 26.

Where one of several defendants has obtained discovery from the plaintiff on payment of the usual deposit, it is competent for the court to order the production to another defendant of such documents relating to the matters in question between the plaintiff and that particular defendant as the plaintiff has admitted in his affidavit to the first defendant to be in his possession or power, without any further affidavit of documents, on the terms that, notwithstanding the order, the plaintiff may be at liberty to withhold on oath or seal up documents not relating to the matter in issue between the plaintiff and that particular defendant.

Moore v. Peachey, 39 W. R. 592, [1891] 2 Q. B. 707, discussed.

Action by the plaintiff company against five defendants, of whom L. C. Alexander and E. B. Chave were two, claiming a declaration that the defendants were jointly and severally liable to pay to the plaintiff company the maximum value of certain shares allotted to and secured by the defendants.

The defendant Alexander had obtained an order for discovery of documents upon payment of the usual deposit, and the plaintiffs' secretary had filed an affidavit stating the documents which were in the possession or power of the plaintiff company relating to the matter in question in the action, and specifying in Part I. of a schedule thereto, the documents which the plaintiffs were willing to produce.

On the 19th of November, 1902, the defendant E. B. Chave gave notice to the plaintiff company to produce the documents mentioned in Part I. of this schedule.

The plaintiff company, however, refused to produce them.

The defendant E. B. Chave thereupon applied in chambers for an order on the plaintiff company to produce these documents at the office of her solicitors, and that the applicant might be at liberty to inspect and peruse them and take copies and abstracts and extracts therefrom, and that in the meantime all further proceedings might be stayed against her.

This application was opposed by the plaintiff company and was adjourned into court.

A. R. Kirby, for the applicant.—This application is justified by the rules. Rules 15 to 18 of order 31, as to the production of documents, were very general, and even if these are to be read in a more limited sense, rule 18 (2) of itself would be sufficient. Moore v. Peachey, 39 W. R. 592, [1891] 2 Q. B. 707, is really in our favour, though it is true that there the documents were referred to in an affidavit answering interrogatories instead of, as in this case, in an affidavit as to documents, but rule 26 applies to both. That case shows that unless there is an evasion of the rule as to deposit an application such as this is justified by the rules. An application under rule 12 might have been met by the objection that the plaintiffs had already made a sufficient affidavit. The procedure under rule 14 is shown in Quilter v. Heatly, 31 W. R. 331, 23 Ch. D. 42.

(a.) Reported by C. W. MEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mark Romer, for the plaintiff company.—The applicant is attempting to obtain discovery without making the necessary deposit, and this the court will not allow: Moore v. Peachey. The deposit is not only for the costs of the affidavit, but also for the costs of producing the documents. This application is really an attempt to get general discovery of documents by this defendant, and the plaintiffs should be protected by the deposit. The procedure is different under rules 12 to 14, and rule 15, as was pointed out in Quilter v. Heatly. Documents to be within rule 15 must be more than such as are merely disclosed in an affidavit of documents.

KEKEWICH, J.—This application was adjourned by me into court because of its importance and novelty. It was admitted by counsel before me in chambers, and is admitted here, that there is no direct authority on the point. The action is for a declaration of the liabilities of the defendants in respect to certain shares. I need not go into the merits of the case. It is enough to say that there are several defendants; one of them has obtained an order against the plaintiffs for discovery of documents. Another defendant seeks to have produced to her, without any further affidavit of documents, the documents disclosed in the affidavit made on behalf of the plaintiff company. It is certainly strange that the point should not have arisen before; but, although it is of some importance, I think, now that I have had the benefit of argument on both sides, I may safely say that it is not in terms provided for by the rules. They lay down a general practice, but are silent on the particular point.

The first objection that the plaintiffs urge is that this is really an application for discovery, that upon such an application security for costs should be given by the applicant—that is to say, £5 unless the court thinks necessary to order a larger sum; and that this defendant is taking advantage of an application made by her co-defendant without making such payment herself. This is said to be an evasion of the rule and to be a hardship on the plaintiffs, because costs will be incurred in producing these documents, and the rule is intended as an indemnity against the costs not merely of making the affidavit but of production as well. If I saw any reason to suppose that there was any intention to evade the rule as to deposit, I should take the course indicated by the judges in Moore v. Peachey and should protect the party against whom the application was made and provide that there should not in fact be an evasion of the rule. But the decision in Moore v. Peachey does not seem to me to be an authority in the plaintiffs' favour. There interrogatories had been delivered and the deposit of £5, as required by ord. 31, r. 26, on an application for discovery of documents, had been made. The affidavit in answer to interrogatories referred to certain documents, and the court held that there was no occasion for the applicant there, seeking for inspection only, to make a further deposit. It is quite true that the case is distinguishable from the present, because there the documents were referred to in the affidavit in answer to interrogatories, whereas here they are referred to in the affidavit of documents. But ord. 31, r. 26, is applicable in each case, and I think that Moore v. Peachey is a decision that, unless there is evasion of the rule as to deposit, there is no reason why there should be a further deposit in a case of this sort.

Then it is said that the rules do not meet this case, and may be in a manner inconsistent with the right which is claimed. I think that is so. It is quite possible to read the rules and show that there are many passages which point to this particular application not being within them. But I do not think that is enough. I think there are rules which sufficiently cover the point and enable me to make the order. In the first place ord. 31, r. 12, enables the court to refuse to make the order for discovery of documents where it is satisfied that there is no occasion for an affidavit of documents, and the applicant's counsel anticipates, with some reason, that if the applicant were to apply that an affidavit of documents should be made by the plaintiffs, they would say, and the court would uphold them, that they had already made an affidavit of documents and stated what documents were in their possession, and that they ought not to be asked to do that again, even though a further deposit were paid. I am not sure that, if the present application were to fail, the applicant's anticipation would be well grounded; but I think it affords some reason for saying that the application ought not to fail. According to the general practice of the court, a party ought not to be put to do what the court would refuse to order, and the court would refuse to make an order for a further affidavit when a further affidavit is not necessary. Rule 14 is in very general terms. [His lordship read it, and continued:] Now we know by an affidavit—that is to say, by a document of record in this action—that the plaintiffs have certain documents in their possession or power. Why should the court be powerless on an application of a defendant to make the order to which rule 14 points? It is quite true that there are other rules, beginning with rule 15 which deals with the particular case of documents to which reference is made in pleadings or affidavits, and these rules go on to provide that the party requiring the documents should give notice, and then, under rule 18, the court may make an order for production. It seems to me to be essential for the administration of justice that there should be power in the court to prevent a further affidavit of documents being made, and on the application of a second defendant to order the plaintiff to produce to him documents which, in answer to the first defendant, he has admitted to be in his possession or power. Surely there are good grounds for this jurisdiction. The words of rule 14 are clear and without qualification: "Such documents in his possession or power relating to the matter in question as the judge shall think right." But that, of course, means documents relating to the matters in question between the plaintiff making the affidavit and the defendant on whose application it is made. It is possible, and indeed every practitioner must know that it is not at all an uncommon thing that documents which are relevant to questions between the plaintiff and defendant A. may not be relevant to questions between the plaintiff and defendant B. It is likely to occur where many defendants are sued on different grounds. I think it would be extremely hard to make a plaintiff produce to B. all the documents which he has admitted to be in his possession or power as against A., notwithstanding that they may have nothing to do with the case against B. The court always guards against production and discovery of any documents which are not relevant to the matters in question. I think, therefore, that when a defendant in the position of B. makes an application of this kind he can only do so on the terms that, notwithstanding the order, the plaintiff may be at liberty to withhold on oath or seal up documents not relating to the matters in question between the plaintiff and the particular defendant, and the order to be now made must be so framed.

Solicitors, G. M. Folkard; Cheston & Sons.

---

Chan. Div. } Feb. 12, 13.
Farwell, J. }

In re NEWEN (DECEASED). (a.)

Solicitor—Client—Agency—Solicitor's power as agent to compromise actions.

A solicitor has a general power to compromise an action on behalf of his lay client, provided (a) he acts reasonably and bonâ fide, and (b) that he is not restrained by any express prohibition; and this rule applies equally to the solicitor on the record acting as agent for the solicitor of the lay client.

Motion.

In December, 1902, a summons was taken out in the district registry of Liverpool in the matter of the estate of George Newen, deceased, and of the trusts of his will. Two of the trustees, Carruthers and Clark, were plaintiffs, and the two tenants for life with a Mr. Davey, a remainderman and trustee, were defendants. The summons asked for directions to the trustees in regard to notices served upon them by two railway companies proposing to take part of the trust property, and also asked that the trustees might be given powers to oppose the railway companies' application to Parliament, costs being granted out of the trust estate. The tenants for life a few days later took out a summons to remove the proceedings from the Liverpool District Registry to London.

Messrs. Smiles & Co., the London solicitors, acted for the tenants for life and instructed Messrs. Jevons & Ryley, of Liverpool, to act as their agents in the matter. On the 10th of January they further instructed Mr. Ryley as follows: "Failing an order dismissing Mr. Carruthers' application with costs and giving costs on our application, you will please adjourn the matter to the judge." Both summonses came before the registrar on the 12th of January. Mr. Ryley attended as agent for Smiles & Co., and, though it is not quite clear as to what took place, the summonses were indorsed thus: "Defendants desiring that no further opposition to the bills should be offered by trustees, no order, except that costs of all parties be paid out of the estate.

Though the words "by consent" had been accidently omitted, yet the plaintiffs contended that this was a consent order; but the defendants took the opposite view, and now moved to discharge it on the ground that it was never intended to be a consent order.

Mr. Ryley in evidence said that he had had no instructions to compromise, but had submitted to the the registrar's ruling.

His lordship, after consultation with the registrar, held that it was a consent order.

(a.) Reported by ALFRED THOMAS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Upjohn, K.C., and Rutherford, for Carruthers.—There were two points to be considered—(1) What was the general authority of the solicitor on the record, and how limited; (2) if the solicitor on the record is agent for any other solicitor, is his general authority in any way affected? We submit that the solicitor on the record has a general authority to compromise actions which can only be limited by express prohibition; and also, the fact that the solicitor on the record was a town or country agent for another solicitor makes no difference.

They cited the following: Latuch v. Pasherante, 1 Salk. 86; Prestwich v. Poley, 13 W. R. 753, 18 C. B. N. S. 806; Fray v. Voules, 7 W. R. 446, 1 E. & E. 839; Griffiths v. Williams, 1 T. R. 710; Chown v. Parrot, 11 W. R. 668, 14 C. B. N. S. 74, at p. 83; Withers v. Parker, 28 L. J. Ex. 292; Harvey v. Croydon Sanitary Authority, 32 W. R. 389, 26 Ch. D. 249; Hickman v. Berens, [1895] 2 Ch. 638, 44 W. R. Dig. 41; Huddersfield Bank v. Lister, 43 W. R. 567, [1895] 2 Ch. 273; Lewis's v. Lewis, 39 W. R. 75, 45 Ch. D. 281; Tamplin v. James, 29 W. R. 311, 15 Ch. D. 215; Goddard v. Jeffreys, 30 W. R. 269; Wilding v. Sanderson, 45 W. R. 675, [1897] 2 Ch. 534; Ainsworth v. Wilding, 44 W. R. 540, [1896] 1 Ch. 673; and Neale v. Gordon Lennox, ante, p 140, [1902] A. C. 465.

Butcher, K.C. and Mather, for Clark, adopted Upjohn's arguments.

R. J. Parker and Spence, in support of the motion, argued that the country or town agent was not the solicitor on the record, and had therefore no general authority to compromise: ord. 12, r. 10; ord. 4 and vol. 2, p. 2, form; Annual Practice, vol. 2, pp. 11 and 12, form. There was no privity of contract between the agent and the lay client: Wray v. Kemp, 32 W. R. 334, 26 Ch. D. 169.

W. H. Cozens-Hardy, for Mr. Davey, also supported the motion.

FARWELL, J.—In reality this is an appeal from the decision of this district registrar about costs which amounted to about £20. The registrar suggested, when the matter came before him, that it would be better, to save the parties further expense, that no order should be made, and that the costs should come out of the trust funds. I am satisfied that this course was assented to by all parties; but by some slip the words "by consent" were left out, and now the defendants move to discharge the order. It has been argued that it would not be right to the defendants to treat this as a consent order. Has there been any mistake? I can see none; and I cannot really understand why the matter is being now contested. The Liverpool agent was the only witness called, and he gave no evidence of mistake. The agent in Liverpool had received a letter from the London solicitors which was said to be an absolute prohibition of assent to any order but that suggested in the letter. I do not agree. The prohibition must be explicit, and that in the letter was not so. A solicitor has a general power to compromise actions, provided he acts bonâ fide and reasonably, unless there were an express prohibition. Then it was contended that Mr. Ryley had no authority to settle. Prestwich v. Poley was the best case to cite. The head-note ran: "An attorney has a general authority to compromise an action on behalf of his client provided he acts reasonably and bonâ fide and not in defiance of the direct and positive instructions of the client"; and Sir Montagu Smith, at 18 C. B. N. S., p. 816, says: "The attorney is the general agent of the client in all matters which may reasonably be expected to arise for decision in the cause. Everyone must reasonably expect that a cause may not be carried to its natural conclusion, and that it is proper and usual and often necessary to compromise. The authorities seem to me to establish clearly that the attorney has power to compromise the action in a fair and reasonable manner." It is clear, then, that the solicitor had general authority. But then it was said Mr. Ryley was only the Liverpool agent. No doubt there was no privity of contract between the Liverpool agent and the said client. But ord. 12, r. 10, makes it necessary to have someone at hand, and Mr. Ryley had entered an appearance and been served with notice. I do not agree with Mr. Parker's contention, that the solicitor on the record, as agent for the principal solicitor, had not the same power as between himself and the lay client as existed between the principal solicitor and the lay client. Where is the line to be drawn? The Court of Exchequer in Withers v. Parker must have intended what they said then in their dicta. Pollock, C.B., said, 28 L. J. Ex., at p. 294: "I think it is of considerable importance that we should not open a facility for disputing arrangements of this description by creating a difference between the assent of the attorney and the assent of the agent. It might lead to very inconvenient consequences if we did not consider for the purposes of the suit, the agent and the attorney identically the same"; and Martin, B., at p. 295, said: "I do protest against any distinction being drawn between the act of the London agent and the act of the country attorney. If we make such a distinction I don't know where we shall stop." If the learned barons did not mean what they there said, I do not know for what purpose these dicta were uttered. It would be calamitous to the conduct of business to hold otherwise.

Application dismissed with costs.

Solicitors, Carruthers, Liverpool; Collins, Robinson, & Duffield, Liverpool; Robins, Billing, & Co., for J. Pughe & Davey, Pontypridd; Smiles & Co.

---

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) Nov. 3.

HUMPHERY v. YOUNG. (a.)

Local government—"Drain"—Semi-detached house—Pipe used for draining—"One building only"—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 4 and 41.

The question whether a pair of semi-detached houses are "one building only" within the meaning of section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875, which provides that "'drain' means any drain of and used for the drainage of one building only," is a question of fact, and depends upon the circumstances of each case.

Case stated.

On the 18th of April, 1902, an information was preferred by Joseph Humphery (the appellant), inspector of nuisances for the borough of Reigate, on behalf of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough, being, by their council, the urban district council for the borough and the local authority for the district, under the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 41, against Douglas Young (the respondent), for that on the appellant's written application to the authority stating that a drain belonging to Nos. 36 and 38, Somers-road, within the borough, was a nuisance and injurious to health, the local authority did empower him (the appellant), after twenty-four hours' written notice to the occupiers of the premises, to enter the same and cause the ground to be opened and examine the drain; that upon examination the drain appeared to be in a bad condition and to require alteration or amendment; that the local authority did, on the 25th of February, 1902, cause notice in writing to be given to the respondent, the owner of the premises, requiring him before the 4th of March then next to do the following necessary works—that is to say, relay the drain with soundly-jointed 6in. glazed stoneware pipes on a bed of 6in. of cement concrete, the drain to be jointed so as to stand the water test; and that the notice had not been complied with, and the works had not been executed.

Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted before the justices:

The written application to the local authority was made as required by section 41 of the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55).

The local authority thereupon by writing empowered the appellant, who was their inspector of nuisances, after the notice to the occupiers required by the same section, to enter the premises mentioned in the application and cause the ground to be opened and examine the drain or sewer mentioned in the application, which the appellant accordingly did.

Upon such examination the drain or sewer appeared to be in a bad condition, and to require alteration or amendment.

Thereupon the local authority forthwith caused notice in writing to be given to the respondent, who was the owner of the premises, requiring him before the 4th of March (being a reasonable time) to do the necessary works, which necessary works were specified in such notice and in the information.

Such notice was not complied with.

The premises in question were a pair of semi-detached houses, built apparently at the same time, having one continuous roof and divided by a party wall which did not go up through the roof. At the time of the erection of the houses the local authority did not require the party wall to be carried up above the roof. At the point of division there was a recess in the front wall down which a water-pipe ran. The houses had gardens in front and behind, which were divided by fences.

The houses had always been the subject of separate lettings, and occupied by separate tenants; and they were separately assessed and rated for the poor and other rates.

The drain or sewer in question was used for the drainage of both houses. It commenced at the point of junction of two separate drains which drained the respective houses, ran thence under the garden of one of the houses into and under a public road called Somers-road, and was connected with a public sewer which ran along that road.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that the two houses were one building only, and that the drain or sewer was a drain within the meaning of section 41 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that the two houses were two buildings not within the same curtilage, and that the sewer or drain was not a drain within the meaning of section 41, but was a sewer vested in and repairable by the local authority.

The following cases were cited: Travis v. Uttley, 42 W. R. 461, [1894] 1 Q. B. 233; Hedley v. Webb, [1901] 2 Ch. 126, 49 W. R. Dig. 101; and Woodford Urban District Council v. Stark, 86 L. T. Rep. 685, 50 W. R. Dig. 98.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The justices found as a fact (if and so far as it was a question of fact) that the two houses were two separate buildings and not within the same curtilage, and they were of opinion, on the authority of Travis v. Uttley, that the drain or sewer in question was a sewer within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1875, vested in the local authority, and that the respondent could not be required to alter or amend it. They therefore dismissed the information.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the justices upon the above statement of facts came to a correct determination and decision in point of law, and, if not, what should be done in the premises.

By the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), it is provided as follows:

Section 4.—"Drain" means any drain of and used for the drainage of one building only, or premises within the same curtilage, and made merely for the purpose of communicating therefrom with a cesspool or other like receptacle for drainage, or with a sewer into which the drainage of two or more buildings or premises occupied by different persons is conveyed. "Sewer" includes sewers and drains of every description, except drains to which the word "drain" interpreted as aforesaid applies, and except drains vested in or under the control of any authority having the management of roads and not being a local authority under this Act.

Section 41.—"On the written application of any person to a local authority, stating that any drain, water-closet, earth-closet, privy, ashpit, or cesspool on or belonging to any premises within their district is a nuisance or injurious to health (but not otherwise) the local authority may, by writing, empower their surveyor or inspector of nuisances, after twenty-four hours' written notice to the occupier of such premises, or in case of emergency without notice, to enter such premises, with or without assistants, and cause the ground to be opened and examine such drain, water-closet, earth-closet, privy, ashpit, or cesspool. . . . If the drain . . . on examination appear to be in bad condition, or to require alteration or amendment, the local authority shall forthwith cause notice in writing to be given to the owner or occupier of the premises requiring him forthwith or within a reasonable time therein specified to do the necessary works; and if such notice is not complied with, the person to whom it is given shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding ten shillings for every day during which he continues to make default, and the local authority may, if they think fit, execute such works, and may recover in a summary manner from the owner the expenses incurred by them in so doing, or may by order declare the same to be private improvement expenses."

Bray, K.C. (G. Humphreys with him), for the appellant.—The decision of the justices was wrong. Hedley v. Webb is in favour of the appellant. In that case Cozens-Hardy, J., held that a pair of semi-detached houses were "one building only" within the meaning of section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and that the pipe which drained the two houses was a drain, and not a sewer. The decision in that case is binding on the justices. In the present case there is no evidence that these houses are separate buildings. They were built at the same time and are under one continuous roof and have one continuous front wall. Buildings of this nature are of frequent occurrence, and the court should lay down as a proposition of law whether such houses are one building or not within the meaning of section 4.

Macmorran, K.C. (Naldrett with him), for the respondent.—The question in cases such as this is one purely of fact and depends upon the circumstances of each individual case. Hedley v. Webb was decided on a point of fact. The justices were right in holding this pipe was a sewer.

Bray, K.C., replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We have been invited by counsel for the appellant to lay down a general rule as to whether a pair of semi-detached houses is to be regarded as one building only or more than one. I for one decline to lay down any such rule. It is in every case a question of fact. Counsel has argued that we must find that these semi-detached houses were one building only, because they were built at the same time and are both under one continuous roof and have one continuous front wall, and that there was no evidence before the justices on which they could find that they were separate buildings. I doubt whether it was intended that the word "building" in the Act should have so wide a meaning. Section 4, which contains the definition of a drain, says that "drain" means any drain of and used for the drainage of one building only or premises within the same curtilage, and "sewer" includes sewers and drains of every description except drains to which the word "drain" as above defined applies. If it had been intended to deal with the question of structure I think some more distinct definition would have been given. I have, however, come to the conclusion that it must be a question of fact in each case for the justices, and in the present case they have found as a fact that the two houses were two separate buildings and not within the same curtilage, and I think it is impossible to say that there was no evidence upon which they could so find. In Travis v. Uttley it was held that three houses were not "one building only," and that a drain passing through private ground, but receiving the drainage of three houses, was a sewer within the meaning of the Act. That case seems to me to be an authority here, at least to the extent of showing that it is a question of fact, and that each case has to be dealt with on its own facts. Hedley v. Webb, which was relied on by counsel for the appellant, in so far as it is an authority at all in the present case, is rather against the appellant. In that case Cozens-Hardy, J., held that the pair of semi-detached houses with which he had there to deal were one building, but that is an instance of a finding of fact by the learned judge. As further showing that it must be a question of fact, I may refer to the case of Rogers v. Hosegood, 49 W. R. 659, [1900] 2 Ch. 388, where the Court of Appeal held that for some purposes a block of residential flats was not one dwelling-house.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. In cases of this kind the facts are very seldom identical and the question whether the structure is one building or two must be treated as one of fact. As to the view that I appear to have taken in Travis v. Uttley, that because part of the pipe was undoubtedly a sewer the whole of the drain was a sewer from end to end, I may point out that I modified and corrected that view in the subsequent case of Beckenham Urban District Council v. Wood, 60 J. P. 490.

CHANNELL, J.—I also am of the same opinion. I agree that it is a question of fact in each case. No doubt it would be very useful if we could lay down a general rule which would apply to such a case as this, but we have not the power to do so.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for appellant, Nicol, Son, & Jones, for C. J. Grece, Redhill.

Solicitors for respondent, Pettiver & Pearkes.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Darling and Channell, JJ.) May 13, 1902.

COUNCIL OF CITY OF WESTMINSTER v. WATSON. (a.)

Local government—Buildings—Surveyors fees—Supervision of temporary wooden structures — Whether power transferred to borough councils—District surveyors—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxxiii.), s. 84—London Government Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 14), s. 5 ; Schedule II., Part I.

The transfer, by section 5 of the London Government Act, 1899, of the licensing power over temporary wooden structures, under section 84 of the London Building Act, 1894, from the London County Council to the borough councils, does not operate as a transfer of the powers and duties of the district surveyors, though those powers and duties are substantially diminished thereby. The district surveyors are officers under the London Building Act, 1894. They are therefore entitled, under section 145 of that Act, to receive notices of structures falling within section 84, and, in a proper case, are entitled to inspect and receive a fee for such inspection.

Case stated under section 29 of the London Government Act, 1899.

The City of Westminster was created in pursuance of section 1 of the London Government Act, 1899, which gave power to the Crown to create such areas and to make such re-arrangements for boundaries as would be found necessary, and the first schedule to such section defined those boundaries.

By section 5, sub-section 1, the powers and duties of the London County Council, under the enactments mentioned in Part I. of the second schedule to that Act, subject to the conditions mentioned in that schedule, were transferred to the borough council.

That schedule is as follows:

Part I.—Powers and duties to be transferred from county council; powers and duties transferred; power under section 84 of the London Building Act, 1894, to take proceedings for default in obtaining or observing the conditions of a licence under that transfer.

Section 84 is one of a series of five sections—82-86 in Part VII. of the London Building Act—giving to the London County Council power to licence temporary structures, and providing for the deposit of plans and also providing for the recovery of penalties.

By the London Building Act, 1894, s. 138, it is provided, "subject to the provisions of this Act, and to the exemptions contained therein, every building or structure . . . shall be subject to the supervision of the district surveyor appointed to the district in which the building or structure is situate."

By section 145: "In the following cases and at the following times—that is to say: (a) When a building or structure is about to be begun, then two clear days before it is begun; and (b) when a building or structure or work is after the commencement thereof suspended for any period exceeding three months, then two clear days before it is resumed; and (c) when, during the progress of a building or structure or work the builder employed thereon is changed, then two clear days before a new builder enters upon the continuance thereof, the builder or other person causing or directing the work to be executed shall serve on the district surveyor a building notice respecting the building or structural work."

By section 154: "(1) There shall be paid by the builder, or in his default by the owner or occupier, as the case may be, of the building or structure in respect whereof the same are chargeable, to every district surveyor in respect of the several matters mentioned in Parts I. and III. of the third schedule to this Act the fees therein specified, or such other fees as may be directed by the London County Council."

By the third schedule—Fees payable to district surveyors on wooden and temporary structures: "On inspection of any wooden structures or on inspection of any structure or erection put up on any public occasion, the same amount as for a new building, calculated on the area of the structure or erection, without reference to the area of any building to which it may be attached or in or on which it may be put up."

Prior to the transfer of the administration of section 84 to the metropolitan boroughs it was the practice of the London County Council to make any grant of licence or approval conditional on the work being done subject to the approval of the district surveyor; and the Westminster council had by their licence made the approval of structures falling within section 84 subject to the approval of their own surveyor.

By Part IX. of the Act of 1894 provision is made for dangerous and neglected structures.

The district surveyors have the duty to report to the London County Council information received by them that the structure is in a dangerous state, and may be required by the London County Council to survey such structure.

Fees are provided for the district surveyors for surveys and subsequent action, but no fee is provided merely for reporting information, and the provision as to the fees in question is made by section 113 of the Act coupled with Part II. of the third schedule.

The questions which have arisen between the council of the city of Westminster and the district surveyors who are parties in this case are, firstly, as to whether the powers, duties, and liabilities of the surveyors with respect to the supervision or inspection of wooden structures falling within section 84 of the Act of 1894 have been transferred to the city council and its officers; secondly, as to whether wooden structures falling within section 84 are works of which the district surveyor should have notice under section 145 of the Act, and as to which he has duties of inspection and supervision independently of the terms of any licence; and thirdly, as to whether the right to receive the fees for such supervision and inspection has been transferred to the Westminster City Council, or is still retained by the district surveyor independently of the terms of the licence granted.

Manisty, K.C. (Craies and B. O. Bircham with him), for the city of Westminster.—The duties of the district surveyor have been transferred as regards section 84, which alone deals with these temporary wooden structures. The notice to the district surveyor under section 145 only applies to structures in the nature of a building, and these are temporary structures.

He referred to Venner v. McDowell, 45 W. R. 267, [1897] 1 Q. B. 421, and Westminster, City and Council of v. London County Council, 50 W. R. 428, [1902] 1 K. B. 326.

Macmorran, K.C. (Ryde Hilliard with him), for the district surveyors.—The surveyors' rights under section 84 have not been taken away, and they therefore have still the right to receive notices under section 145. They are not the servants of the county council, but have to perform their statutory duties under the Act. If the contention of the city council is right, and the right of supervision has passed to them, the power of supervision would depend upon the terms of the licence, and if no condition as to supervision were inserted there would be no power in anyone to supervise these structures.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is a difficult case. The necessities of modern legislation have rendered it absolutely necessary that there should be legislation by reference, and one of the difficulties unavoidably imposed on the courts is that they frequently have to construe Acts of Parliament which incorporate sections of other Acts by mere reference. We have in this case to deal with a question which is raised in consequence of such legislation. The second schedule of the London Government Act, 1899, transferred from the county council under the words "Powers and duties to be transferred" the power under section 84 of the London Building Act, 1894, to license the setting up of wooden structures, and power to take proceedings for default in obtaining or observing the conditions of a licence under that section. Section 84 contemplated that the licence should contain provisions with reference to the structure and the time for which it should be allowed to continue. It is not denied that the city of Westminster obtained something under that transfer, and we decided in Westminster Council v. London County Council that the right of licensing or imposing conditions in the licence, and of taking proceedings in the event of not obtaining or observing a licence, had been transferred to the city of Westminster. At the time of transfer there were existing a number of provisions regarding the duties of district surveyors, duties partly defined by Act of Parliament and partly regulated by bye-laws made under the Act. They are duties imposed upon persons who are not strictly speaking servants of the county council though their deputies had to be appointed subject to its approval. They are public officers under the London Building Act, 1894, with important duties to perform. I do not think that it was intended to transfer the powers of the district surveyors to the Westminster City Council. Far stronger language would have been required to effect such a transfer. But by the transfer the powers of the district surveyors may have been to a certain extent destroyed, or some of them may have been taken away. What is, therefore, the true view of the law having regard to the respective positions of the county council, the surveyors, and the city of Westminster; and what was intended to be transferred under section 84 of the London Building Act. I repeat that the city council can specify the conditions of the licence, and if any duties are imposed upon anybody by the licence, they are not imposed upon the district surveyors as such. At the same time, the transfer from the county council does not destroy any of the duties or powers of the district surveyors, except in so far as the actual necessity of the transfer involves the alteration or destruction of those duties.

It is now necessary to consider (in the light of these general observations) the three questions put to us in the case. The first is, as to whether the powers, duties, and liabilities of the surveyors with respect to the supervision or inspection of wooden structures falling within section 84 have been transferred to the city council and its officers. In so far as those duties depend upon the terms of the licence it is not a question of transfer at all; it is a question of duties which are imposed upon the officers of the city council if there are any such named by the terms of the licence. They are not duties which are taken away from the district surveyors; and therefore it follows that the district surveyors do not have either the right, power, or duty of performing any of the duties prescribed by the licence, unless the licence indicates by its terms that they are the persons to fulfil its duties; for instance, it might be quite possible for the city council to say that they would direct these structures to be erected subject to the supervision of the district surveyor. My answer to the first question is, that the powers and duties of the district surveyors are not transferred to the city council and its officers, and that the district surveyors have no powers or duties or liabilities under the licence which is granted by the city of Westminster.

The second question is whether wooden structures falling within section 84 are structures of which a district surveyor should have notice under section 145 of the Act, and as to which he has duties of supervision and inspection independently of the terms of any licence. On the whole I think that the district surveyors are entitled to the notice under section 145, not, of course, of everything specified in that section, because some of the provisions are not applicable; but there may be questions, notably of dangerous structures, possibly of interference with some street or street lines, possibly of some of the other matters which may be involved, that may impose (in a proper case) upon the district surveyor the right and duty of inspecting under the Act—a right and duty not in any way based upon the licence. It must not be thought that I suggest that because notice is given the surveyor has the right of going in and purporting to exercise functions under the Act which have no relation to the structure which is actually being erected or to its character, and I must not be thought to express an opinion that simply because a notice may be given a surveyor would be entitled to say, "I will go in and inspect and will claim my fee," although there was no reasonable ground for suggesting that there was any danger of any infraction of any conditions in the statute. I do not mean to express an opinion that a surveyor would be entitled to claim a fee under such circumstances. I think it is impossible for us to say, having regard to the duties of the surveyor, that he is not entitled to notice.

The last question is, as to whether the right to receive fees for supervision and inspection mentioned in the case has been transferred to the city council or has lapsed or is still retained by the district surveyor. I am of opinion that the right has not been transferred to the city council or its officers; that follows from the earlier part of my judgment. I do not think, either, that it has altogether lapsed. The reasonable and proper course for the county council to take would be to exercise their powers under section 154 of the Act of 1894 of allowing a lesser fee where the duties to be performed by the district surveyor would obviously be very much less than those he would have to perform under the circumstances contemplated by the statute. I am of opinion that the right to proper fees is not taken away, and that if in a proper case, for good cause, the surveyor, on information he has received, has the duty cast upon him to inspect, or if some question arises which may properly give him the right to inspect in order to see whether the provisions of the Act have been infringed, then he would be entitled to a fee. I can do no more than indicate my opinion as to what ought to be done with regard to the amount of fees, but I wish it to be understood that I do not, in recognizing this right of district surveyors, suggest that they are entitled, simply because they are district surveyors and have certain duties to perform under the Act, to claim fees in respect of every building which may be erected. The case is, no doubt, one of difficulty in consequence of the transfer of the duties from the county council without any special reference to the duties of district surveyors. I have answered the questions, and I trust my answers will be sufficient to enable persons to ascertain what their rights are.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. With regard to the district surveyor inspecting one of these temporary wooden buildings and obtaining a fee for doing so even after notice, during the argument it taxed the ingenuity of counsel to suggest even a hypothetical case in which one of these erections would infringe the provisions of the Act of 1894, and so really require the attention of the district surveyor. That is enough to satisfy me that there will really be no unnecessary interference by district surveyors with buildings such as these.

CHANNELL, J.—I do not think it is correct to say that any powers, duties, or liabilities of the surveyors have been transferred by the London Government Act, 1899, because the district surveyors are persons having a statutory position and duty cast upon them; they are not mere servants of the London County Council. The result seems to be that the transfer of the powers and duties of the London County Council cannot possibly operate as a transfer of the powers and duties of the district surveyors. But incidentally the transfer of powers to the city of Westminster which but for that transfer would have been exercised by the county council has, in my opinion, very substantially diminished the duties of the district surveyors. Under the former proceedings, when the right of licensing was in the London County Council, it was undoubtedly their practice so to frame the licence that the district surveyor would be the person who would have the very substantial work of seeing whether or not the structure was erected in accordance with the licence. But the effect of taking away that power and giving it to another body—which is now in fact exercising it in a way which is only natural, namely, by appointing its own officer to do the work—is to substantially diminish the work of the district surveyor. The duty cannot be said to be transferred because, so far as it is an independent statutory authority, it necessarily still exists. It seems to me, therefore, that the way to answer these questions is as follows: As to the first, that nothing has been transferred, but that so far as any duties would formerly have been imposed upon the district surveyors by the fact that such buildings were licensed by the London County Council, no such duties are now imposed upon them, but are imposed by the licence upon the Westminster city surveyors. It is impossible to answer the question in accordance with its exact terms, because nothing has been transferred. With regard to other duties imposed upon the district surveyor, especially with regard to dangerous structures, they remain as they were. As to the second question, in my opinion, the district surveyors are entitled to have notice of works mentioned in the question. It would be sufficient notice to say, "Two days hence I am going to erect a building, or temporary structure, which the city of Westminster has licensed, and which it has directed me to build according to the satisfaction of their own surveyor." That notice would at once tell him that he has very little to do in connection with the structure, but that he may have duties of inspection and supervision independently of the terms of the licence. I think the matter is quite clear. The structures may be dangerous, and if they are the district surveyor has a right to inspect them. As to the right to recover fees, if in any case he inspects property—and not when he knows that there is nothing for him to inspect and inspects merely for the purpose of obtaining a fee—he is entitled to his fee. I agree with the suggestion made by my lord that the proper way for the London County Council to meet this case is, inasmuch as incidentally the operation of transferring the licensing of these matters from them to the city of Westminster and the other metropolitan boroughs is very greatly to diminish the duties which in point of fact will be likely to fall upon the district surveyor, to make a direction under section 154, which says the district surveyor is to have the fees specified in the schedule, or such other fees, not exceeding the amounts therein specified, as may be directed by the council. If the London County Council would make a direction imposing a smaller fee to the district surveyor when the structure was in fact licensed by the city of Westminster or other Metropolitan authority, and not by themselves (which would undoubtedly greatly diminish his work), the whole difficulty, it seems to me, would be met.

Judgment accordingly.

Solicitors for Westminster City Council, Caprons, Hitchins, Brabant, & Hitchins.

Solicitors for district surveyors, Hicklin, Washington, & Pasmore.

---

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Probate. } Nov. 24.

In the Goods of JOSEPH BAXTER. (a.)

Probate—Will—Nomination paper—Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 39), s. 25, sub-sections 1, 2.

The Court admitted as a valid will a nomination paper executed by a member of a co-operative society which was registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, although it was invalid as a nomination paper, because the deceased's credit with the society stood at a greater sum than £100, in contravention of section 25, sub-section 1, of the Act.

This was a motion to revoke letters of administration which had been granted to the next-of-kin as upon intestacy, and to admit to probate as a will a nomination paper which was invalid under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893. The facts were shortly as follows: Joseph Baxter died on the 21st of September, 1901, having on the 6th of January, 1899, signed a nomination paper, being at that time possessed of certain shares of about £100 in the Runcorn Co-operative Industrial and Provident Society (Limited), the paper being in the form prescribed by the society, whereby he purported to give the whole amount standing to his credit at the time of his death to his nephew, John Baxter.

Section 25, sub-section 1, of 56 & 57 Vict. c. 39 provides that: "A member of a registered society, not being under the age of sixteen years, may by a writing under his hand delivered or sent to the registered office of the society, during the lifetime of such member, or made in any book kept thereat, nominate any person or persons other than an officer or servant of the society (unless such servant is the husband, wife, father, mother, child, brother, sister, nephew, or niece of the nominator) to or among whom his property in the society, whether in shares, loans, or deposits, or so much thereof as is specified in such nomination if the nomination does not comprise the whole shall be transferred at his decease, provided the amount credited to him in the books of the society does not then exceed one hundred pounds sterling.

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Sub-section 2 provides: "A nomination so made may be revoked or varied by any similar document under the hand of the nominator delivered, sent, or made as aforesaid, but shall not be revocable or variable by the will of the nominator or any codicil thereto."

The nomination paper was as follows:

"I, Joseph Baxter, of Alvanley, near Frodsham, labourer, a member of the Runcorn Co-operative Society (Limited), and No. 3,252 in the said society, do hereby nominate the following as the only person or persons (none of them being an officer or servant of the society, unless such person is the husband, wife, father, mother, child, brother, sister, nephew, or niece of me, the nominator) to or among whom shall be transferred my property in the society whether in shares, loans, or deposits at my decease in such proportion as is set forth below opposite their respective names:

| Name. | Description or Occupation. | Address. | Proportion. |
|---|---|---|---|
| John Baxter | Nephew | Alvanley | All. |

"If the above-mentioned John Baxter does not survive the above Joseph Baxter, then the whole of the shares of the said Joseph Baxter to be paid to his nephew Robert Baxter, of Alvanley.

"As witness my hand this the 6th day of January, 1899. "Joseph Baxter.

"(Witnesses) Thos. Clare and J. J. Shaw."

To the credit of the deceased in the society at the time of his death was £120. plus interest at £1 10s. 5d.

John Baxter, on the death of the deceased, applied to the society for payment, but was refused on the ground that, as the amount standing to the deceased's credit exceeded £100, the nomination was invalid.

On the 1st of December, 1901, a grant of letters of of administration was issued to the deceased's sister as his next-of-kin, she having sworn that the deceased died intestate, and on the 2nd of February, 1902, the society paid over to her the sum of £121 10s. 5d.

The court was now moved, on behalf of John Baxter, to revoke the grant of letters of administration and to pronounce for the nomination paper of the 6th of January, 1899, as a will duly executed by the deceased in accordance with the provisions of the Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26).

Pritchard, for the administratrix, contended that the document could not be considered a will, as a will was essentially of a revocable character, and nominations under the Industrial Societies Act, 1893, s. 25, were not revocable.

Barnard, for the applicant, cited Bartholomew and Brown v. Henley, 3 Phillim. 317.

BARNES, J., in giving judgment, said that in his opinion the document was a testamentary one. It failed under the provisions of the Industrial Societies Act, 1893, to operate as a nomination paper. Under that Act a member of the society might, by writing under his hand, nominate a person or persons to whom his interest in the society was to go after his death, provided the amount credited to him in the books of the society did not at the time he executes the nomination exceed £100. An affidavit by the secretary of the society was to be filed to that effect. If this document had been operative as a nomination, sub-section 2 of section 25 of the Act of 1893 would have taken effect, and the document would not have been revocable by any will or codicil. But as the document was not operative as a nomination, the sub-section had no effect in this case; and that being so, there was no reason why it should not be accepted as a will. The two witnesses who signed it had made affidavits showing that the terms of the Wills Act were in effect complied with. The letters of administration which were granted to the sister of the deceased would therefore be revoked, and the document of the 6th of January, 1899, would be admitted as a will, and administration with the will annexed would be granted to the applicant as the sole beneficiary thereunder. The costs of both parties would come out of the estate.

Solicitors for the applicant, Grundy, Kershaw, Samson, & Co., for Linaker & Linaker, Runcorn.

Solicitors for the administratrix, F. Venn, for C. E. Nield, Liverpool.

---

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Admiralty. } Nov. 3, 7.

"THE HARMONIDES." (a.)

Ship—Collision—Assessment of damage—Value of vessel where no market value.

Where a vessel has been totally lost and there is no market value for her at the time immediately preceding her loss, the real test as to what she was worth is, What was her value to her owners as a going concern at the time she was lost?

This was a motion by way of appeal from the finding of the Liverpool District Registrar assessing the value of the steamship Waesland at £18,000 under the circumstances hereinafter appearing.

The question for the court was, what questions should be taken into consideration in order to arrive at the true value of the vessel. The facts of the case were as follows:

On the 5th of March, 1902, the steamship Harmonides ran into and sank in the St. George's Channel the steamship Waesland. The Waesland was an iron screw steamship of 4,856 tons gross, and on the 10th of April her owners and others brought an action of damage against the owners of The Harmonides, and the court held that vessel alone to blame.

On the 12th of May the owners of The Harmonides obtained a decree limiting their liability at £8 per ton on 3,391 tons to £27,128 with interest at 4 per cent. from the date of the collision until payment into court. The claims brought in for assessment amounted to £80,477 13s. 5d., which sum included an item of £31,640 claimed as the value of The Waesland and her stores.

Before the Liverpool District Registrar objection was taken to the sum at which The Waesland was valued.

Evidence was then given that the vessel was built in 1867, at Glasgow, by Messrs. J. & G. Thomson, for the Cunard Line, being then called The Russia, of 2,920 tons.

In 1879 she was purchased for £18,000 by the Société Anonyme de Navigation Belge-Americaine, of Antwerp, who owned her at the time she was lost.

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In 1880, Messrs. Harland & Woolf, of Belfast, lengthened her, and she was re-engined by Messrs. John & James Thomson, of Glasgow, at a total cost of £50,531.

In 1889 she was fitted with triple expansion engines, of 582 nominal horse-power, at a cost of £23,295, making a total sum expended upon her of £91,826. Six per cent. was deducted from this sum for depreciation, and a sum of £1,508 7s. 2d. added for stores, less £80 for boats salved, bringing the net value of the vessel, her stores and outfit, to £31,205 7s. 2d.

At the time of her loss The Waesland was insured for £30,000 upon a value of £40,000, and, adding the proportion of the net premium from the date of the collision to the expiry of the insurance, £435 2s. 11d., together with £310 9s. 5d. as the net freight at risk and lost by the collision, the total claim amounted to £31,950 19s. 6d. The official Admiralty valuer, after valuing the particulars of The Waesland as set out in Lloyds' book, fixed her "market" value at the time of her loss exclusive of equipment for passengers at £16,500.

On the 6th of August, 1902, the registrar in his report assessed the total claims at £67,734 9s. 11d., the value of The Waesland being fixed at £18,000, with an addition of £310 9s. 5d., being the amount of net freight lost and £1,508 7s. 2d. for stores, less £80 for boats salved, or a total of £19,738 16s. 7d. The owners of The Waesland appealed as to so much of the report as dealt with their claim, and on the 3rd of November, by consent, the appeal to increase the sum of £18,000 to £29,777 came on for hearing by motion, and an application was then made by affidavit to add to the £29,777 a sum of £1,426, being the value of the refrigerating machinery which had previously been left out of consideration; and on the hearing of the motion evidence on behalf of the appellants was given as to The Waesland's success in earning profits for her owners, and further it was contended that the "market" value was not the true test, for if the ship was taken out of the particular trade for which she was intended (namely, the Atlantic trade) she would very likely have to be sold at a breaking up price. On behalf of the respondents evidence was called as to what was the market value of the vessel, and evidence was given that in the opinion of the witnesses she was an obsolete Atlantic liner, and if sold would fetch little more than scrap-iron, and in view of the alterations in structure since her building she was nothing more nor less than an abortion.

Pickford, K.C., and Lewis Noad, in support of the motion, on behalf of the owners of The Waesland, the appellants.

Aspinall, K.C., and Stubbs, contra, for the respondents.

BARNES, J., in giving judgment, said: The owners of The Waesland in the limitation suit claimed to have their vessel valued at the sum of £31,640, that sum including stores on the voyage outward; and it was objected on the reference by the cargo-owners of The Waesland, or some of them, that the value placed on The Waesland was too high, because if they could reduce that value their dividends would be larger. Thereupon a contest arose as to what was the true value to be placed on The Waesland for the purpose of her owners claiming a share of the fund in court. The litigation in this court has, I think, been brought about by the case being treated too scantily before the district registrar, and I therefore considered it desirable that further evidence should be called before me, and now that I have seen the witnesses I think I am in a much better position to deal with the case than the registrar was when it was before him. There is no real dispute between the parties as to the principle upon which the matter should be dealt with. I entirely concur with the observations which were cited from the case of The Ironmaster, Swa. 441, 8 W. R. Adm. Dig. 21. There is no doubt that in this class of case the best evidence is that of those who know the ship, and the next best evidence is that of those who have experience of the market, but who do not know the vessel except from the shipping records. There are other criteria, such as the amount of profits and so forth. All these matters have to be considered, to my mind, when it impossible to say that there is a real market test of the value of such a vessel as this. If one goes to the root of the matter it is obvious that what the shipowners lose if a vessel like this is run into and sunk is what it would cost to replace them in the position they were in before the accident. But where a ship like this has gone to the bottom, you cannot, speaking from a business point of view, replace them in the position they were in before, because you cannot replace the vessel which is at the bottom of the sea; you cannot buy another like her in the market; you cannot get another made immediately; and if you bought another ship she would be new, and consequently more valuable, because she would start as a new ship from that day, and therefore you would have to discount her value down. So that the real test, where there is no market, is, as counsel on both sides agree, what is the value to the owners, as a going concern, at the time the vessel was sunk. You cannot get at this with any great certainty, for you cannot get at it from the market value. Possibly, for such a ship at such a time there would be no buyers, and she would have to be sold for old iron. You cannot deal with it like an ordinary commodity being sold every day. You must look at it and see what is the loss to the owners. It has been pointed out that you may look at the original cost plus the money expended on her, and so forth. That is of assistance, but it is not complete assistance, because it is a rough and ready method. You may look and see also how the ship is paying.

That, however, is not a complete test, because you cannot be sure that the way she has been paying will continue. But one thing is absolutely certain—viz., you cannot say the test is her market value. I think the registrar has come to an erroneous view about this case because he has not had it sufficiently threshed out before him. I have considered it with great care, and by the light of the class of ship, and of the considerations which ought to be taken into account in arriving at what the ship was really worth to her owners, my opinion is that the appellants have not overstated their case. I think the vessel was worth £31,000, and I therefore propose to vary the report by increasing the sum of £18,000 to £31,000. The appellants to have their costs of appeal.

Solicitors for the owners of "The Waesland," Hill, Dickinson, & Dickinson, for Hill & Roberts, Liverpool.

Solicitors for respondents, the owners of part cargo on board "The Waesland," Stokes & Stokes, for Batesons, Warr, & Wimshurst, Liverpool.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div.
(Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) } Feb. 3.

WAKEFIELD CORPORATION v. COOKE AND OTHERS. (a.)

Local government—Street—Paving expenses—Decision of justices that street is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large—Res judicata—Wakefield Corporation Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. lxxi.), ss. 29, 30 31—Private Street Works Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 57), ss. 6, 7, 8.

Upon an objection by the owners of premises in a street to a scheme for certain private street works which the local authority proposed to execute under a local Act (which contained provisions identical with sections 6, 7, and 8 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892), the justices decided that the street was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, and upheld the objection. Subsequently the local authority proposed to execute private street works in the street under a different scheme.

Held, upon objection taken by the owners of premises in the street, that the matter was res judicata, by reason of the former determination of the justices.

Reg. v. Hutchins, 29 W. R. 724, 6 Q B. D. 300, distinguished.

Judgment of the Divisional Court (50 W. R. 254, [1902] 1 K. B. 188) reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., and Darling and Channell, JJ.) upon a special case stated by justices for the city of Wakefield: reported in 50 W. R. 254, [1902] 1 K. B. 188.

At a meeting of the general works committee of the corporation of Wakefield in November, 1900, a resolution was passed in pursuance of section 29 of the Wakefield Corporation Act, 1887,* that the corporation should do the following private street works in the private street known as Sludge-lane, extending from Eastmoor-road for a distance of 350 yards—namely, sewer, level, metal, flag, kerb, channel, and make good the street. This resolution was confirmed at a meeting of the corporation, and at a subsequent meeting of the committee the city surveyor laid before the committee a specification of the works, with plans, an estimate of the probable expense, and a provisional apportionment of the estimated expenses among the premises liable to be charged therewith. The committee recommended the corporation to approve the same, and at a subsequent meeting of the corporation a resolution was passed approving thereof, and the resolution was duly published and copies thereof served on the owners of the premises specified in the provisional apportionment. Several of the owners of the said premises duly objected to the proposals of the corporation on the grounds (1) that Sludge-lane was not and did not form part of a street within the meaning of the Act; and (2) that Sludge-lane was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

The justices, upon the application of the corporation after the time limited for sending in objections had expired, appointed a time for hearing and determining the objections, and upon the objections coming on for hearing it was contended on behalf of the objectors that the matter was res judicata by reason of a decision of certain justices of the city of Wakefield on the 6th of January, 1898, that Sludge-lane was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, which decision was pronounced upon a similar objection raised by the owners of premises in Sludge-lane upon a scheme then brought forward by the corporation for executing private street works in Sludge-lane under the Wakefield Corporation Act, 1887.

It was admitted as a fact that the resolution, plans, and notices for the works on the second occasion related not only to so much of Sludge-lane as was the subject-matter of the proceedings of the 6th of January, 1898, but also to an additional length of eighty yards in a straight line and continuous therewith. The same objectors were present or represented at the hearing on the second occasion as were present or represented at the hearing on the 6th of January, 1898, except that one objector on the second occasion was not an objector at the former hearing, though he was then the owner of the same property. Some of the other properties had changed hands, but the owners were present or represented on both occasions.

It was contended on behalf of the objectors that, as the court of summary jurisdiction on the 6th of January, 1898, had found as a fact that Sludge-lane was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, and as the parties—namely, the corporation and the owners of the property abutting on the road—were the same, the matter was res judicata, and the corporation were, therefore, estopped in the present proceedings by the determination of the court on the 6th of January, 1898.

It was contended on behalf of the corporation, on the authority of Reg. v. Hutchins, 29 W. R. 724, 6 Q. B. D. 300, that the court on the 6th of January, 1898, had no power to try the question whether Sludge-lane was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, that the subject-matter was not the same by reason of the corporation having taken a greater length of road than on the previous occasion and proposing to do the work in a different manner, and that the parties were not the same, as some of the properties had changed hands since the previous hearing, and one owner objected now who did not object then. The corporation further urged that they had discovered and intended to adduce in evidence certain additional facts relevant to the objection that Sludge-lane was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

The justices were of opinion that the principle of Reg. v. Hutchins did not apply, as the question determined by the justices on both occasions was whether Sludge-lane was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, and that the fact that the corporation extended the portion of the road, the manner in which it was proposed to be dealt with, the change of ownership of some of the property, and the fact that one of the owners objected on the second occasion and not on the former, did not affect directly the question between the parties and immediately before the court.

They were also of opinion that the objection that Sludge-lane was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large referred to in the proceedings on the second occasion was the same question which was decided on the former occasion, and they therefore determined that the matter was res judicata and declined to go into the merits of the objection, and ordered the corporation to pay the costs of the objectors.

The question was whether the justices were right in law.

The Divisional Court held that the matter was not

* Sections 29, 30, and 31 of the Wakefield Corporation Act, 1887, are identical with sections 6, 7, and 8 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-Law.

res judicata, and that the previous determination was no bar to the present proceedings.

The objectors appealed.

Danckwerts, K.C., and J. A. Compston, for the objectors.—The procedure under the Wakefield Corporation Act, 1887, which is the same as under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, is wholly different from that under the Public Health Act, 1875, upon which Reg. v. Hutchins, was decided by the Court of Appeal, reversing the decision of the Divisional Court (28 W. R. 595, 5 Q. B. D. 353). The present Act gives an opportunity for all the frontagers to take objection to the proposed works before they are commenced, and the provisions in the Act indicate that the decision of the court, upon an objection, for instance, that the street is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, is to be final. On the 6th of January, 1898, the status of Sludge-lane was determined once for all. It is similar to the adjudication of justices as to the settlement of a pauper: Reg. v. Hartington Middle Quarter, 3 W. R. 285, 4 E & B. 780.

They also referred to Reg. v. Haughton, 1 W. R. 164, 1 E. & B. 501; Reg. v. Blakemore, 2 Den. C. C. 410; Reg. v. Hickling, 7 Q. B. 880.

Macmorran, K.C., and Senior, for the corporation.—The change in procedure under the Wakefield Corporation Act, 1887, has not altered the law as laid down in Reg. v. Hutchins, that a decision of justices, upon an objection that the street is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, does not create a res judicata so as to raise an estoppel in subsequent proceedings. The justices had no jurisdiction directly to decide that the street was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. The only alteration has been in the procedure. Formerly an objection could only be taken after the works had been completed and the apportionment made. Now the objection must be taken before the works are begun. The objection, however, is the same, though the time when it must be taken is altered, and the decision of justices upon this objection has the same consequences as before. All that the justices had to do on the 6th of January, 1898, was, if they upheld the objection, to quash the resolution for the works. There was no such final determination as would raise an estoppel. The justices had no jurisdiction to determine any question of title, but only to say whether or not the objection was well founded: Attorney-General for Trinidad v. Eriché, [1893] A. C. 518.

They also referred to Rishton v. Haslingden Corporation, [1898] 1 Q. B. 294, 46 W. R. Dig. 108.

Danckwerts, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I regret to say that I have arrived at a different conclusion from that at which the Divisional Court arrived. The judgment of the court, delivered by the Lord Chief Justice, is really based upon the decision in Reg. v. Hutchins, and he says that the provisions of the Wakefield Corporation Act, 1887, have not altered the law as laid down in that case. The present special case was stated in respect of proceedings under a local Act, which is in terms, so far as material to the present case, identical with the Private Street Works Act, 1892. Although the Private Street Works Act, 1892, is an Act which, though a public Act, only applies if adopted by the urban authority, I think that the Legislature, by passing the Act, indicated their view with respect to these matters, and it is not an unreasonable inference to draw from the sections in that Act that the Legislature when it passed the Act intended to furnish a means of dealing with the difficulties of procedure which in times gone by had become apparent. With regard to all those various matters the doing of which is cast upon the local authority in the interests of the inhabitants of the locality, it has been found desirable that as much finality as is possible should be obtained at the earliest possible date. If the then existing procedure was of such a nature that an objection to the proposed works could not be tested until the works had been completed and the expense incurred, it is obvious that it was a great misfortune both to the local authority and to the persons objecting to the works. In that state of things it has occurred again and again that some person took an objection which was merely personal to himself after the works had been completed and the expenses incurred. In other cases the objection taken was one which went to the root of the right of the local authority to execute the particular works. For instance, an objection that the alleged street is not a street within the meaning of the Act, or that it is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, is an objection that is not merely personal to the objector, but one which goes to the root of the whole matter and strikes at the right of the local authority to put in force their statutory powers. This being the nature of the objections that could be made, it was obviously inconvenient, if the objection was of a personal nature—for instance, that the particular objector had been wrongly included as a frontager, or that a particular frontager had been wrongly excluded—that a work for the benefit of the whole of the district should have to be abandoned by reason of such a defect in the scheme. We have to construe the legislation in such a way as, if possible, to provide a remedy for the defects which were obviously in the mind of the Legislature when it passed the Act of 1892. In the case of Reg. v. Hutchins, the decision seems to me to have been simply that in the particular case the only power the justices had was to decide whether or not a particular person ought to be ordered to pay a sum of money. There was no authority given by the Act under discussion in that case, to deal directly with any other question; and in these circumstances the question whether the street was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, though collaterally and incidentally it had to be raised and determined, was not the subject-matter of direct decision before the justices. In addition to that, the objection was one which was made by a frontager on his own account, and, though the decision might raise an estoppel as between the same parties, the objection was not in form one which would bind the other frontagers or the local authority as representing the inhabitants of the district. I mention this last matter because I think that upon that ground Lord Selborne, who delivered the judgment of the court, differed from Lush and Field, JJ., in the court below. The latter dealt with the case somewhat upon the lines of Reg. v. Haughton and Reg. v. Hartington Middle Quarter, which were decisions of a public matter, and it was held that in cases like that the finding ought to be treated as conclusive evidence in every court. If not in form a judgment in rem, it was so in all its essentials. It affected a status in which the whole of the public were interested. In the present case we have a decision of a competent court upon the application of a public body having a duty in the matter. Lord Selborne, I think, inferred that that could not be said in the case of Reg. v. Hutchins, where the justices had only to say whether a certain person should pay a sum of money, though in considering that question they had to decide a collateral and incidental matter—namely, whether a certain street was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. That was not a direct decision as to the status of the highway like the decisions in the cases I have referred to. I accept entirely the decision in Reg. v. Hutchins, and in what I am saying I am following the spirit as well as the letter of that decision. I am far from saying that, if the objection in the present case had arisen now without fresh legislation, this court would not have been bound to follow that decision. I desire also to add that in the case of Attorney-General for Trinidad v. Eriché it seems to me that the judgment of the Privy Council takes exactly this view of the decision in Reg. v. Hutchins, and the view which I have tried to enunciate as to what is a decision binding upon all courts.

I now turn to the Wakefield Corporation Act, 1887. It cannot be denied that the state of the law at the time when Reg. v. Hutchins was decided was very unsatisthere was a waste of money and time. It was also very factory. Whatever mode of objection was adopted, desirable that it should be possible in proper cases to obtain a decision once for all binding upon every one. Section 30 of the same Act states the nature of the objections that may be made to the proposals of the corporation. Objections (a), that the alleged street is not a street within the meaning of the Act, and (b), that the street is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, are root objections—that is to say, they are of such a character that nothing can cure them. The other objections specified in section 30—namely, (c), (d), (e), and (f), are such as can be remedied. Then comes section 31. It seems to me that it is impossible to read that section without seeing that it is a section drawn with reference to the specified objections set forth in section 30 as being the objections which must be made within the limited time. If the objection is a root objection, the justices are intended to deal with it by allowing or negativing it; if it is not a root objection, but one which can be put right, the justices may, and ought, to apply the remedy indicated in section 31. It might be that the best remedy in some cases would be to begin all over again, because to go on upon the old lines might lead to confusion; or the defect might be possible of correction, as, for instance, by striking out or adding the name of a frontager. It is obvious that the Legislature intended that the objections should be once for all dealt with, and they should be dealt with, not with the object of defeating the scheme and depriving the locality of the benefit of it, unless indeed the objection is fatal to the scheme. In my judgment, if there is an objection, such as the one in this case—namely, that the street is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, and that, therefore, the proposed works are not within the jurisdiction of the local authority—the Act intended that the decision should be pronounced once for all. I do not myself see that any evil consequences will follow from so holding. The Legislature having provided for every person affected being present, and having given the justices power to quash or amend the resolutions, plans, &c., it is in the interests of everyone that the objection should be decided once for all. I do not think there is anything in Reg. v. Hutchins which prevents us from coming to that conclusion. It is, in my opinion, the natural inference to be drawn from the words of the Act. The appeal must accordingly be allowed, and the decision of the justices must be upheld.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am not prepared to differ from the conclusion arrived at by the other members of the court, but at the same time I feel bound to say that I have considerable doubts whether the effect of section 31 of the Wakefield Corporation Act, 1887, is as extensive as it is now stated to be. I doubt whether it does more than provide a speedy means of allowing the scheme of the corporation to proceed, and for that purpose only of having objections to the proposed works decided. I doubt whether the Legislature intended to leave it to justices to decide once for all whether a particular street was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. But as my lord and my brother Mathew are agreed, I do not differ.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that the case of Reg. v. Hutchins is applicable, because in the first place it was a decision upon a different statute, the Public Health Act, 1875, under which the liability to pay the apportioned expenses had to be determined in each individual case, and it was open to each person to raise a variety of objections. That was found to be a most inconvenient state of things, the procedure taking the form of proceedings to recover the apportioned expenses from the individual. The Queen's Bench Division in Reg. v. Hutchins held that, as the decision of the justices that the street was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large was between the same parties, it was conclusive of the matter upon the second application and could not be raised again. When the case came before the Court of Appeal, it was there held that the justices had on the first occasion no jurisdiction to adjudicate directly upon the question whether the street was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, that it was at the most a matter incidentally cognizable by them, there being other persons affected by the decision who were not before the court, and who had no opportunity of being heard, and that the only jurisdiction of the justices was to make or refuse an order for the payment of a sum of money. Lord Selborne there said: "To hold the Crown or the urban authority estoppel for ever from claiming payment of the defendants' quota of any other expenses of a like character afterwards incurred in respect of the same street because on the 7th of May, 1874, the justices in petty sessions held the street to be a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, would (if it were not really such a highway) be to deprive the other adjoining landowners, who were not parties or privies to the proceeding, of their statutable right to have a rateable contribution from the defendant and his successors in estate to all future expenses apportionable among all the adjoining landowners, under section 150 of the Public Health Act." Has that case any application to the present? It was decided in 1881. It is obvious that under that decision there was no finality about the matter, and so the Wakefield Corporation Act, 1887, was passed, and, what is more important, the Private Street Works Act, 1892, was passed later on. Elaborate precautions are taken in those Acts that the proceedings before the justices shall not be proceedings between the local authority and an individual. The Act provides for every frontager having any opportunity to raise objections to the proposed works, and of being heard before the justices upon the objections. In the present case the justices decided in 1898 that the street in question was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, and the corporation subsequently brought in a new scheme, and the objection that the street was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large was again taken. The justices held that the matter was res judicata, and refused to go into it. In my judgment the second proceedings were between the same parties as the former proceedings, and the justices were right. Sub-section 2 of section 31 seems to me strongly to bear out this view. The provisions in the Act enabling all the frontagers to raise objections to the proposed works, and for bringing them all before the court, and for putting a stop to any objection which could have been raised from being raised subsequently, all point to a decision binding upon everyone. For these reasons I think that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the objectors, S. F. Taylor, for J. B. Cooke, Wakefield.

Solicitors for the corporation, Sharpe, Parker, Pritchards, Barham, & Lawford, for C. J. Hudson, Wakefield.

---

From K. B. Div.
(Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) Jan. 31.

MERCER v. LIVERPOOL, ST. HELEN'S, AND SOUTH LANCASHIRE RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Lands Clauses Acts—Injurious affection—Taking lands—Notice to treat—Lease of adjoining land subsequently to service of notice—Right of lessee to compensation for injurious affection—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), ss. 18, 68.

Where a notice to treat for land has been given under section 18 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, compensation must be assessed once for all under the notice both in respect of the land taken and also under section 68 for the injurious affection of other land belonging to the same owner, and the owner cannot, after the notice to treat and before the assessment of the compensation, grant a lease of or sell the land adjoining the land taken so as to confer upon the lessee or purchaser a right to claim compensation for the injurious affection of the land so leased or sold by the execution of the works.

Therefore, where, after the service of a notice to treat for land, and before the compensation had been assessed, the owner granted a lease of the adjoining land, and subsequently a sum was agreed upon between the owner and the undertakers as to the compensation payable to the owner under the notice to treat, the lessee is not entitled to compensation for the injurious affection of the demised land.

Judgment of Lord Alverstone, L.C.J. (50 W. R. 155, [1901] 2 K. B. 753), reversed.

Appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., at the trial without a jury of an action upon an award under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845: reported in 50 W. R. 155, [1901] 2 K. B. 753.

The following are the facts of the case as set out in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice:

The action was brought by a Mrs. Mercer to recover the sum of £371 10s., the amount of an award made under the Lands Clauses Act, and the costs subject to taxation of the arbitration. The award was made on the 5th of March, 1897, in respect of the injurious affection of certain leasehold land and houses adjoining Birchley-street, St. Helen's, belonging to the plaintiff. The land in question forms part of the estate of Lord Gerard, and previously to the granting of the lease hereinafter referred to was in his possession as owner.

Before the year 1886 certain streets had been laid out and partially constructed, and at the time of the application to Parliament in 1886, hereinafter mentioned, a certain street known as Standish-street was already in existence. Certain other streets communicating with Standish-street, and among others Birchley-street, had already been laid out though not constructed. In the years 1885 (see St. Helen's and Wigan Junction Act, 1885, 48 & 49 Vict. c. cxxi.) and 1886 applications were made to Parliament by the predecessors of the defendant company for powers to construct a railway from St. Helen's to Wigan, and by the St. Helen's and Wigan Junction Act, 1886 (50 Vict. c. xxxiii.), s. 4, powers were granted to construct, among others, Railway No. 4, in the township of Windle, commencing by a junction with a certain other line of railway, and terminating at or near the intersection of College-street and Corporation-street, which is a short distance to the south of Standish-street. In the passage of that Bill through Parliament an agreement was come to by Lord Gerard and the promoters which was embodied in section 13 of the Act of 1886. By sub-section 3 of that section the company became bound within twelve months from the passing of the Act to purchase certain land, indicated upon a certain plan, and the section contained provisions (sub-sections 4, 5, and 6) whereby the company were to take the land, and make, sewer, and flag half of Birchley-street, construct a bridge to carry the railway over Standish-street, and, by sub-section 13, lower the other streets and adjoining building land to correspond with the streets which had to be lowered to be passed under the railway. The Act incorporated the Lands Clauses Acts, and section 21 contained the usual limits of three years for exercising the compulsory powers.

By the St. Helen's and Wigan Junction Railway Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. xci.), the name of the company was changed to the Liverpool, St. Helen's, and South Lancashire Railway Co. (section 4), and the twelve months mentioned in section 13, sub-section 3, of the Act of 1886 was extended for one year from the 26th of July, 1889, to the 26th of July, 1890 (section 18); and by the Liverpool, St. Helen's, and South Lancashire Railway Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict c. cxv.), the powers of compulsory purchase under the Acts of 1885 and 1886, which had become vested in the defendants, were extended until the 20th of July, 1893. But there was no further extension of the twelve months mentioned in the said section 13.

Prior to the year 1891 nothing had been done by the railway company to carry out the agreement embodied in section 13 of the Act of 1886. On the 23rd of October, 1891, the defendants served upon Lord Gerard a notice to treat to take the land necessary for the railway. The plan annexed to the notice to treat was for the purpose of this case identical with the plan referred to in section 13 of the Act of 1886. The notice did not refer to section 13, nor was it in any way given under that section: it was an ordinary notice to treat given by the defendants under their compulsory powers to acquire compulsorily the land shown upon the plan. On the 12th of January, 1892, Lord Gerard sent in his claim under the notice to treat. This claim was made subject to and upon the basis of the company carrying out the provisions of section 13 of the Act of 1886.

In the month of February, 1892, Lord Gerard's agent agreed with one John Gleave, the predecessor in title of the plaintiff, to let him certain land on the east side of Birchley-street opposite the land in respect of which notice had been given by the railway company for a term of 999 years. The land was let for the purpose of building. On the 14th of June, 1892, a lease was granted pursuant to that agreement, the term reserved being from the 1st of January, 1892, and the lease contained provisions that the lessees should within twelve calendar months build a certain number of houses upon the land demised. Some of the houses were in fact built during the summer of 1892, and some of those houses were occupied by tenants of Gleave prior to October, 1892.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 14th of October, 1892, an agreement was made between Lord Gerard and the defendants in respect of the land included in the notice to treat, and under that agreement Lord Gerard agreed to sell the land shown upon the plan annexed to the notice to treat, a copy of which was also annexed to the agreement, for the sum of £23,000, such sum to include all satisfaction and compensation for all damages sustained by the vendor by reason of the severing of the property purchased from the vendor from the vendor's other property, or otherwise injuriously affecting such other property by the exercise of the statutory powers. By clause 4 of the agreement the purchase was to be completed on the 30th of November, 1892. The agreement provided, by clause 6, that the company should make, sewer, flag, and channel the western half of Birchley-street. The purchase was not completed on the date contemplated. In 1893 Lord Gerard commenced proceedings to obtain specific performance of the agreement of the 14th of October, 1892, and subsequently, upon the 27th of February, 1894, a deed of conveyance was executed by Lord Gerard, whereby, after reciting that the defendants had agreed with him, the vendor, for the purchase of the land thereinafter conveyed, and among others of the rights conferred by section 13, sub-section 3, of the Act of 1886, for the sum of £24,299, which sum it had been agreed should include all satisfaction and compensation for all damages sustained by the vendor, or by reason of the severance of the property purchased from the vendor's other property, or otherwise injuriously affecting such other property by the exercise of the statutory powers, Lord Gerard conveyed the land the subject of the notice to treat to the defendants.

Subsequently to October, 1894, the defendants contructed the railway, lowered the level of Standish-street and of the northern end of Birchley-street so as to bring it to the same level at the junction of Standish-street with an upward incline towards the south, and put up a retaining wall to support the plaintiff's houses. The result of these operations by the defendants was that the access to the plaintiff's houses was permanently interfered with.

On the 12th of November, 1895, the plaintiff gave a notice claiming compensation for injurious affection under the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Act, and appointed an arbitrator, and, the usual formalities having been observed, the umpire in due course made his award, awarding to the plaintiff the sum of £371 10s. in respect of the damage and injury sustained by the plaintiff in or to her lands, messuages, and hereditaments by reason of the execution of the works of the company, and by reason of such lands, messuages, and hereditaments being injuriously affected.

Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., held that the service of the notice to treat did not prevent the owner of the property, to which the notice to treat related, from dealing with property other than that included in the notice, and that a person who bonâ fide acquired an interest in such other property was not deprived of his right to compensation for injurious affection by works subsequently executed simply because the defendants had made a settlement with the vendor in respect of the land taken and injurious affection of his other property. He accordingly gave judgment for the amount of the award.

The defendants appealed.

Horridge, K.C., and J. K. F. Cleave (McCall, K.C., with them), for the defendants.—The notice to treat fixes the date at which all the compensation is to be assessed. In the case of land about to be taken the owner cannot create a new interest in it after the service of the notice to treat so as to make that new interest a subject for compensation: Ex parte Edwards, 19 W. R. 1047; Wilkins v. Mayor, &c., of Birmingham, 32 W. R. 118, 25 Ch. D. 78. The landowner cannot throw a greater burden on the undertakers than was imposed upon him at the date of the notice to treat. That doctrine applies to land not taken as well as to land taken. The compensation, whether for lands taken or for lands injuriously affected, must be assessed once for all under the notice to treat, with the possible exception of damage which was not and could not have been foreseen: Croft v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 11 W. R. 360, 3 B. & S. 436, and Todd v. Metropolitan District Railway Co., 19 W. R. 720. Therefore the land which adjoined that taken by the defendants from Lord Gerard, and which was demised after the service of the notice to treat, was not the subject-matter for compensation to the lessee under section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. All compensation had been assessed once for all at the sum agreed to be paid to Lord Gerard.

They also referred to Cowper Essex v. Acton Local Board, 38 W. R. 209, 14 App. Cas. 153.

Cripps, K.C., and W. D. McConkey, for the plaintiff.—The notice to treat only binds the land included in it and prohibits the owner from creating a new interest in that land so as to render that new interest a subject for compensation. It does not affect land other than that included in the notice. If it did, the effect would be to prevent a landowner from dealing with his land. The date to be looked at is the date at which the compensation is assessed under the notice to treat. The amount of the compensation has to be assessed as at that date: Adams v. London and Blackwall Railway Co., 2 Mac. & G. 118; Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. v. Evans, 15 Beav. 322; and Reg. v. Poulter, 36 W. R. 117, at p. 118, 20 Q. B. D. 132, at p. 138 (Fry, L.J.). If a landowner sold his adjoining land after the date of the notice to treat and before the assessment of the compensation, he could not get compensation for the injurious affection of that land. The purchaser would get compensation. It is clear that if the landowner has been paid compensation and then disposes of part of his land, the assignee cannot claim any compensation. The reason is that the date of the assessment of the compensation is the date at which the right of all parties to compensation is fixed. Lord Gerard therefore, having leased the adjoining land to the plaintiff for 999 years before the date when the compensation was assessed, had no claim to compensation for injurious affection of it, and the sum agreed to be paid to him by the defendants did not include such compensation. Even if it did, it could not affect the plaintiff's right to compensation.

They also referred to Harding v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 20 W. R. 321, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 154.

McCall, K.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 31.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I have had the advantage of reading the judgment written by Stirling L.J., and I so entirely agree with it that I do not think any useful purpose would be served by delivering a judgment of my own. I desire, however, to add one observation after the judgments of my brethren have been delivered.

STIRLING, L.J., read the following judgment: The material facts to be borne in mind are these. On the 23rd of October, 1891, the defendants served on Lord Gerard, the owner in fee, under their special Acts, a notice to treat in respect of certain specified lands, the notice in accordance with section 18 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, demanding from him particulars of his estate and interest in such lands and of the claims made by him in respect thereof, and stating that the defendants were willing to treat for the purchase thereof and as to compensation to be made for damage that might be sustained by reason of the execution of the works. On the 12th of January, 1892, Lord Gerard sent in his claim. On the 14th of October, 1892, an agreement was made between Lord Gerard and the defendants as to the amount of the compensation, and on the 27th of February, 1894, a conveyance of the land by Lord Gerard to the defendants was executed. On the 14th of June 1892, before the above-mentioned agreement was made or the conveyance was executed, a lease was granted by Lord Gerard to the plaintiff of building land, not comprised in the notice to treat, on which the plaintiff proceeded to erect houses. It is to be taken that the plaintiff had no knowledge of the notice to treat having been served when the lease was granted; nor had the railway company any notice of the lease when the agreement with Lord Gerard was entered into or the conveyance executed. Subsequently to the date of the conveyance the defendants executed works which necessitated the lowering of a street on which the plaintiff's land abutted, and thereby injuriously affected such land. The plaintiff thereupon claimed from the defendants compensation under section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and the sum of £371 10s. was by the award of an arbitrator found as the amount of compensation. The question is whether the plaintiff is entitled to this amount.

No case has been cited which exactly covers the point which arises for decision; but the effect of a notice to treat as regards lands proposed to be taken has been frequently considered. The result of the decisions appears to me to be stated with perfect accuracy by Kindersley, V.C., in Haynes v. Haynes, 9 W. R. 497, at p. 499, 1 Dr. & Sm. 426, at p. 450: "I consider that the notice to treat constitutes, as between the landowner and the company, the relation of vendor and purchaser to a certain extent and for certain purposes (that is the language of Lord Cottenham in Adams v. London and Blackwall Railway Co., 2 Mac. & G. 118, at p. 129), and that some of the consequences which flow from an actual contract also follow upon the notice to treat; such as that the particular lands which the company are to take, and which the landowner must give up to the company after certain steps prescribed by the Act shall have been taken, are fixed, and that neither party can get rid of the obligation, the one to take and the other to give up the lands specified in the notice; and that such is the meaning to be attributed to those expressions, which may have dropped from learned judges, which seem to intimate that it is a contract; but in no other sense and to no further extent does the notice constitute a contract, at least on the part of the landowner." It is, at the same time, to be observed that the rights and obligations created by the service of a notice to treat, if they fall short in some respects of those which arise under an ordinary contract of sale, are in other respects much greater. For example, under section 85 of the Land Clauses Act, 1845, the promoters may, upon complying with the requirements of the section and before the purchase-money has even been ascertained, enter upon and use the lands; and it has been expressly decided that after such entry a railway company has a legal interest in the land: Worsley v. South Devon Railway Co., 16 Q. B. 539; see also the observation of Lord Campbell in Marquis of Salisbury v. Great Northern Railway Co., 17 Q. B. 840, at p. 849, and the remarks of Lord Bramwell in advising the House of Lords in Tiverton and North Devon Railway Co. v. Loosemore, 32 W. R. 929, at p. 937, 9 App. Cas. 480, at p. 511. Indeed, it seems to me on principle that the rights and obligations so created, being derived from a statute, must of necessity be legal, in the sense that courts of law no less than courts of equity are bound to recognize and give effect to them. Now, at law, a contract for the sale of land creates merely a personal obligation between the vendor and purchaser, and does not bind the land. In equity such a contract binds the land, and that not only as against the vendor, but also as against all persons claiming under him with notice of the existence of the contract. On the other hand, legal rights and interests in and to land bind all persons, whether with notice or not; and I apprehend that rights and interests arising under a notice to treat fall within this rule. It is for this reason, as it seems to me, that it has been held that an interest in land, which has been created by the owner after service of a notice to treat, is not a subject for compensation under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845: see, for example, Ex parte Edwards; Wilkins v. Mayor, &c., of Birmingham. In accordance with the same principle it was laid down by Lord Romilly in Carnochan v. Norwich and Spalding Railway Co., 26 Beav. 169, that the purchaser of land in respect of which a railway company has served a proper notice to treat, and in respect of which the company has entered into possession, is "in truth but the purchaser of an interest in the purchase-money."

So far I have dealt only with the effect of the notice to treat with respect to land required to be taken. As regards compensation for damage to be sustained by the landowner by reason of the execution of the works, the scheme of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, appears to be that an assessment of such compensation shall be made once for all and finally; so that on payment of the compensation thus ascertained the promoters are to be free from all further claim by the landowner, except, possibly, in respect of damage entirely unforeseen by the parties: see Croft v. London and North-Western Railway Co.; Todd v. Metropolitan District Railway Co. It would entirely defeat this scheme if the landlord, after being paid such compensation, were to create interests in persons who could make claims for damage which the promoters were bound to include in the notice to treat and pay for in advance. It appears to me, therefore, that what the Legislature has done is to create in favour of the promoters of undertakings a right unknown to the common law—viz., a right upon certain conditions being satisfied to execute works so as to damage the property of a landowner on whom a notice to treat is served. This right is a legal as distinguished from an equitable, right, not indeed falling within the definition of an easement, but bearing a close analogy thereto. The result, therefore, would be that, if the compensation claimed by Lord Gerard had been ascertained and paid in precise accordance with the terms of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, the defendant company would have acquired a legal right to execute the work which they did; and it was admitted (and, in my opinion, properly admitted) by Mr. Cripps, in his argument that neither Lord Gerard nor any one claiming under him by an instrument executed subsequently to the assessment of compensation could have claimed any further compensation, except, perhaps (as I have said) in respect of damage entirely unforeseen.

It is said, however, that the case is different where the interest is created before the assessment of the compensation, because the damage is always ascertained at the date of assessment. If, for example, a claim for damage by severance is made, and if before assessment the landowner has sold the severed portions of his property, it is said that the landowner can recover no compensation for severance. This may be so; still, it does not seem to me that the case is concluded. According to this argument the right to compensation is made to depend on whether the landowner does or does not obtain compensation. But the case of Croft v. London and North-Western Railway Co. appears to me to show that the landowner after assessment under the notice to treat is precluded from claiming further compensation in respect of any matter which might have been brought forward at the time of the assessment, whether it was so brought forward in fact or not. After payment of the assessed compensation the right of the promoters to execute the work (with the possible exception already stated) is absolute, and being a legal right in the nature of an easement prevails against legal interests created by the landowner subsequently to the assessment and payment of compensation. This being so, it is difficult to see why the right of the promoters should not prevail against a legal title derived from the landowner subsequently to the notice to treat, but before the assessment of compensation. The landowner cannot escape from the obligations imposed on him by the notice to treat; and one of these is an obligation to bring forward and and have determined all claims in respect of damage to lands of his arising from the execution of the proposed works. If, as the cases already referred to show, he can only deal with the land which he is required to give up subject to the obligations imposed by the notice to treat, I do not see why he should be permitted to disregard those obligations when dealing with land which he is not required to give up, but which may be damaged by the execution of the works.

It remains to say a few words on the special circumstances of the present case. The Act of 1886 contained a clause (section 13) for the protection of the estate of Lord Gerard, of which sub-section 7 was in these terms: "The company shall, to the reasonable satisfaction of the owner, lower all the other streets and the adjoining building land to correspond with the streets which have to be lowered to be passed under the railway, and may use in making the railway the material which will have to be removed in performing these works." It appears from this sub-section that the possibility of damage to building land of Lord Gerard's by the lowering of streets was contemplated both by Lord Gerard and by the defendant company. By his claim of the 12th of January, 1892, Lord Gerard did not specify any amount of compensation as claimed in respect of such damage, but did say this: "The claim is made subject to the company carrying out the provisions contained in the 13th section of the St. Helen's and Wigan Junction Railway Act, 1886." By the agreement of the 14th of October, 1892, Lord Gerard agreed to sell the lands by the notice to treat required to be taken for £24,299, "such sum to include all satisfaction and compensation for all damage sustained by the vendor by reason of the severing of the property purchased from the vendor's other property or otherwise injuriously affecting such other property by the exercise of the powers of the said Acts." But it was provided that the agreement should not (save as expressly mentioned) in any wise alter or interfere with any of the rights of the vendor under provisions contained in the defendant company's Acts of 1885 and 1886 respectively for the protection of Lord Gerard or his estate therein referred to. By the conveyance of the 27th of February, 1894, Lord Gerard released the defendant company from the provisions of sub-section 8 of section 13 of the Act of 1886, but did not release them from the other sub-section. It therefore appears that the company and Lord Gerard came to terms (as they were entitled to do, see section 21 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845) as to the amount of compensation, and that under such agreement Lord Gerard received no money payment in respect of damage to arise from the lowering of his building land, but reserved to himself the right to insist on the performance by the company of the provisions of section 13, sub-section 7, of the Act of 1886. It is admitted by the defendants that, in accordance with that stipulation, they are liable to lower the site of the plaintiff's houses if they are called on by Lord Gerard so to do; but they insist that this is the sole right of Lord Gerard or the plaintiff in respect of what they have done in the execution of the powers conferred by the Act, so far as those relate to the lowering of streets. In my opinion, this contention is well founded, though unfortunately the existence of this obligation will not benefit the plaintiff. For these reasons I am unable, to my great regret, to agree with the decision of the Lord Chief Justice.

MATHEW, L.J., read the following judgment: At the time when the notice to treat was served on Lord Gerard, he was entitled, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, to require the company to lower the land laid out for building to the level of the streets mentioned in the statute. The object of imposing this obligation upon the company was to secure access to and from the streets to the houses proposed to be built on the estate. When the amount of compensation had to be settled, Lord Gerard was, it seems to me, no longer in a position to require the company to perform this statutory duty; for after the notice, houses had been built under leases which had been granted to the plaintiff and others, and those houses the company were under no obligation to remove. It was plain that without some further agreement the buildings might lose their access to the streets when lowered, and it would have been open to Lord Gerard, when negotiating with the railway company, to put forward any claim that he had on this account. But it is clear that no such claim was made. It is not necessary to consider why. The company were not informed upon the subject, and were not concerned to inquire. It may be that Lord Gerard was advised that any claim for loss of access had been transferred from him to his tenants. If this were the reason, the company, it seems to me, would be in no way prejudiced, and could not be supposed to have agreed that any part of the claim for compensation was to be reserved for future settlement. It was not disputed that, if Lord Gerard had himself built the houses in question, he would not be entitled to demand further compensation. The case of Croft v. London and North-Western Railway Co., is an authority upon this point, which does not seem to have been questioned. But it was contended for the plaintiff that, though the owner might have no claim, his tenants were in a different position. It was said that their leasehold interests gave them the right to be compensated for a depreciation of the value of their property by the execution of the company's works. It was admitted that after a notice to treat for land proposed to be taken by the company the owner could not create upon it independent interests. But it was urged that this principle did not apply to adjoining land which was not taken but was injuriously affected. But if this contention were well founded, the company might be compelled in such a case as the present to compensate tenants however numerous and whatever the terms of their tenancies might be. This would clearly be a position of grave hardship and difficulty to the railway company. In addition to the cost of litigating the various claims the company might be compelled to disburse a much larger amount than the value of the landowner's interest in the premises at the date of the notice to treat. I see no reason why the principle as to land taken by the company should not apply to land injuriously affected. It was asked in argument if a landowner was to be disabled from dealing with his adjoining land because of a mere proposal to indemnify for depreciation. The answer would seem to be that he is not so prohibited, but only that he is prevented from dealing with his land in such a way as to add to the burden of the company. It seems to me that either when the land is taken or when it is injuriously affected the owner cannot derogate from the obligation created by the notice to treat. It is true that he is not deprived of the possession of the adjoining land, but it may be said to be partly taken, in the sense that a portion of its value is lost by the exercise of the company's powers. There is a partial appropriation. It was said that there was no authority for the contention of the company. That would appear to be so, though it is probable that the claim might have been made in many cases. In my judgment in such a case as the present it must be regarded as a settled rule of law as between landowner and railway company that there can be but one proceeding for compensation, and that after notice to treat no onerous interest either in the land taken or in that injuriously affected can be created by the owner to the prejudice of the railway company. The appeal must be allowed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The observation which I wish to add to Stirling, L.J.'s, judgment is, that I cannot agree with the conclusion of the Lord Chief Justice that the agreement embodied in sub-section 7 of section 13 ceased by lapse of time to be of any effect after the date of the last statutory extension. I think that the limit of time might be, and was, waived by Lord Gerard, in whose favour it was introduced. It is true that Lord Gerard could not by waiver enlarge the obligation of the company. He could not compel them to pull down houses built after the lapse of time, but he could, in my judgment, insist on the performance of the other terms of the agreement, such as the lowering of the "other streets."

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Bell, Brodrick, & Gray, for J. Haslam Fox, St. Helen's.

Solicitors for the defendants, Maples, Teesdale & Co., for Oppenheim & Malkin, St. Helen's.

---

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) } July 4, 5, 28, 1902.

GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY CO v. TALBOT. (a.)

Railway company — "Accommodation works" — Level crossing—Extent of right of user—Grant of easement —Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), ss. 16, 68-76.

A railway company's line severed an owner's land and crossed on the level a tram-line of the owner by which goods and traffic from the owner's land and coals from a colliery not on his land were conveyed to a neighbouring port. The railway company, when purchasing the premises, entered into an agreement, dated the 13*th of March*, 1868, with the owner that they would construct and maintain, "for the accommodation of the owners and occupiers for the time being of the lands adjoining the railway," certain works, including a level crossing for the tram-line. The defendant, the owner's successor in title, afterwards claimed to be entitled to convey over the level crossing goods and traffic brought on to her land from other places, whether situate on her estate or not.

Held, that the defendant was not entitled to use the level crossing for the purpose of conveying goods and traffic so as substantially to increase the burden of the easement by altering or enlarging its character, nature, or extent as enjoyed at, or previously to, the date of the agreement of the 13*th of March*, 1868, or as since enjoyed by the defendant or her predecessors in title, if, owing to acquiescence or otherwise, such subsequent enjoyment was binding on the plaintiff company.

Dictum of Fitzgibbon, L.J., in Great Northern Railway Co. v. M'Alister, [1897] 1 Ir. R. 587, at p. 605, approved.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

The question raised was as to the extent of the defendant's right to use a level crossing over the plaintiffs' line at a point where a tramway belonging to the defendant crossed the plaintiffs' railway.

The facts of the case were stated in the judgment of the court as follows:

It appeared that the railway now vested in the plaintiff company was originally constructed in the neighbourhood of the place in question by the South Wales Railway Co. (incorporated by the South Wales Railway Act, 1845). The railway intersected the Talbot estate, of which the defendant was now the owner; and a contract was entered into between the South Wales Railway Co. and Mr. Christopher R. M. Talbot, the defendant's predecessor in title, for the purchase by the company of certain lands required by the company for the purposes of the undertaking, and it was at the same time agreed (as stated in the deed of the 13th of March, 1868, presently mentioned) that the company "should make certain works for the accommodation of the owners or owner for the time being of the lands adjoining their railway on both sides thereof where it intersected the lands of the said C. R. M. Talbot." The South Wales Railway Co. was amalgamated with the Great Western Railway Co. in 1863. Before the amalgamation the purchase-money for the land agreed to be sold was paid, and the accommodation works stipulated for were executed by the South Wales Railway Co., but no conveyance was made of the lands bought by that company. By two indentures dated the 13th of March, 1868, C. R. M. Talbot and other persons interested in the Talbot estate duly conveyed these lands to the Great Western Railway Co., and by a deed of even date, made between the Great Western Railway Co. of the first part, C. R. M. Talbot of the second part, Theodore Mansel Talbot of the third part, and William Llewellyn of the fourth part, the Great Western Railway Co. entered into covenants with the other parties that they, their successors and assigns, would from time to time and at all times thereafter maintain respectively all the works specified in the schedule thereto "for the accommodation of the owners and occupiers for the time being of the lands adjoining the said railway."

The schedule included the following:

"The level crossing for the highway to Courtycha Farm and Port Talbot. The level crossing for the railway leading from the Oakwood Ironworks to Port Talbot. The level crossing for the tramroad leading from the Margam Tinworks to Port Talbot."

At the date of the deed these three level crossings ran side by side. At present the two latter had been united into one, and it was as to it that the question arose.

(a.) Reported by H. W. LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It appeared on the face of the deed of covenant of the 13th of March, 1868, that the works specified in the schedule were executed in pursuance of an agreement between the railway company and the landowner whose lands were about to be intersected by the company's railway, and that those works were to be "for the accommodation of the owners and occupiers for the time being of the lands adjoining the railway."

The plaintiff company claimed a declaration that the defendant Miss Talbot was not entitled to use the level crossings for the purpose of bringing over them any goods or traffic from the Cwm Avon works or to or from any other works or place not served by one or other of the two lines of tramways which in 1868 passed over the level crossings; and an injunction to restrain any such user; and alternatively a declaration that the defendant was not entitled to use the level crossings except for the purpose of bringing goods or traffic to or from places on her own estate; and an injunction to restrain any other than such user.

The Cwm Avon works were situated on land belonging to the Earl of Jersey, not to the defendant.

The defendant claimed to be entitled to bring over the level crossings goods and traffic brought on to her land from the Cwm Avon works and other places, whether those places were or were not served by either of the tramways in 1868, and whether they were or were not situate on her own estate.

It appeared from the evidence that at and prior to the date of the deed of 1868, the tramroad leading from the Margam Tinworks to Port Talbot was, with the assent of Mr. Talbot, the defendant's predecessor, used for the purpose of bringing coals to Port Talbot from coal pits at Tewgoed situate on land belonging to the Earl of Jersey.

Kekewich, J., held that the deed of covenant was a grant by the plaintiff company to Mr. Talbot and his successors of the use of the level crossings for all time; that it was part of the price paid to him for the purchase of his land, and that the defendant was at liberty to use the level crossings for any purpose she pleased, provided the user did not interfere with the traffic of the plaintiff company; and he gave judgment for the defendant, with costs.

The Great Western Railway Co. appealed.

Cripps, K.C., P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Howard Wright, for the appellant company.—The level crossing is an "accommodation work" within section 68 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and as such its user is limited. It is for the accommodation of the landowners and occupiers whose lands are severed by the railway having regard only to the condition and user at the time the severance took place, and not to the state of things at present existing: Rhondda and Swansea Railway Co. v. Talbot, [1897] 2 Ch. 131; Midland Railway Co. v. Gribble, 44 W. R. 133, [1895] 2 Ch. 827; Reg. v. Brown, 15 W. R. 988, L. R. 2 Q. B. 630; London and North-Western Railway Co. v. Runcorn Rural District Council, 46 W. R. 121, [1898] 1 Ch. 34; Great Northern Railway Co. v. M'Alister, [1897] 1 Ir. R. 587. The cases of United Land Co. v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 23 W. R. 896, L. R. 10 Ch. App 586; Finch v. Great Western Railway Co., 28 W. R. 229, 5 Ex. D. 254; and Dand v. Kingscote, 6 M. & W. 174, are distinguishable, for these decisions turned upon the special words of the grants. The defendant is not entitled to bring traffic arising outside her own land across the plaintiffs' line.

Warrington, K.C., S. T. Evans, K.C., and Romer, for the defendant.—The question depends, not merely upon what statutory rights arise in respect of an "accommodation work," but upon the true construction of the contract between the parties. The effect of that contract was that the land required by the company (including the portion of the tram-road crossed by the railway) should be sold to them, but that the right of user of the tramway should continue as before, subject only to the reasonable user of the railway: United Land Co. v. Great Eastern Railway Co. There is nothing in the contract to limit the user of the level crossings, and the defendant is entitled to use them for any reasonable purpose, provided no additional burden is thereby imposed upon the plaintiff company.

They cited Williams v. James, 15 W. R. 928, L. R. 2 C. P. 577; Chadwick v. Marsden, 15 W. R. 964, L. R. 2 Ex. 285; and Mitcalfe v. Westaway, 13 W. R. 181, 34 L. J. C. P. 113.

July 28.—STIRLING, L.J., delivered the judgment of the court, and after stating the facts proceeded: By the group of clauses (sections 68-76) of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, under the heading "And with respect to works for the accommodation of lands adjoining the railway," the Legislature has imposed on railway companies an obligation to make and maintain such accommodation works in cases where the railway causes interruptions to the use of lands through which it is made; and by section 16 of the same Act powers for the purpose of constructing such works are conferred. On the other hand, the Legislature has not seen fit expressly to authorize a railway to make general grants and easements over lands acquired for the purpose of its undertaking; and in Mulliner v. Midland Railway Co., 27 W. R. 330, 11 Ch. D. 611, at p. 623, it was laid down by Sir G. Jessel, M.R., that (with some exceptions which do not affect the present question) a railway company has no right to sell, grant, or dispose of such land, or any easement, or right of way over it, except for the purpose of the company's Act—that is, with a view to the traffic of the company; and it was there held by him that a grant of such a right of way was ultra vires. The principle of this case was approved by Lord Blackburn in Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Oswald, 8 App. Cas. 623, at pp. 634, 635, 32 W. R. Dig. 112, and has recently been applied by the Court of Appeal in Great Western Railway Co. v. Solihull Rural District Council, 86 L. T. Rep. 852, 50 W. R. Dig. 65. Bearing these considerations in mind, we think that the natural meaning of the expression "works for the accommodation of owners of lands adjoining" the plaintiffs' railway in the deed of covenant is works of the kind contemplated by sections 68 to 76 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845; and that the object of the deed was to secure the maintenance by the plaintiff company of works which had been executed by their predecessors in title in order to fulfil the obligation imposed on them by those sections. Now, as is pointed out by Lindley, L.J., in Rhondda and Swansea Railway Co. v. Talbot, it has been decided in Reg. v. Fisher, 11 W. R. 59, 3 B. & S. 191, and Reg. v. Brown, that the "accommodation works which the company may be required to make are such accommodation works as are required at the time the land is taken, having regard to its then use, and not accommodation works which may be required when the character of the land, and perhaps the nature of the neighbourhood, is entirely altered years afterwards." Further, it has been decided, first by the Vice-Chancellor and then by the Court of Appeal in Ireland, in Great Northern Railway Co. v. M'Alister, that the landowner having obtained accommodation works (in that case, as in this, a level crossing) suitable for his land at a time when it was used for agricultural purposes, was not entitled to use the works for the purposes of traffic in minerals quarried from the same lands. In the course of his judgment FitzGibbon, L.J., thus defines the rights of the landowner: "The owner of the adjoining lands was entitled, when the railway was made, to a convenient passage over the railway sufficient to make good, so far as possible, any interruption which the construction of the railway caused by severance in the working of his farm, including, I should say, any alteration or extension of that working which could or ought to have been contemplated by the parties when the accommodation works were made and accepted." With that decision and definition we agree.

It appears that at and prior to the date of the deed of covenant the tramroad leading from the Margam Tinworks and Forges to Port Talbot extended beyond those works to a point where the River Avon is crossed by a bridge and was there connected with another tramroad, which crossed the bridge and ran on land belonging to Lord Jersey to certain coalpits at Tewgoed, demised by him to the same person who was lessee under Mr. C. R. M. Talbot of the Margam works; and further, that the tramway was used with the assent of Mr. Talbot for bringing goods, consisting principally of coal, from these pits, not only to the Margam works but also to Port Talbot, where the coal was shipped for the benefit of the lessee. The Margam works have been discontinued, but the defendant claims the right to bring over the level crossing goods and traffic from Tewgoed Colliery, and states that by so doing she will not increase the burden of any easement hitherto enjoyed by her or her predecessors in title over the crossing. The plaintiff company disputes the validity of this claim; but it seems to us that such a user must be taken to have been fairly within the contemplation of the parties at the time when the works were executed. The defendant, however, further claims in par. 6 of her defence, "to be entitled to bring over the said crossing in manner aforesaid, goods and traffic brought on to her land from other places, whether such places were or were not served by either of the said tramroads in the year 1868 or 1877, whether they are or are not situate on her estate." The defendant does not state that the burden of the easement hitherto enjoyed by her will not be increased by such user of the crossing, and we think it plainly may be, for if this claim be valid the defendant will be entitled to carry over this crossing the whole traffic of the recently constructed Port Talbot Railway, which has a station close to her level crossing. Such a case, in our opinion, goes far beyond anything which could have been within the contemplation of anyone when the works were made.

This conclusion does not seem to us to conflict with the decision in United Land Co. v. Great Eastern Railway Co., which turned on the provisions of a very special enactment requiring the railway company to construct such convenient communications over or under the railway as in the judgment of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests might be necessary for the convenient enjoyment and occupation of the lands there in question, which were common property.

We think, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed, and that an order ought to be made to the following effect: Discharge the order appealed from. Declare that the defendant is not entitled to use the level crossing in the pleadings mentioned for the purpose of conveying goods and traffic so as substantially to increase the burden of the easement by altering or enlarging its character, nature, or extent as enjoyed at or previous to the 13th of March, 1868, or as since enjoyed by the defendant or her predecessors in title, if, owing to acquiescence or otherwise, such subsequent enjoyment is now binding on the plaintiffs. And declare that the defendant is entitled to bring goods from the works in the pleadings mentioned across the level crossings substantially as the same were brought at or previous to the 13th of March, 1868, but so that the burden of the easement is not increased as aforesaid.

As regards the costs, if this declaration had been made in the court below, each party would in part have succeeded and in part failed. In this court the appellants succeed to a substantial extent. There will, therefore, be no order as to costs in the court below, but the respondent will be ordered to pay the appellants' costs of the appeal.

Solicitor of the appellants, R. R. Nelson.

Solicitors for the respondent, Cheston & Sons.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Byrne, J. } Nov. 4.

In re COOPER, COOPER, & JOHNSON (LIMITED). (a.)

Company — Winding up — Voluntary winding up — Scheme of arrangement involving reduction of capital —Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 104).

A reduction of capital involved by a scheme of arrangement must be carried out in accordance with the statutes specially dealing with reduction of capital.

Petition.

A receiver and manager of this company had been appointed in actions brought by debenture-holders, and this receiver and manager had also been appointed liquidator in the voluntary winding-up of the company.

A scheme of arrangement was prepared involving a reduction of the company's capital under the Companies Act, 1867 and 1877, and a resumption of business by the company with a reduced capital.

This petition was presented under the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, for obtaining the sanction of the court to the above-mentioned scheme; the petition was intituled in the matter of the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, and in the matter of the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and F. Shewell Cooper appeared in support of the petition.

BYRNE, J., said that the statutes specially dealing with the reduction of capital must govern a reduction of capital involved by a scheme of arrangement, and directed the petition to stand over with liberty to amend by intituling it also in the matter of the Companies Acts, 1867 and 1877, and liberty to the liquidator to call such meetings of shareholders as he might be advised.

Solicitors, Worthington Evans, Bird, & Co.

(a.) Reported by L. W. BYRNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div. }
Buckley, J. } Jan. 22, 28.

In re LORD ELLENBOROUGH.
TOWRY-LAW v. BURNE. (a.)

Settlement—Voluntary settlement—Assignment of spes successionis—Validity.

A spes successionis is not property, and a voluntary settlement, even though it be by deed, purporting to assign it, does not operate as a contract enforceable against the settlor if and when the settlor becomes entitled to the property.

Meek v. Kettlewell, 1 Hare 464, 1 Ph. 342, is not overruled on this point by Kekewich v. Manning, 1 De G. M. & G. 176.

Adjourned summons.

On this summons the question was raised whether a voluntary settlement of a mere expectancy can be enforced as against the settlor.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment:

On the 22nd of December, 1893, there were living Charles Lord Ellenborough, and Gertrude Edith Towry-Law, brother and sister of the applicant upon this summons. They were entitled respectively to certain property absolutely. In their property the applicant had then no property or interest of any kind. The applicant had an expectation arising from the fact that owing to the relationship between them and herself and to their state of health she might be (as was subsequently the case) the survivor, and might, under their respective wills or intestacies, become entitled to their property. She had neither a future interest nor a possibility coupled with an interest capable of being disposed of under section 6 of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106. She had only a spes successionis. In that state of facts the applicant, on the 22nd of December, 1893, executed a voluntary settlement by deed, by which she granted to the trustees, who are the respondents on this summons, the real estate, and assigned the personal estate, to which the applicant in the event of the death of her brother and sister respectively in her lifetime might become entitled under their respective wills or intestacies. That deed could not operate by way of grant, but could in a court of equity operate as an agreement on the part of the applicant to grant and assign that which in fact could not by the deed be granted or assigned. The brother and sister are now dead, intestate, and the applicant has become entitled by devolution. The property coming to the applicant from her sister has been handed over to the trustees, and the applicant does not say that she can get it back. The property of the brother has not so been handed over, and the applicant does not desire to hand it over unless she is compelled to do so. The question to be determined upon this summons is whether she can be called upon by the trustees to assign and hand over to them that which has come to her by devolution from the late Lord Ellenborough, or whether she can refuse to do anything further to perfect that which was a mere voluntary deed. In order to raise the question in proper form, a writ has been, or will be, issued by the trustees against the applicant, seeking to recover the funds, and the order will be drawn up on this summons and in that action.

Astbury, K.C., and A. Cordery, for the plaintiff.—At the date of the execution of the settlement the plaintiff had a mere spes successionis to the property, which, not being a possibility coupled with an interest, did not lie in grant within 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 6. The purported assignment does not operate as a contract to settle the property which is enforceable in equity: Meek v. Kettlewell, 1 Hare 464, 1 Ph. 342 In that case Wigram, V.C., held that a voluntary assignment of an executory interest was not enforceable because notice had not been given to the trustees. Lord Lyndhurst affirmed him on the ground that the settlement was voluntary. The note in White and Tudor's Equity Cases (7th ed., vol. 2, p. 851) to the effect that Meek v. Kettlewell has been overruled by Kekewich v. Manning, De G. M. & G. 176, requires qualification, for Meek v. Kettlewell is overruled only on the point of notice. The two cases are entirely different—in Meek v. Kettlewell there was no property, and therefore no assignment; in Kekewich v. Manning there was property which had been completely assigned.

They also referred to In re Tilt, 74 L. T. Rep. 163, 44 W. R. Dig. 147; In re Parsons, 38 W. R. 712, 45 Ch. D. 51; Fearne on Contingent Remainders, p. 551; and Lewin on Trusts, chapter 6.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Wrangham, for the trustees.—If the settlement had been for value, it would have effected an assignment of the property and not merely a contract to assign it, for it is possible to assign property which has no existence at the date of the assignment: Tailby v. Official Receiver, 37 W. R. 513, 13 App. Cas. 523 (per Lord Watson, at p. 533). But if the property has been assigned, it is immaterial whether the assignee is or is not a volunteer. In neither case need he come into a court of equity to perfect his title.

Cur. adv. vult.

BUCKLEY, J., stated the facts as above set out, and continued: The deed was purely voluntary. The question is whether a volunteer can enforce a contract made by deed to dispose of an expectancy. It cannot be, and is not, disputed that, if the deed had been for value, the trustees could have enforced it. If value be given, it is immaterial what is the form of assurance by which the disposition is made, or whether the subject of the disposition is capable of being thereby disposed of or not. An assignment for value binds the conscience of the assignor. A court of equity as against him will compel him to do that which ex hypothesi he has not yet effectively done. Future property, possibilities, and expectancies are all assignable in equity for value: Tailby v. Official Receiver, 13 App. Cas., at p. 548. But when the assurance is not for value a court of equity will not assist a volunteer. In Meek v. Kettlewell, affirmed by Lord Lyndhurst, the exact point arose which I have here to decide, and it was held that a voluntary assignment of an expectancy, even though under seal, would not be enforced by a court of equity. "The assignment of an expectancy," says Lord Lyndhurst, 1 Ph., at p. 347, "such as this is cannot be supported unless made for a valuable consideration." It is, however, suggested that that decision was overruled or affected by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Kekewich v. Manning, and a passage in White and Tudor's Equity Cases was referred to upon the point. In my opinion Kekewich v. Manning has no bearing upon that which was decided in Meek v. Kettlewell. The assignment in Kekewich v. Manning was not of an expectancy, but of property. "It is on legal and equitable principles," said Knight-Bruce, L.J., "clear that a person sui juris, acting freely, fairly, and with sufficient knowledge, ought to have and has it in his power to make, in a binding and effectual manner, a voluntary gift of any part of his property, whether capable or incapable of manual delivery, whether in possession or reversionary, and howsoever circumstanced." The important words there are "of his property." The point of Meek v. Kettlewell and of the case before me is that the assignment was not of property, but of a mere expectancy. On the 22nd of December, 1893, that with which the grantor was dealing was not her property in any sense. She had nothing more than an expectancy, a spes successionis, which is not property in English law: In re Parsons. In In re Tilt there was again a voluntary assignment of an expectancy, and the point was not regarded as arguable. "It was rightly admitted," said Chitty, J., "that as when this plaintiff executed the deed of 1880 she had no interest whatever in the fund in question, which was a mere expectancy, the deed was wholly inoperative both at law and in equity, being entirely voluntary." By "wholly inoperative" there the judge, of course, did not mean that, if the voluntary settlor had handed over the funds, the trustees would not have held them upon the trusts, but that the grantees under the deed could not enforce it, as against the settlor, in a court of equity or elsewhere. In my judgment the interest of the plaintiff as sole heiress at law and next-of-kin of the late Lord Ellenborough was not effectually assigned to the trustees by the deed, and the trustees cannot call upon her to grant, assign, transfer, or pay over to them his residuary real and personal estate.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors, Burgess, Taylor, & Tryon.

---

Chan. Div. Joyce, J. } Jan. 21, 22.

In re CLINTON.
CLINTON v. CLINTON. (a)

International law—Jurisdiction—British colony—Personalty and real property out of the jurisdiction—Will—Construction—Trust.

A testator domiciled in a British colony left real and personal property in the colony. In an action instituted in England by the heir-at-law and next-of-kin of the testator against persons who had taken possession of the personal and real estate in the colony of the testator, all parties to the action being resident in England,

Held, that the English court had jurisdiction in the action to determine questions (1) as to the title to the real estate as well as the personalty situate in the colony, the two being so mixed together under the will that they could not be dealt with separately; and (2) as to whether a trust of the real estate had been created by the will or not.

Action.

The testator, James Clarke Clinton, had carried on business at Assinee, on the West Coast of Africa, in the French territory known as the Ivory Coast Colony, and also at Axim, Ankobra, and Secondee, in the British Gold Coast Colony.

At the date of his death he was possessed (inter alia)—(1) Of the above-mentioned businesses; (2) of certain freehold dwelling-houses and premises at each of these places; (3) of certain freehold and leasehold concessions for mining and other purposes of large tracts of land in the Gold Coast Colony; (4) of personal estate in England of the value of over £3,000.

By his will, dated the 2nd of November, 1899, the testator, after appointing his wife, the defendant Emma Charlotte Clinton, the sole executrix of his will, and bequeathing her all the furniture and household effects in his house at Axim, continued: "I bequeath to my wife all my moneys in the bank, the interest to be used for the education of my wife's children. The principal moneys to be held in trust by my wife for the use and benefit of my children. I bequeath to my wife the sum of £200 per annum, to be paid out of the proceeds of the firm. The business to be carried on by Charles Clinton and Willie Clinton, Charles Clinton being senior; my wife to receive the rents of the houses and the house in which we live. I advise that Charles Clinton should sell the business at Assinee."

The testator died on the 2nd of November, 1899, a British subject domiciled in the Gold Coast Colony.

The will was proved on the 6th of November, 1899, in the Gold Coast Colony, and on the 12th of March, 1901, in England.

The plaintiffs were the three infant children of the testator suing by their next friend.

The defendants were the testator's widow, Emma Charlotte Clinton, and Charles Warner Clinton and William Nicholas Clinton, described in the will as Charles Clinton and Willie Clinton.

By an agreement dated the 23rd of July, 1900, and made between the defendant Emma Charlotte Clinton of the one part, and the defendants Charles Warner Clinton and William Nicholas Clinton of the other part, after reciting the said will of the said James Clarke Clinton (deceased) to the effect abovementioned, and reciting that the said James Clarke Clinton did not by his said will specifically devise or bequeath the residue of his said business, nor the leasehold and freehold concessions, and that he did not by his said will make any provision for the remuneration of the services of the defendants Charles Warner Clinton and William Nicholas Clinton should they accept the trusts of the said will, and reciting that the defendants Charles Warner Clinton and William Nicholas Clinton had alleged that it was the intention of the said James Clarke Clinton to give and bequeath to them absolutely the said business subject to the annuity of £200 to be paid to the defendant Emma Charlotte Clinton, and that the said defendant had claimed that the said business, leaseholds, and real property was residue divisible amongst the heir-at-law and next-of-kin of the said James Clarke Clinton according to the Statute of Distribution, and reciting that it was considered advisable by all parties interested in the estate of the said James Clarke Clinton, deceased, that a compromise should be effected so as to save the estate from the expense of litigation, and after certain further recitals, not material to be here stated, it was agreed between the parties thereto as follows:

Clause 1.—The defendant Emma Charlotte Clinton agreed to assign the business of the said James Clarke Clinton that was carried on at Axim and all other places, stations, branches, or factories in the Gold Coast Colony, together with the book debts, stock-in-trade, plant, mortgages, promissory notes, and all other securities for money, and to surrender the said annuity of £200 to the defendant Charles Warner Clinton and William Nicholas Clinton absolutely.

Clause 2.—The defendant Emma Charlotte Clinton agreed to grant, convey, or assign to the defendants Charles Warner Clinton and William Nicholas Clinton, their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, all concessions in the Gold Coast Colony aforesaid, whether they might be leaseholds or freeholds, and whether they were in the name of the said James Clarke Clinton or in the names of J. & C. Clinton & Co., and would execute all documents necessary to transfer the said concessions to the defendants Charles Warner Clinton and William Nicholas Clinton, their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, all freeholds in Secondee, in the Gold Coast Colony aforesaid, being expressly excepted.

(a.) Reported by C. W. MEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Clause 3.—The defendant Emma Charlotte Clinton agreed to assign all her right, title, and interest in and to the business of the said James Clarke Clinton that was being carried on at Assinee aforesaid, as well as to grant her interest in the concessions and freehold property in Assinee aforesaid to the defendants Charles Warner Clinton and William Nicholas Clinton, their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, upon the said defendants procuring a release to her the defendant Emma Charlotte Clinton from certain claims which might be made upon the estate of the said James Clarke Clinton.

Clause 4.—The defendants Charles Warner Clinton and William Nicholas Clinton jointly agreed to pay to the said Emma Charlotte Clinton, her heirs, executors, or administrators, the sum of £5,000 within four years from the date of that agreement by four equal yearly instalments of £1,250 each, the first of which was to become due and payable on the 4th of July, 1901, the second on the 4th of July, 1902, the third on the 4th of July, 1903, and the fourth on the 4th of July, 1904, with interest as therein mentioned.

Clause 5.—The defendants Charles Warner Clinton and William Nicholas Clinton agreed to pay to the defendant Emma Charlotte Clinton, her heirs, executors, or administrators, such fair annual rent as might be agreed upon in manner therein mentioned for the houses at Axim, Ankobra, and Secondee wherein the business of the said James Clarke Clinton was carried on.

Clause 6.—The defendants Charles Warner Clinton and William Nicholas Clinton agreed to pay all debts due from and owing by the business of the said James Clarke Clinton carried on under the style or firm of J. & C. Clinton & Co., and to pay to the defendant Emma Charlotte Clinton forthwith, upon the signing of the agreement, the following—(a) The annuity due to her as provided in the will of the said James Clarke Clinton from the month of December, 1899, to the date of that agreement after deducting such payments as had already been made to her; (b) the rent of the houses as aforesaid for the same period; (c) the value of the furniture of the principal house at Axim as agreed between the defendants, which included everything in the said house excepting as therein mentioned; (d) all payments that had been made to the defendants Charles Warner Clinton and William Nicholas Clinton or either of them in respect of the judgment therein mentioned.

Clause 7.—The defendant Charles Warner Clinton agreed to surrender a bank deposit receipt for £250 given by the Bank of British West Africa (Limited), Liverpool, in respect of a deposit made by the said James Clarke Clinton out of the assets of the Assinee business to the defendant Emma Charlotte Clinton to meet the expenses therein mentioned in connection with the estate of the said James Clarke Clinton.

Clause 8.—The defendants Charles Warner Clinton and William Nicholas Clinton agreed to withdraw all letters written by them to any bank or banks which might have the effect of stopping or delaying the payment of any sum or sums of money to be made payable to the defendant Emma Charlotte Clinton, which money had been deposited in the said bank or banks by the said James Clarke Clinton either in his name or in the name of J. & C. Clinton & Co.

Clause 9.—The defendants Charles Warner Clinton and William Nicholas Clinton would procure the firm of Millward, Bradbury, & Co. to release the defendant Emma Charlotte Clinton from the debts due to the said firm from the estate of the said James Clarke Clinton and to pay the claim of Messrs. Herschell & Co., of Liverpool, and to look for payment of their debt as well as repayment of the moneys that might be so advanced by them to the defendants Charles Warner Clinton and William Nicholas Clinton.

Clause 10.—The defendants Charles Warner Clinton and William Nicholas Clinton would procure the said Millward, Bradbury, & Co. to give a written guarantee to the defendant Emma Charlotte Clinton for the due payment of the said sum of £5,000 to the said defendant, her heirs, executors, and administrators, by the defendants Charles Warner Clinton and William Nicholas Clinton, and to undertake to pay the said sum when any instalment thereof should become due if the said defendants should make default in payment for one calendar month after such instalment should become due.

In 1901, in pursuance of this agreement, and in consideration of the said sum of £5,000, the defendant Emma Charlotte Clinton, as executrix and in her sole right, purported to convey to the defendants C. W. and W. N. Clinton the leasehold and freehold concessions of the testator in the Gold Coast Colony. The defendants C. W. and W. N. Clinton upon this entered into possession of the said businesses and concessions.

The plaintiffs thereupon commenced this action claiming a declaration that the defendants C. W. and W. N. Clinton took no beneficial interest in the testator's businesses and concessions, and asking for a declaration that the agreement of the 23rd of July, 1900, and the assignment and conveyance executed in pursuance thereof were not binding on the plaintiffs and were void as against them, and claiming an account against the defendants C. W. and W. N. Clinton. These defendants entered an appearance to the action and by their defence contended that the court had no jurisdiction to adjudicate on the plaintiffs' claim in so far as it related to the land, houses, and concessions situated in the Gold Coast Colony and elsewhere in West Africa or any of them. This point of law was ordered to be set down for argument before the court before further proceedings were taken in the action, and now came on for argument.

Warmington, K.C., and Mark Romer, for the plaintiffs.—We submit that the will makes no disposition of the testator's property other than the moneys in the bank and the annuity of £200 to the wife. The court has clearly jurisdiction, as, though it will not adjudicate as to real estate in a foreign country, yet it will do so as regards the agreement of the 23rd of July, 1900. The case is covered by Lord Cranstown v. Johnston, 3 Ves. 170. "Courts of equity have never claimed to act directly upon land situate abroad, they have purported to act upon the conscience of persons living here": per Lord Herschell, L.C., in British South Africa Co. v. Companhia de Moçambique, [1893] A. C. 602, at p. 626; and in Duder v. Amsterdamsch Trustees Kantoor, 50 W. R. 551, [1902] 2 Ch. 132, Cranstown v. Johnston was treated as good law. If that case is good law it covers this one, because here there is a contract between persons who are in this country respecting land in a foreign country; the court therefore has jurisdiction just as if the land was in this country. In Ewing v. Orr Ewing, 32 W. R. 573, 9 App. Cas. 34, it was held that a decree could be made here for the administration of a Scotch estate.

Younger, K.C., and J. Austen Cartmell, for the defendants C. W. and W. N. Clinton.—The court has no jurisdiction in respect of real estate out of the jurisdiction. This case goes beyond any one in which the court of equity has purported to act. This claim to recover immovable property abroad is based first of all on the will, made in a British colony by a testator domiciled in that colony; it is therefore first of all a case of construction of a will, and must be decided by the law of that colony—a will affecting land in that colony, and that has been held to be "not triable" in this country: Pike v. Hoare, 2 Eden 182. To this rule there are only three exceptions: (1) Where there was a contract between the plaintiff and defendant with reference to the land; (2) where there was a trust or equity binding on the conscience of the defendant; or (3) where there was fraud on the part of the defendant. This case does not come within any of these exceptions: Norris v. Chambres, 9 W. R. 259, 29 Beav. 296. In substance this case is one of ejectment, and the court has no jurisdiction to try such an action over foreign land except under the three exceptions.

They also quoted Dicey's Conflict of Laws, p. 214, and In re Hawthorn, 32 W. R. 147, 23 Ch. D. 743.

Warmington, K.C., replied.

JOYCE, J.—I have reason to believe that the law of the Gold Coast Colony is the same as that of this country, but I do not know whether or not any ordinance has been passed applying the Land Transfer Act to that colony. At all events, I am prepared to hold that, as to the personalty and the leaseholds which would vest in the executrix, this action is maintainable. There is clearly a trust, and there are equities which must be worked out. There is or may be a difficulty as to the immovable property which legally devolves at once upon the heir-at-law of the testator. From what has been stated in Westlake on International Law (3rd ed., section 173, p. 294), and from other authorities referred to by him, it appears that there have been instances in which the court, having jurisdiction as to the personalty, has exercised a jurisdiction over the realty as well, considering the two as so much mixed up together that it was not possible to separate them. There is another question here, as to whether the real estate is not devised by the will to these two defendants upon trust, and that consideration has been forced upon me by one of the recitals in the agreement. If that is so, then these defendants are subject to the jurisdiction of the court, which can be exercised against them personally, and this court clearly has jurisdiction to determine whether there is a trust or not. In these circumstances I am prepared to make the following order: Declare that the objection to the jurisdiction raised by the defence is not good in law. Order the action to proceed to trial, notwithstanding that objection. This order to be without prejudice to any question in reference to the immovable property (if any) the legal interest in which devolved at the testator's death directly upon the heir-at-law.

Solicitors, Lewis & Lewis; Foss, Ledsam, & Blount.

---

K. B. Div. (Kennedy, J.) — Oct. 31.

DE HART v. COMPANIA ANONIMA "SEGUROS" AURORA. (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Time policy—General average—Contract of affreightment—Foreign statement—Belgian law.

A policy of marine insurance contained the following clause: "General average payable according to foreign statement if so made up or York-Antwerp Rules if in accordance with contract of affreightment."

Attached to the policy were the Institute Time Clauses, 1900, one of which provides: "General average and salvage charges payable according to foreign statement or per York Antwerp Rules if in accordance with the contract of affreightment."

By a charter-party made between the shipowner and the charterer it was agreed that, "In case of average the same to be settled according to York-Antwerp Rules, 1900, excepting that jettison of deck cargo (and freight thereon) for the common safety shall be allowable as general average."

The average statement was made up at Antwerp, and included jettisoned deck cargo and freight thereon. The shipowner paid the ship's contribution to general average. Apart from express agreement in the contract of affreightment, the Belgian law would not recognize such jettisoned deck cargo and freight thereon as being the subject of a claim for general average.

Held, in an action by the shipowner to recover from the underwriters the amount of his contribution, that the underwriters were liable.

Action tried in the Commercial Court.

This was an action by shipowners against underwriters on two policies of insurance on the steamship Henriette H.

The two policies were dated the 31st of August, 1900, and the 28th of September, 1900, respectively, for twelve months, and both contained the following clause: "General average payable according to foreign statement if so made up or York-Antwerp Rules if in accordance with contract of affreightment."

Attached to the policies were the Institute Time Clauses, 1900, including the following clause: "General average and salvage charges payable according to foreign statement or per York-Antwerp Rules if in accordance with the contract of affreightment."

By a charter-party, dated the 11th of October, 1900, made between the plaintiff as shipowner and Baars, Dunwody, & Co., as charterers, it was agreed that the Henriette H. should carry a cargo of wood, and if the master required it a deck-load, from Pensacola to Antwerp.

The charter-party contained the following clause: "In case of average the same to be settled according to York-Antwerp Rules, 1900, excepting that jettison of deck cargo (and freight thereon) for the common safety shall be allowable as general average."

The vessel sailed from Pensacola with a deck-load of timber, which was customary. During the voyage part of the deck-load was jettisoned for the safety of ship and cargo. The vessel reached Antwerp and there delivered the remaining cargo. An average adjustment made at that port included the deck cargo jettisoned and the freight thereon as the subject of general average.

The plaintiff, having paid the ship's contribution to general average, now claimed to be indemnified by the underwriters.

It was admitted that by the Belgian law the jettison of the deck cargo and the freight thereon would not give rise to a claim for general average apart from express provision in the charter-party.

The following cases were cited: Harris v. Scaramanga, 20 W. R. 777; Mavro v. Ocean Marine Insurance Co., 23 W. R. 758; Hendricks v. Australasian Insurance Co., 22 W. R. 947; and The Brigella, [1893] P. 189, 41 W. R. Dig. 192.

Carver, K.C., and de Hart, for the plaintiff.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and J. R. Atkin, for the defendants.

KENNEDY, J.—In this case the plaintiff claims from the defendants an indemnity against a general average contribution which he has paid. The question depends upon the true construction of certain clauses in the policy.

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I think they are susceptible of a natural meaning. The general average statement made up at Antwerp was not contrary to the law of Belgium. The point taken by the defendant company was that the average statement admitted what but for the special agreement made between the parties would not be general average according to Belgian law. The Belgian law, however, recognizes the terms of an express contract between the parties to the contract of affreightment. In my opinion the fair construction is that the underwriters are bound to pay according to the foreign statement, and if the foreign law recognizes with regard to general average the terms of the contract of affreightment then the underwriters are bound by the statement made in accordance with that law. I therefore give judgment for the plaintiff.

Solicitors for plaintiff, Stibbard, Gibson, & Co., for Gibson, Pybus, & Pybus, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Solicitors for defendant, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

---

IN BANKRUPTCY.

K. B. Div. (Wright, J.) — Dec. 4, 15.

In re LAKE.
Ex parte CAVENDISH. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Insurance—Life policy—Assignment of life policies by way of mortgage—Notice of assignment—Priority of claims of mortgagees.

The bankrupt before his bankruptcy executed a mortgage of life policies in favour of a client whose money he had misappropriated, but never disclosed the fact. He subsequently gave another mortgage on the same policies to a person who gave notice thereof to the insurance companies prior to the bankruptcy. After the bankruptcy the first mortgage was discovered, and the mortgagee at once gave notice of it to the insurance companies.

Held, that the second mortgagee was entitled to priority, having been the first to give notice, although the first mortgagee had not been guilty of laches.

Foster v. Cockerell, 9 Bligh N. S. 332, followed.

Motion by F. Cavendish for a declaration that an equitable mortgage in his favour of certain policies on the life of B. G. Lake, the bankrupt, was entitled to priority over a mortgage of the same policies in favour of one Cox.

In 1898 the bankrupt's firm (Lake & Lake, solicitors) received £15,000, the property of Cavendish, for investment. The firm informed Cavendish by letter that they had invested the money, but in fact it was misappropriated. On the 6th of April, 1899, B. G. Lake executed a mortgage on certain life policies to secure to Cavendish £13,500 of the money misappropriated. Lake did not inform Cavendish of the existence of the mortgage or give notice of it to the insurance companies.

On the 18th of December, 1899, Lake mortgaged the same policies to one Cox, a clerk in his office, as trustee for certain other clients whose moneys had been misappropriated, but did not inform Cox of the prior mortgage.

Shortly before the making of the receiving order, which was dated the 27th of June, 1900, Cox gave notice to the insurance companies of the mortgage in his favour. In December 1900, the mortgage in favour of Cavendish was discovered at the offices of Lake & Lake, and notice thereof was given on his behalf to the insurance companies.

Cavendish now moved for a declaration that his mortgage was entitled to priority.

Reed, K.C., and Ivor Johnson, for the motion.—B. G. Lake, the bankrupt, stood in a fiduciary position to Cavendish, having received Cavendish's money for investment. By the mortgage of the 6th of April, 1899, he constituted himself a trustee for Cavendish of the property comprised therein, and could not by a subsequent mortgage give Cox a title prior to that of his cestui que trust: see the judgment of Jessel, M.R., in Mumford v. Stohwasser, 22 W. R. 833, L. R. 18 Eq. 556, which is not overruled upon this point by Hunt v. Luck, 50 W. R. 291, [1902] 1 Ch. 428. Further, the doctrine of priority of notice depends on laches, and Cavendish was not guilty of any negligence, having given notice as soon as he knew of the mortgage: Dearle v. Hall, 3 Russ. 1; Loveridge v. Cooper, 3 Russ. 30.

R. B. D. Acland, for the respondent Cox.—Lake was not a trustee for Cavendish, consequently the dictum of Jessel, M.R., in Mumford v. Stohwasser does not apply. The principles of priority between equitable mortgagees rests on notice, not on laches or diligence. Cox had no notice of any prior mortgage and was the first to give notice to the insurance companies: Foster v. Cockerell, 9 Bligh N. S. 332.

Northcote appeared for the trustee in bankruptcy.

Reed, K.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 15.—WRIGHT, J.—The question I have to determine is, which of two equitable incumbrancers is entitled to priority. The ordinary rule in cases of equitable assignment is that the first to give notice is the one who obtains priority. Here it was contended that Lake was a trustee for Cavendish, and a dictum of Jessel, M.R., in Mumford v. Stohwasser was relied on. It seems to me, however, that this dictum does not apply, because the facts of this case do not raise the same question. Then it was said that the doctrine of priority by notice depends on laches, and that Cavendish had not been guilty of any negligence because he gave notice as soon as he knew of the existence of the mortgage. But I think the point is disposed of by the judgment of Lord Lyndhurst in Foster v. Cockerell, 9 Bligh N. S., at p. 375. He says: "This was a question of priority between two equitable incumbrances—a question whether the subsequent incumbrancer of the equity, having given notice to the trustees of the fund, was entitled to priority over the former incumbrancers. Now that question has been settled, after much deliberate discussion, in the cases of Dearle v. Hall and Loveridge v. Cooper. These two cases were argued before Sir Thomas Plumer, as Master of the Rolls, with great learning and attention to the subject. The Master of the Rolls, after considering the question, pronounced a very elaborate judgment, deciding that in cases of this description the party who first gave notice to the trustees was entitled to the priority; and, without adverting to the particular facts of those cases, the principle upon which the decision was founded was this, that if a contrary doctrine were to prevail it would enable a cestui que trust to commit a fraud; he might assign his interest first to one and then to a second incumbrancer, and the second incumbrancer would have no opportunity by way of communication with the trustees of ascertaining whether or not there had been a prior assignment of the interest. There was also another principle upon which he decided those cases, which was this, that a party, till he gives notice to the trustees, has not done everything to complete his title. In such cases it is necessary for the parties to do everything in their power. Further than that, he assigns as an additional reason, that, until notice was given to the trustees, they did not in fact become trustees for the assignee. It was upon these distinct grounds that he laid down as a general rule that in the case of an equitable assignment the party giving notice to the trustees, although he was second incumbrancer, was entitled to priority, if the former incumbrancer had given no such notice. The principle of those authorities applies directly to the present case."

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I hold, therefore, even although this is an extreme case, that Cavendish is not entitled to priority over the second mortgagee.

Application dismissed.

Solicitors for the applicant, Bompas, Bischoff, & Co.

Solicitors for the respondent, Longbourne, Stevens, & Co.

Solicitors for the trustee in bankruptcy, Lee & Pembertons.

---

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). July 10, 1902.

IBO SYNDICATE (LIMITED) v. WYLER. (a)

Practice—Appeal—House of Lords—New trial—Entering judgment for the defendant—Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1887, r. 4.

Where the House of Lords comes to the conclusion that there is no evidence to go to a jury in an action, they will order judgment to be entered for the defendant, and not send the case for a new trial; and this will be done though there is no cross-appeal on the defendant's part.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal setting aside a verdict and judgment for the appellants (plaintiffs below) on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

The case was one of fact, and is reported upon the question of practice only.

Lawson Walton, K.C., and Spencer Bower, for the appellants.

Sir R. Reid, K.C., and Roskill, for the respondent.

Their lordships took time to consider their judgment.

The Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—This is an action for deceit, and there are three things necessary in order to establish the right of the plaintiffs to recover in such an action. There must be deceit, a representation fraudulently made by words or deeds; there must be an acting upon that by the person who complains of the wrong, and there must be damage by his or their having acted upon it. Each of those three elements is necessary in order to establish a right of action. After the most careful perusal of the whole of the evidence in this case, and looking at the arguments on both sides which have been presented to your lordships, I have come very clearly to the opinion that the plaintiffs fail in every one of the elements constituting the right to bring an action. [His lordship went through the evidence, and continued:] Upon the whole case it seems to me to be absolutely impossible to say that either there was any evidence that ought to have been properly submitted to the jury, or that the verdict can stand.

Upon that I come to the only question which seems to me to demand serious consideration—namely, the question of what your lordships ought to do under these circumstances, there being a verdict which is certainly not warranted by the evidence, and in my view no evidence to go to the jury; though in that respect one ought to remember that the law is not now that any scintilla of evidence that might exist is to be submitted to the jury, but only where it is of such a character that the court will send it for a new trial. In this case I am prepared to go to the extent of saying there was none, but even if there was a scintilla of evidence it would be insufficient to establish the propriety of allowing this judgment to stand. But then the question has been argued rather as a question of form, whether, there being no cross-appeal here, your lordships ought to enter judgment for the defendant. It is idle to refer to what the practice in times gone by was. There is no doubt that at one time one was sometimes incumbered with forms in a manner which occasionally, I am afraid, did injustice, and the substance was thereby somewhat lost sight of. But that matter has been the subject of very considerable debate and alteration in the law. In the first place, what I have just referred to—namely, the right of anybody to have matters submitted to the jury if there was a scintilla of evidence—has passed away; it had passed away in practice, I think, already, but the rules made under the Judicature Act have expressly provided for it. Before referring to those rules, I think I may say that the analogy of the law was always what it is now, although, when the case was entangled with questions of fact, and certain questions had to be submitted to the jury, and others had to be left to the judge, there was very often difficulty which was not always surmounted until the recent legislation. But that was always the analogy of the law; it mattered not who demurred first; it mattered not whether or not the particular plea or pleading was bad or good; the moment the court had before it the whole record they would then give judgment, notwithstanding that the person may have succeeded in showing that the plea he demurred to was bad; if upon the whole record, as it then stood before the court, judgment ought to be entered in one particular way, they entered judgment for the person who upon the whole record appeared to be entitled to judgment. Upon that analogy, it being obviously good sense, upon these questions, when they were entangled with fact (and it was sometimes difficult to disentangle what was law and what was fact), I think that the later view to which I have referred, of what ought to be done in such a case as the present, has prevailed. Now, as to the rule itself, it is important to bear in mind the date of the rule. I need not detain your lordships upon this point because we are not acting upon this rule at all beyond saying this, that whatever the form of procedure may be, the court can enter judgment and make such order as the court from which the appeal came ought to have made. That, of course, would have justified the Court of Appeal in entering judgment, even if there were no such cross-appeal in such a case as this; but that rule having been passed in the year 1875, the Appellate Jurisdiction Act was passed in the year 1887, and the rules under that Act are of course the rules of practice under which your lordships are acting. Section 4 of those rules is this: "Every appeal shall be brought by way of petition to the House of Lords, praying that the matter of the order or judgment appealed against may be reviewed before his Majesty the King in his Court of Parliament, in order that the said court may determine what of right and according to the law and custom of this realm ought to be done in the subject-matter of such appeal." These are wider words even than the order under which the High Court of Justice acts. It appears to me that under these circumstances the order which ought to be made in this case is that judgment should be entered for the defendant, and that the plaintiffs—I use the words "plaintiffs" and "defendant," they have now become respectively the appellants and the respondent—should pay to the defendant the costs both here and below.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion.

Lord LINDLEY.—I am of the same opinion, and I shall add very few words in order to show the view which I have taken of this case. As regards the appeal from the decision of the Appeal Court, I consider that the appeal was absolutely hopeless when once the facts were understood. To suppose that any court could allow the verdict and judgment pronounced at the trial to stand is to suppose that the court had no knowledge whatever of legal principles. A difficulty arose when the House was asked to go further and enter judgment for the defendant. I looked at the reasons given in the Court of Appeal, to see why the Court of Appeal did not go to that length. I could find no reasons given except the short reason which is involved in saying that there must be a new trial. But when we look and see how the evidence stands, it appears to me that this case is one in which unquestionably the Court of Appeal might go and your lordships ought to go the length of saying that upon the evidence as it stands no verdict for the plaintiffs ought to be allowed to stand, which in other words means that judgment ought to be entered for the defendant.

The LORD CHANCELLOR —I ought to say that Lord Brampton entirely concurs in the judgment at which your lordships have arrived.

Order appealed from varied by ordering judgment to be entered for the defendant instead of ordering a new trial. Plaintiffs to pay to the defendant the costs both here and below.

Solicitors for the appellants, Ingle, Holmes, & Sons.

Solicitors for the respondent, Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co.

---

From C. A. (Ireland). } Nov. 27.

DUBLIN UNITED TRAMWAYS CO. v. FITZGERALD. (a)

Tramway—Liability of company to keep their portion of roadway in proper condition—Sanding slippery road —Tramway Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), s. 28.

The Tramway Act, 1870, s. 28, requires the tramway company to maintain and keep in good condition and repair that portion of the road for which they are responsible, with such materials and in such manner as the road authority should direct. The Tramway Co. (as required) laid its portion of the road with granite blocks, which became worn and consequently dangerous in certain states of the weather. An accident occurred, through the company neglecting to lay down sand on its portion of the road, which would have counteracted the slippery nature of the surface.

Held, that the Company was liable.

Appeal from an order of Court of Appeal in Ireland.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The respondent was, in March, 1900, driving a horse and cart in Grafton-street, Dublin, on that portion of the roadway on which tramway was laid when he was thrown out and sustained injury, for which he brought this action against the appellant tramway company.

The jury found that the appellants had not been negligent in the construction or maintenance of the pavement, but that they were negligent in not sanding, and a verdict and judgment was entered for the respondent, the damages being £1,000.

This was affirmed, but the findings of the jury as to the construction or maintenance of the roadway were set aside.

Previously the corporation had taken out summonses against the tramway company asking that they should be ordered to sand, owing to the slippery condition, that part of the roadway under their control, and the company was held liable, but a case was stated for the opinion of the court, which upheld the conviction.

The 28th section of the Tramway Act, 1870 (not applicable to Ireland), is incorporated with the special Act of the Dublin United Tramways (Electrical Power) Act, 1897.

Section 28 of the Act of 1870: "The promoters shall, at their own expense, at all times maintain and keep in good condition and repair, with such materials and in such manner as the road authority shall direct, and to their satisfaction, so much of any road whereon any tramway belonging to them is laid as lies between the rails of the tramway and (where two tramways are laid by the same promoters in any road at a distance of not more than four feet from each other) the portion of the road between the tramways, and in every case so much of the road as extends eighteen inches beyond the rails of and on each side of any such tramway. If the promoters abandon their undertaking, or any part of the same, and take up any tramway, or any part of any tramway belonging to them, they shall with all convenient speed, and in all cases within six weeks at the most (unless the road authority otherwise consents in writing), fill in the ground and make good the surface, and to the satisfaction of the road authority restore the portion of the road upon which such tramway was laid to as good a condition as that in which it was before such tramway was laid thereon, and clear away all surplus paving or metalling material or rubbish occasioned by such work; and they shall in the meantime cause the place where the road is opened or broken up to be fenced and watched and to be properly lighted at night. Provided always that, if the promoters fail to comply with the provisions of this section, the road authority, if they think fit, may themselves, at any time after seven days' notice to the promoters, open and break up the road and do the works necessary for the repair and maintenance or restoration of the road to the extent in this section above-mentioned, and the expense incurred by the road authority in so doing shall be repaid to them by the promoters."

Section 37 of the Act of 1897: "The company shall at all times maintain and keep in good condition and repair, and so as not to be a danger or annoyance to the ordinary traffic, the rails of the tramways and the substructure upon which the same rest, and also the paving, wires, posts, tubes, and electrical apparatus of any description whatever, and if the company at any time fail to comply with this provision or with the provisions of sections 25 and 28 of the Tramway Act, 1870, they shall be subject to a penalty not exceeding £5 for every day on which such noncompliance continues, and in the event of any such noncompliance as aforesaid, and without prejudice to any other remedy, the road authority may, after giving to the company forty-eight hours' notice in writing in that behalf, execute and do all works necessary for such maintenance and repair and for such restoration as aforesaid, or as in the said section 28 of the Tramway Act, 1870, is mentioned, and may recover they costs, charges, and expenses of so doing from the company."

Balfour Browne, K.C., J. Gordon, K.C. (of the Irish bar), and J. Fitzgerald Murphy, for the appellants.

Serjeant Dodd, K.C. (of the Irish bar), Lawson Walton, K.C., and J. B. Powell (of the Irish bar), for the respondent.

Barnett v. Borough of Poplar, 49 W. R. 574. [1901] 2 K. B. 319, and Atkinson v. Newcastle and Gateshead Waterworks Co., 25 W. R. 794, 2 Ex. Div. 441, were referred to.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I move your lordships that this appeal be dismissed. I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is perfectly right, and I am glad to be fortified in that opinion by the all but unanimous judgment of all the learned judges who have been consulted on this subject, with the single exception of Boyd, J. Although it has taken, not unreasonably, a considerable time to argue, the question turns upon a very few words, which do not, I think, require a very elaborate exposition. The tramway company has been permitted to use a public highway, and it has been permitted that use subject to certain obligations, which practically mean that while they are permitted to use the public highway, they shall take care that the safety and convenience of the public shall be preserved. The obligation is cast upon them of keeping the highway in a safe and fit condition for public traffic. They are not to have a monopoly of the highway. Passengers, horse and foot, are to be allowed to cross these tramways as freely as they did before, except where they may be intercepting or interfering with the use of the tramway as such. As part of the obligation cast upon them by the statute, the tramway company are to take what is stated by description, but really might have been given by actual measurement, and to some extent is so given—part of the roadway—under their immediate superintendence. By "their immediate superintendence" I do not mean that they are to have an independent superintendence; on the contrary, there is a power above them and beyond them under whose authority they are to act. But in the first instance it is their duty to take care of the public convenience in respect of that portion of the highway over which they are permitted to exercise this kind of subordinate dominion. They are under an obligation, therefore, under the words of the statute, both to repair and maintain that portion of the highway which I have indicated. When you look at their obligations you see that they are under the authority and superintendence of what I may describe as their immediate superiors in making the highway, and in the rest of what I have to say I will speak of it as their highway. They are to make the highway fit and proper for the public use as a highway. They are to maintain and repair that portion, and they are to repair and maintain it under the superintendence of the road authority, which has jurisdiction over the whole of the highway. It would appear that under that direction this tramway company have put, as part of their highway, the granite setts which gives rise to the question. One of the obligations which is placed upon them is to repair and maintain that which is described as "pavement" in the statute, and they are under no greater and no less obligation to maintain those setts to the same extent and with the same care as is applicable to the rest of the highway under their superintendence. It does not appear to be denied, but is insisted on by both sides, that owing to its particular character this surface roadway of their part of the highway, which was placed there under the superintendence and by the direction of the road authority, is liable in certain states of the weather to become a danger and a nuisance to the public using the highway. As a matter of fact the jury in this case have found that it had become a nuisance, and that it was dangerous, and both the plaintiff and the defendants join in the statement that in the actual condition of things when this accident occurred it was a dangerous nuisance. It is certainly a somewhat extraordinary proposition to say that although the immediate superintendence of this part of the highway is committed to the defendants, and though they are directed to act under the superintendence of the road authority, it being admitted that on this particular matter they received absolute directions to do the act which would have prevented the accident from happening, still there is no liability because they originally constructed something which, by the hypothesis, in its original construction would not have caused the accident, but have allowed it to get into such a condition that it does cause the accident. To say that under these circumstances there is no liability seems to me to be a somewhat bold contention. I confess that I do not understand the argument which was addressed to your lordships that the obligation to repair, or restore to the same condition in which the thing was, does not include the restoration of the thing to a condition in which it would not be a nuisance; because if that obligation is admitted, and the proper way of doing it is admitted to be by applying sand to the surface, it seems to me to come to this—indeed I think that it was almost admitted in terms—that if the case had been shaped in this way, "that these stones having become slippery partly by reason of the surface having been worn away by traffic, the obligation was cast upon us, the tramway company, of taking them up again and redressing them, we should not deny that we were under that condition of things liable to do it, because it would come under the strictest construction of the words 'repair and maintenance,' and 'repair and maintenance' is a thing which it is admitted that we were bound to do." According to the evidence these setts were dressed when they were originally put there, but, either by reason of the wear of the traffic or by reason of the weather, they are no longer in that condition. It would be a very extraordinary thing to say that the defendants would be liable in that case, but that they are not to be liable when, instead of taking up the stones and redressing them, they did not take the precaution, which the witnesses on both sides admitted to be the ordinary and usual precaution in the case of a highway being slippery, of putting down sand. It seems to me to be absolutely frittering away the obligation which is created by the Act of Parliament to say that they would be liable to do the thing in one way, but not to do it in the other way. What strikes me in that sort of argument is this, that it is confusing the mode in which the obligation is to be performed with the obligation itself. The obligation, as I read the statute, is to keep that portion of the highway in a fit and proper condition for public traffic. How that is to be done is a question of mechanical engineering, and neither the Legislature nor the courts are called upon, as it appears to me, to enter into the question of how it can best be done. All the learned judges, I believe without exception, seem to agree that the best and most proper mode of doing is it by doing that which the road authority directed the tramway company to do, a direction which they had deliberately disobeyed. It appears to me that the various propositions which have been put before your lordships are answered by the language of the statute itself. I read it in its ordinary and reasonable interpretion. It says: "You, the tramway company, are to be in the first instance the persons taking the care and guardianship of this portion of the public highway; but, although we cast upon you the duty of keeping it in such a condition as not to be a nuisance, we do not make you an independent road authority; you shall act under the direction of the ordinary and usual road authority, and if you do that your obligation is discharged." If there is any other obligation on the part of the road authority itself, we are not concerned to inquire what that is. Here, as it strikes me, no question of a conflict of authority arises, because here the road authority, which has power under this statute to give directions, has directed the tramway company to do the very thing which it is generally agreed ought to be done, and they have refused to do it. Under these circumstances the only question of law which remains is whether the thing which the road authority have ordered the tramway company to do is a thing which can be properly comprehended within the words "repairing and maintaining" the part of the roadway which is under their superintendence. For may own part I cannot entertain any doubt that those words do comprehend it, and I further entertain no doubt that the Legislature intended in giving these special rights to a private company of taking part of the highway for their tramway that they should do that which an ordinary highway authority would be bound to do—namely, take upon themselves in the first instance the obligation of keeping it in a fit and proper condition for public traffic. That they have neglected to do, and the accident was the result. I think, therefore, that they are obviously responsible in damages for the neglect of the duty which the jury have found that they did neglect, and accordingly I move that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord SHAND.—There has been such a general agreement and consensus of opinion on the part of the learned judges in Ireland, with respect to this case, and they are so much in accord with what the Lord Chancellor has just said, that I have very few words to add. It appears to me, notwithstanding the able argument which has been addressed to us on behalf of the tramway company, that, as regards the part of the public road along which the tramway passes, the company have, under the statute, the entire charge and control, and all the duties arising from this portion of the public road, which not only includes the part upon which their rails are laid, but the ground which lies between the tramways and on each side of them for eighteen inches beyond the rails. I need not read the clauses in the statutes, but they make it clear, as I think, that there is a certain portion of the road in that peculiar position. It has been contended on behalf of the tramway company that their obligation is fulfilled if, having made the road and having laid down the setts that are necessary, they keep it in proper repair whatever its condition on the surface may be, and that it lies rather with the municipal authority to see to the condition of the road in that respect when they have so laid it. I am quite unable to agree with the construction which the appellants' counsel desire to place upon the Acts of Parliament. I do not think that the obligation is expressly limited to making and keeping in repair. As the Lord Chancellor has said, the obligation relates to the condition of the road, and is really for the benefit, safety, and protection of the public. I think that, as a condition of the tramway company getting the advantages which they have of making a profit by their line, obligations are laid upon them, and one of those obligations, I take it, is not only to make and repair and maintain the line so far as the laying of stones is concerned, but also to keep the road—that is, the surface—in good order and condition. It is quite clear that slipperiness is at different times, according to the weather, a necessary result of the way in which these setts are laid, and this causes danger to the public unless steps are taken to obviate it. It is true that the Act of Parliament provides that the company shall lay down the same class of material as the municipality have laid down; but though that is provided, and very properly provided, I have no doubt it is also provided that the promoters shall "at all times maintain and keep in good condition and repair with such materials, and in such manner as the road authority shall direct, and to their satisfaction," the part of the road in question. It appears to me that on a proper construction of that provision, which I hold to apply to the surface of the road, if slipperiness occurs upon the road, it is for the persons who have the control and direction of that part of the road to discharge the obligations which the statute has laid upon them, quite apart from the provisions of section 37 of the Act of 1897, which contains the express words "so as not to be a danger or annoyance to the ordinary traffic." Should danger arise in any other way, as by projecting stones, accumulation of rubbish or mud, or the like, so as to create danger or annoyance to the public, the obligation of the company is the same. I hold with FitzGibbon, L.J., and some of the other judges, that, quite apart from that section altogether, under the terms of the previous statutes, the obligation of the company is the same. I am of opinion, therefore, that the judgment is sound, and ought to be affirmed.

Lord DAVEY.—I am of the same opinion. I would first ask myself what is the liability by statute law which the Legislature has imposed upon this tramway company. A great deal of argument, apparently, was expended in the Court of Appeal upon the question under which section they would be liable. I do not think it necessary to state my views upon that question at large, because it is sufficient for me to read the words of section 28 of the Act of 1870. Whether the defendants are also liable under section 37 of the Act of 1897 or not, it is unnecessary for me to say, but at any rate they are liable, in my opinion, because they have imposed upon them by section 28 of the Act of 1870 this obligation: "The promoters shall, at their own expense, at all times maintain and keep in good condition and repair, with such materials and in such manner as the road authority shall direct, and to their satisfaction, so much of any road whereon any tramway belonging to them is laid as lies between the rails of the tramway, and where two tramways are laid by the same promoters in any road at a distance of not more than four feet from each other, the portion of the road between the tramways, and in every case so much of the road as extends eighteen inches beyond the rails of, and on each side of, any such tramway." That is an obligation which the Legislature has imposed upon the promoters, to keep that portion of the roadway which is mentioned in good condition and repair, with such materials and in such manner as the road authority shall direct. What happened in this case was that the road authority directed the tramway company to pave this portion of the roadway with what are called "granite setts." I turn to the evidence of the engineer to the corporation in order to understand exactly what is meant by that expression. He tells us that they are granite stones of a particular form, that they are fitted together, and he says: "The stones when put down originally are dressed—that is, the new setts. As soon as this top portion gets worn off by traffic, and the dressing becomes worn off the stones, they become slippery more or less. In certain states of the atmosphere they are an actual danger to horses and carriages passing over them unless they are sanded. Sanding is the simplest way to protect them. To redress the stones would be a serious thing." Therefore we have this state of facts, that this portion of the road was made with this granite material as directed by the corporation, the road authority, and they directed the use of a material which had this peculiarity, or this liability, that when the surface was worn off it became slippery in certain states of the atmosphere, and, so far as I can judge, most frequently, it became a source of danger to horses passing over it. What, then, was the duty of the tramway company when the granite setts had got into this state? They must keep this roadway "in good condition and repair," and if the roadway as originally constructed had by the wearing of the traffic, or by any other cause, been brought into such a state as to become slippery and dangerous to horses passing over it, it is clear that their obligation of keeping it in good condition was not fulfilled. What, then, was their duty? Their duty was to restore it to a good condition. Now, the corporation have taken exactly this view. They have required the tramway company by a notice to meet the difficulty in this way, "either by placing sand daily on such pavement aforesaid, or by any other means rendering safe and usable the said pavement for traffic." And then the engineer to the corporation goes on to say: "And I require you forthwith to acquaint me of some reasonable and proper mode by which you propose to remedy the condition of such pavement." That seems to me to have been a perfectly proper notice. What the corporation required them to do was to restore the tramway to a good condition to their satisfaction, leaving to the tramway company the choice either of using a temporary expedient, such as sanding the road, or, I suppose, if they had any other mode by which they could restore the road to a good condition, they were at liberty to tell the corporation what they proposed to do, and to take that other measure. But what I wish to impress upon your lordships is this, that it is not a mere question of sanding; that is merely a mode in which the defect could be cured; but what did require to be cured was that the pavement, to the extent that I have mentioned, was out of good condition and repair, and needed to be restored to or kept in that good condition either by some temporary expedient such as sanding, or by some more permanent mode of meeting the defect in granite setts after they had become worn. It was owing to their having become worn, and thereby dangerous, that it was necessary to serve the notice. It seems to me, I confess, that under those circumstances what has been called sanding, or, as I prefer to say, meeting in some proper mode the defect in the granite setts which time had exposed, was really supplemental to and in that sense part of the construction of the pavement; it was making the pavement. I assume that the pavement as originally constructed was properly constructed, but this notice required that the pavement, which had been properly constructed in the first instance, should be supplemented by some means for securing that the streets should be in a good condition for the purpose for which streets are needed—namely, the passage of horses. Some argument was addressed to your lordships based upon the findings of the jury. I must confess that I do not think that the questions were very happily framed for the jury; but when they were asked whether the tramway company were negligent as regards the construction and maintenance of the pavement, to which the answer was "No," I must assume that what was meant was in the supply of materials, the stone and so forth from which it was constructed, because otherwise it appears to me that the answer is inconsistent with the next answer; for when they are asked whether the tramway company were negligent in not sanding the roadway they say "Yes." Sanding the roadway is only a means of maintaining it in proper condition and repair; therefore I think that the answers are on the face of them rather inconsistent in themselves. But your lordships will not, of course, be hampered by any imperfection in the way in which the questions were put to the jury. We have to decide the substance of the case, and I entirely agree with the conclusions which have been expressed by the Lord Chancellor. I have only to add that in nothing that I have said have I expressed any opinion, nor do I intend to express any opinion as to the respective duties of the tramway company and the corporation as to what had been called scavenging—that is to say, as to the ordinary duty of cleaning the streets, and duties of that kind. I regard this case as depending entirely upon the liability of the tramway company to keep the pavement which they have laid down in the road in good condition in the manner directed by the corporation.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I accept the doctrine which has been strongly urged upon your lordships by the appellants, and what they have have got to keep in good condition is the structure or fabric of their part of the roadway. But then the surface is part of that structure or fabric, and, as this is a roadway, a very important part. Now, one of the qualities of the setts of which the structure is composed is either that they never possess grittiness, or, as seems to be really the case, with use the surface loses its original roughness, which is an element of safety, and in certain states of the weather is slippery and dangerous. Now, what sand supplies is simply this grittiness which originally was supplied by the roughness of the setts themselves. Accordingly, while it cannot be asserted that in ordinary weather the setts are in bad condition, yet, on the other hand, in certain weather it cannot be asserted that they are in good condition. Therefore if the appellants use materials having this kind of surface, they must from time to time supply by sand to this material what other materials might of themselves in all conditions supply by the roughness of their own surfaces. On this ground I concur in the decision of the courts in Ireland.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Clay & Close, for Casey & Clay, Dublin.

Solicitors for the respondent, Stibbard, Gibson, & Co., for J. Fitzgerald, Dublin.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Feb. 12, 13.

BELL v. MARSH. (a.)

Solicitor and client—Conveyance to client prepared by solicitor—Portion of solicitor's property comprised—Negligence—Estoppel.

A person who relies on an estoppel by negligence must show that he was led into a belief on which he acted to his detriment.

A solicitor was ordered by his client to investigate the title to and prepare a conveyance of property adjoining his (the solicitor's) property. In the conveyance a small portion of the solicitor's property was comprised, but the client did not believe, nor was he led by the solicitor to believe, that he was buying the small portion in question. The client subsequently brought an action claiming the land.

Held, that the solicitor was not estopped from setting up the truth.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J.

The facts were as follows:

Madeira Hall and Madeira Cliff were two adjoining properties at Ventnor, Isle of Wight.

Madeira Cliff belonged to Mr. Urry, a solicitor, and he had in 1880 built a greenhouse, which, to the extent of one-third of its length, encroached upon the Madeira Hall property, though he was not aware of the enroachment. To this small portion of encroached land he subsequently acquired a prescriptive title.

In 1893 Madeira Hall was put up for sale by auction, and in the particulars was included the small piece of ground on which Mr. Urry had erected a portion of his greenhouse. It was purchased about two weeks after the date of the auction by private treaty, but subject to the same particulars and conditions as at the auction.

The purchaser was the plaintiff, Dr. Bell, and he asked Mr. Urry to act for him as solicitor in completing the purchase. Mr. Urry accordingly investigated the title and prepared the conveyance.

The conveyance was dated the 26th of January, 1894, and the parcels, which were taken from previous conveyances of the same property, through inadvertence, comprised the small portion of rocky ground in question. If Mr. Urry had at the time of preparing the conveyance tested the measurements of the property as they appeared in the description of the parcels and the plan contained in the title-deeds, he would have discovered his mistake. However, he and his client, Dr. Bell, had, before the completion of the purchase, walked over the property, and Dr. Bell was never given to believe, and in fact did not believe, that he was buying the little bit of ground with its greenhouse.

Early in 1898 the plaintiff discovered that the piece of ground in question was included in his conveyance, but he let the matter rest and never spoke to Mr. Urry about it.

Mr. Urry, who had been ailing, died in September, 1899.

In October, 1900, his personal representatives, the defendants in this action, offered Madeira Cliff for sale. Dr. Bell, discovering from the plan annexed to the particulars that the property to be sold comprised this piece of ground, objected, and no sale was effected.

Subsequently he brought this action, claiming a declaration that the defendants, as representatives of Mr. Urry, were not entitled to set up as against the plaintiff any right in or title to the encroached land, and that the defendants might be ordered to convey to the plaintiff any estate, right, title, interest, or claim which they might have to that land, and to deliver possession thereof to the plaintiff.

Buckley, J., held that the defendants, as representatives of Mr. Urry, were estopped by breach of duty from setting up their title. Mr. Urry, as the plaintiffs' solicitor, had been under a duty to see that the plaintiff had got a good title to the whole of the property which he had agreed to purchase. He had represented to the plaintiff that he had got this title, and the plaintiff had thereupon paid his purchase-money.

The defendants appealed.

Astbury, K.C., and K. G. Metcalf, for the appellants.—Estoppel is a common law doctrine: Bloomenthal v. Ford, 45 W. R. 449, [1897] A. C. 156. In estoppel you must have a representation by words or conduct, known to the person making it, and the person to whom it is made must believe it and act upon it: Pickard v. Sears, 6 A. & E. 469; Freeman v. Cooke, 2 Exch. 654. In estoppel arising from negligence, the negligence must be the proximate cause of the loss suffered by the person who relies on the estoppel, and the representation must have been made to the knowledge of the person making it. Mr. Urry did not know he was telling Bell that Bell's property included the site of his greenhouse. Mr. Urry may be liable for negligence, but the representation was not intended, for you cannot intend a thing of which you have no knowledge: Carr v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 23 W. R. 747, L. R. 10 C. P. 307; Low v. Bouverie, 40 W. R. 50, [1891] 3 Ch. 82. The mere fact that a man breaks his duty is not enough to create an estoppel. The plaintiff was not misled. Neither party knew that the little bit in dispute was in the contract. Their express knowledge and belief overrides any representation which might be implied from Mr. Urry's conduct. If Mr. Urry was guilty of negligence, Dr. Bell had the ordinary remedy. In estoppel there must be a clear and unambiguous representation of an existing fact: Jordan v. Money, 5 H. L. Cas. 185.

Terrell, K.C., and J. T. Prior, for respondents.—If a solicitor is instructed to investigate and prepare title-deeds, when he hands over those deeds he impliedly says: "Here are the title-deeds of the property which you contracted to buy." If circumstances impose upon a solicitor the duty of knowing facts, he is estopped by breach of duty from subsequently taking advantage of those facts: In re Ward, 31 Beav. 1, 11 W. R. Ch. Dig. 100. Suppose a solicitor has a mortgage on property which he has forgotten and that property is sold to his client free from incumbrances, the solicitor by his conduct represents to his client that he has done his duty and that the conveyance is the result. He is precluded from afterwards saying that his representation was untrue: Freeman v. Cooke. Under the contract Dr. Bell did agree to buy the whole piece of land as set forth in the particulars. His position was completely changed after he had parted with the purchase-money. Mr. Urry was resident himself at the property, and it was clearly his duty to have found out the proper boundary. The neglect of such a very simple thing must recoil on his own head.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is in substance an action of ejectment which has taken an equitable colouring.

(a.) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question for decision is whether the defendants are estopped from setting up their title to the land claimed by the plaintiff.

In 1894 the plaintiff acquired certain land in the Isle of Wight, known as Madeira Hall. The defendants are the executors of Mr. Urry, the solicitor who acted for the plaintiff in the purchase of the land. Both before and after the conveyance Mr. Urry was himself the occupant of adjoining property, Madeira Cliff, which property embraced rocky ground on which Urry had from 1880 placed cucumber frames and a greenhouse. Two or three days before purchasing the property the plaintiff went over the ground with Mr. Urry. He was aware that Mr. Urry was in possession of the greenhouse. He had not any idea that the property he was buying embraced any portion of the greenhouse. All the documents respecting the title were sent to and approved of by Mr. Urry. The boundary line in the conveyance embraced a portion of Mr. Urry's greenhouse. Mr. Urry might by measurement have ascertained that the boundary embraced the greenhouse. He had himself been in possession of the greenhouse for a period much longer than the statutory period. The plaintiff says in his evidence that he did not consider he was buying any portion of the greenhouse. For four years after the conveyance had been completed it never occurred to him to claim that any part of the greenhouse was his. Then certain circumstances put him upon inquiry, and for a year before Mr. Urry's death he became aware that the conveyance did embrace the greenhouse. Mr. Urry, it is true, was in delicate health for six months before his death, yet the plaintiff said nothing about the matter for a whole year and a-half.

The question simply is this: It being known to Mr. Bell at the time of the purchase that Mr. Urry was in the possessson of the greenhouse, are Urry and his executors estopped from setting up the truth? It is said that Mr. Urry's conduct brings him under the law of estoppel. Now, estoppel is part of the law of evidence. Do the conditions create an estoppel. Dr. Bell admits that he was under no impression that he was acquiring any part of the greenhouse. In order to establish estoppel he must show that he was led to change his position by representations made for that purpose by Mr. Urry. If he cannot do that he cannot succeed. The representations in estoppel may be made by conduct—for example, negligence. When you test the links in the chain, are they all sound? It seems to me that the estoppel breaks down in the most crucial place. If the plaintiff relies on negligence, he has got to show that the negligence was the proximate cause of his acting in the manner he did. The law is summed up in the judgments of Wilde, B., and Blackburn, J., in Swan v. North British Australasian Co., 10 W. R. 841, 7 H. & N. 603, 11 W. R. 862, 2 H. & C. 175, at p. 182. What evidence is there that the plaintiff was led into a belief on which he acted to his detriment? He bought the property without intending to acquire the greenhouses. The representation alleged is that the property embraced the whole of the greenhouse. How can he aver that at one and the same time he was led to act on the belief that he was getting it? That is in itself a complete answer to the whole case. But I am not satisfied that even in the earlier parts the plaintiff has made out his case. He says that the solicitor ought to have found out that part of the greenhouse passed by conveyance to the plaintiff. Now test that by the passage from Blackburn, J. The negligence was not the proximate cause; it had nothing to do with the action of the plaintiff in buying. I do not feel sure that Buckley, J., fully appreciated the importance of this—viz., that a person seeking to set up an estoppel by conduct must show that he was induced to change his position on the faith of that conduct. The plaintiff did not so change his position. For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is rather important to see what this case is not. It is not a case of fraud, nor is it a case where the defendants are trying to establish a right because of a defect in the conveyance to the plaintiff. It is a case of a very different character. The plaintiff comes forward and says that the defendants are estopped from setting forth the truth of their title. What is the truth estopped? In fact and in truth at the date of the conveyance to the plaintiff Mr. Urry was in possession of and claimed a title to, the greenhouse in dispute. Now, did, Mr. Urry lead the plaintiff to believe that he was not in possession of or had no title to this greenhouse? I doubt very much whether any such representation can be inferred. But, further, the plaintiff must show that he acted on such representation. To this there can be only one answer. The plaintiff did not believe that Urry was not the owner of the greenhouse, nor was he induced to act to his detriment at all. This answers the whole case. It is no use for the plaintiff to say generally and vaguely, "I did not know what I contracted to buy, but my solicitor by his conduct made it clear what I contracted to buy." It would have been sad indeed if the plaintiff had been able to succeed in this action. It is an action which ought never to have been brought.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Assume that the plaintiff did contract to buy this particular piece of ground. Yet, if he had been told that it was not included, would he have refused to complete? The answer, according to the evidence, is clearly "No." There did not exist what is an essential in a case of estoppel—a misrepresentation of fact relied upon by the other side.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Herbert B. Bell; Peacock & Goddard, for Urry & Woods, Ventnor, Isle of Wight.

---

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Feb. 10.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. LORD MONTAGU. (a.)

Inland revenue—Estate duty—Settled property—Mortgage by tenant for life and remainderman—Indemnity to tenant for life—Value of property passing on death of tenant for life—Equity of redemption—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 1; s. 2, sub-section 1 (h); s. 7.

An estate was settled by will upon a tenant for life with remainder to a second tenant for life, with remainder in fee. The first tenant for life and the remaindermen mortgaged the estate in fee as security for an advance to the remaindermen, who alone covenanted with the mortgagee to repay the advance and interest thereon. By an indenture of even date the remaindermen covenanted to indemnify the first tenant for life against any liability or loss and against any claims or proceedings in respect of the mortgage debt, and they conveyed an annuity to trustees as security for the performance of the covenant. The first tenant for life was in fact kept indemnified against any claim upon her or her estate. On the death in 1895 of the first tenant for life the Crown claimed estate duty under section 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, upon the principal value of the estate, without deducting the amount of the mortgage debt, as property passing on the death of the tenant for life, on the ground that the tenant for life, by reason of the indemnity, had been beneficially interested in the estate to its full value.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that estate duty was only payable on the principal value of the estate after deducting the mortgage debt.

Judgment of Phillimore, J. (50 W. R. 270, [1902] 1 K. B. 429), reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of Phillimore, J., upon an information by the Attorney-General claiming estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894 (reported in 50 W. R. 270, [1902] 1 K. B. 429).

By the will of the Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry the testator appointed the Ditton estate to the use of his wife, Charlotte Anne, Duchess of Buccleuch and Queensberry, for her life, and after her death to the use of the testator's second son, the defendant, for his life, and after his death to the use of the first, second, third, and all and every other the son and sons of the defendant successively in tail male, with remainders over.

The duke died on the 16th of April, 1884.

By an indenture dated the 28th of May, 1888, and made between the dowager duchess of the first part, the defendant of the second part, the eldest son (who had attained the age of twenty-one years) of the defendant of the third part, and certain trustees of the fourth part, and enrolled as a disentailing assurance, the defendant and his eldest son, with the consent of the dowager duchess as protector of the settlement, conveyed the Ditton estate to the trustees in fee simple, subject to the life estate of the dowager duchess, but freed from the life estate of the defendant under the will of the duke, to such uses and in such manner as the defendant and his eldest son should from time to time by deed jointly appoint, and in default of and subject to any such appointment to the use of the defendant for his life, with remainder to such uses as the said eldest son, after the death of the defendant, should from time to time by deed or will appoint, and in default of and subject to any such appointment to the use of the said eldest son for his life, with remainder to the use of his first and other sons successively in tail male, with remainders over.

By an indenture dated the 29th of May, 1888, and made between the dowager duchess of the first part, the defendant of the second part, the said eldest son of the third part, and certain mortgagees of the fourth part, in consideration of £27,000 lent to the defendant and the said eldest son, at the request of the dowager duchess, by the mortgagees, the defendant and his eldest son jointly and severally covenanted with the mortgagees to repay them the said sum with interest thereon, and the dowager duchess, as tenant for life in possession, granted, and the defendant and his eldest son, in exercise of the joint power of appointment given to them over the fee simple in remainder expectant on the death of the dowager duchess by the deed of the 28th of May, 1888, appointed, the Ditton estate unto and to the use of the mortgagees in fee simple, subject to a proviso for redemption.

By another indenture dated the 29th of May, 1888, and made between the defendant of the first part, his eldest son of the second part, the dowager duchess of the third part, and certain trustees of the fourth part (which recited that the dowager duchess agreed, at the request of the defendant and his eldest son, to concur in the above-mentioned mortgage upon the express condition that she should be indemnified in respect thereof in manner thereinafter appearing), the defendant and his eldest son jointly and severally covenanted with the dowager duchess to keep her indemnified against the mortgage debt of £27,000 and interest, and against all actions, suits, proceedings, claims, and demands which might be brought or made by any person or persons against her or the Ditton estate during her life by way of enforcing the mortgage security, or for or in respect of the sum of £27,000 and interest thereby secured; and the defendant and his eldest son conveyed to the trustees an annuity and rent-charge of £1,500, payable out of the Clitheroe estate upon trust thereout during the life of the dowager duchess to keep down the interest on the mortgage debt of £27,000, to the intent that the life interest of the dowager duchess in the Ditton estate might be wholly exonerated therefrom, and to pay her all sums which she might from time to time be compelled to pay by reason of the mortgage security or in respect of the money secured thereby, and also to repay and make good to her all rents and profits of the Ditton estate which, but for the mortgage security, would have been paid or payable to her, and to pay her compensation in respect of any messuage, lands, or hereditaments forming part of the Ditton estate of which she might be deprived of the possession by reason of the mortgage security, and generally at all times thereafter to save harmless and keep indemnified the dowager duchess from and against the mortgage debt and the interest thereon, and from and against all actions, suits, proceedings, claims, and demands in respect thereof.

The dowager duchess died on the 28th of March, 1895.

The mortgage of the 29th of May, 1888, was created wholly for the benefit of the defendant and his eldest son, or one of them, and the dowager duchess and her estate were in fact kept wholly indemnified by them, or one of them, against the mortgage and all claims for interest or otherwise in respect thereof. The information stated that the defendant as tenant for life in possession of the Ditton estate was bound to deliver an account and to pay estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, on the principal value thereof, but that, in delivering such account, he claimed to deduct the mortgage for £27,000 from the capital value of the estate.

The Crown claimed that upon the death of the dowager duchess estate duty became payable under the Finance Act, 1894, upon the principal value of the Ditton estate as property which passed on her death within the meaning of that Act without deduction of the mortgage debt of £27,000.

Phillimore, J., held that by reason of the deed of indemnity the dowager duchess must be deemed to have been beneficially interested in the Ditton estate to its full value, and that it was this full interest which passed on her death. He accordingly gave judgment for the Crown.

The defendant appealed.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Austen Cartmell, for the defendant.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., Sir Edward Carson, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.

The following cases were referred to: Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 47 W. R. 525, [1899] A. C. 198; Attorney-General v. Beech, 47 W. R. 257, [1899] A. C. 53; Attorney-General v. De Preville. 48 W. R. 193, [1900] 1 Q. B. 223; and Tennant v. Smith, [1892] A. C. 150, at p. 154, 40 W. R. Dig. 216.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my opinion we cannot affirm the judgment of Phillimore, J.. in this case. I do not propose to go through the facts at length, but I may state them shortly so as to make the reasons for my judgment clear. By the will of the Duke of Buccleuch the duchess had a life interest in the Ditton estate, and subject to her life interest the estate was to go to the second son of the duke for life with remainder to that son's first and other sons in tail male successively. The second son of the duke and his eldest son, when of age, being desirous of raising a sum of money, secured the co-operation of the duchess in joining in a mortgage of the Ditton estate to the lenders, and it is not disputed that the legal effect of that mortgage was that the fee simple in the estate was conveyed to the lenders as their security, and there was nothing left in the duchess under the will of the duke except a life estate in the equity of redemption. It is not disputed that on the death of the duchess the interest which thereupon passed—by "passed" I mean which thereupon arose upon her death in the persons claiming in remainder—was simply this equity of redemption. The question arises as to what estate duty then became payable. As I understand it, it is not denied that the case falls within section 1 of the Finance Act, 1894.

In those circumstances it is said that the duty ought to be paid as if the life estate of the duchess had continued as it was under the will of the duke, because by a deed of even date with the mortgage Lord Montagu and his son gave an indemnity to the duchess, and that we ought for the purposes of the Finance Act, 1894, to hold that the Crown is entitled to the same duty as if the mortgage had never been made. I cannot agree that the giving of the indemnity has this effect. It is said that we ought to look at the reality and substance of the transaction. I agree; but we are not, because we are to look at the reality and substance, to deal with it as if it were something which it is not. We are not to deal with it as if there was some section in extension of sections 1 and 2 of the Act which would enable us to deem property to pass, other than what is therein specified, which in truth and in fact has not passed, or which would enable us to deal with matters as coming within the Act because it might be said that they come within the spirit and intention of the Act. There is no part of the Act which enables us to do anything of the sort. We have merely to deal with the words of the Act, and it seems to me that we have simply to ask ourselves the question whether anything passed on the death of the duchess except the estate subject to the mortgage. With regard to this I think that if one reads the opinion of Lord Davey in Lord Cowley v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, [1899] A. C. at p. 219, it really seems as if he was dealing prophetically with the very case now before us. He says: "Since the decision in Attorney-General v. Beech, it cannot be denied that, if tenant for life and remainder-man in fee combine to sell settled property, it is thereby taken out of the settlement, and does not pass, and is not to be deemed to pass, on the death of the life tenant. And I think the result must be the same if, instead of selling, they combine to create a mortgage in fee upon the settled property. Pro tanto the property is taken out of the settlement, and what passes on the death of the tenant for life is the equity of redemption only, and the benefit accruing or arising in that event is in that equity alone." It seems to me that those words cover this very case.

An argument has been addressed to us on behalf of the Crown with reference to section 7, sub-sections 1 and 7, of the Act. I am not sure that I followed the drift of that argument. I am not quite sure whether it was intended to say that by reason of what was found there we ought to give a very wide meaning to section 1, or whether we ought to amplify section 2. I myself prefer to say as Lord Davey says, and as I think Lord Macnaghten also says, that we need not trouble ourselves with section 7 at all. The truth is, that when once one has arrived at the conclusion that all that could pass, or did pass, on the death of the duchess was the equity of redemption, one need not trouble oneself further with any arguments based on section 7. In my judgment the decision of Phillimore, J., ought to be reversed, and judgment given in favour of the appellant.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We are dealing here with an information by the Crown asking for a declaration that upon the death of the duchess estate duty became payable under the provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, upon the principal value of the Ditton estate devised by the will of the duke, as property which passed on her death within the meaning of the Act, without deduction of the mortgage debt of £27,000, created by an indenture of mortgage of the 29th of May, 1888; and Phillimore, J., has made a declaration in accordance with the prayer. We are not concerned to inquire whether there may not be a right to estate duty in some other aspect of the transaction which gave rise to the present question. All we have to consider is whether the duty became payable on this estate as property which on the death of the duchess passed within the meaning of the Act without deduction of the mortgage for £27,000.

Now section 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, provides that there shall "be levied and paid upon the principal value ascertained as hereinafter provided of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person a duty called estate duty." The first question to be considered is what is the meaning of "property which passes on the death of" the person referred to. That had to be considered by the House of Lords in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Commissioners; and Lord Macnaghten deals with it in this way [1899] A. C., at p. 212: "What the Act has in view for the purpose of taxation is property passing on death, not the interest of the deceased, which if it be a limited interest can never pass. With an interest that ceases on death the Act is not directly concerned, except in the one case where without any passing of property a benefit accrues or arises by reason of the cesser of a determinable interest such as a charge that expires." Therefore we have to look and see, with reference to the death, what property it was that passed, not what was the interest of the deceased person.

The question in this case is whether or no the Ditton estate passed subject to the mortgage or not. At the date of the mortgage on the 29th of May, 1888, the property stood limited under the will of the duke, first to the duchess for her life, with remainder to her son, the defendant, for his life, with remainder to his eldest son originally in tail, but practically at that date in fee because a disentailing deed had been executed by father and son by which they were given a joint power of appointment over the estate by the exercise of which they could pass the fee. Therefore practically it comes to the same thing as if the duchess and Lord Montagu had been successively tenants for life with remainder to the eldest son in fee. Now father and son were desirous of raising a sum of £27,000, and they applied to the duchess to aid him in that purpose. One way in which that £27,000 might have been raised would have been by selling a specific portion of the property. If that course had been pursued and a certain specific part of the property had been sold with the concurrence of all, and the purchase-money handed over to the father and son, or to all three, there would have been an end, so far as the settlement was concerned, of the property which was sold. I do not think it could have been contended that after that transaction the property sold was any longer comprised in the settlement. The sole property which would have remained in this settlement would have been the unsold portion, and on that alone estate duty would have fallen. In the present case that was not done, but the duchess, Lord Montagu, and his eldest son executed a mortgage in fee by which the estate was conveyed to mortgagees to secure the sum of £27,000. That sum was paid to the father and son, and they covenanted for repayment of it. The duchess did not make herself liable in any way to the mortgagees for the repayment of the £27,000 and interest, although she conveyed her legal estate; and father and son, by a deed of even date, entered into covenants by which she was to be indemnified in respect of the mortgage, and further conveyed property to trustees by way of security for the performance of the covenant of indemnity. But whatever the arrangements were between these three persons, they combined together to execute a legal mortgage to the mortgagees for £27,000, and the question we have to consider is what is the effect of that on the property which passed within the meaning of section 1 of the Act. That is answered for us in very clear terms in the words of Lord Davey which have been already read, and which it is unnecessary for me to read again. It is the same thing as if the tenant for life and the remainderman in fee had combined together to sell a portion of the property and take it completely out of the settlement. So I read the decision of Lord Cowley's case, which cannot be neglected in the present case; and it seems to me that, so reading that decision, we can come to no other conclusion than that the property which remained in the settlement was in this case simply the equity of redemption and nothing more, and that consequently the mortgage for £27,000 must be deducted from the principal value of the estate.

I have very little say with regard to the other points which have been urged upon us. As regards section 2 of the Act, it does not seem to me to apply for the same reasons as are given in Lord Cowley's case; and as regards section 7, sub-section 1, which was very much relied on, I can only say, as in that case, that, whatever it may apply to, it does not seem to me to apply to the present case, because there is no deduction and no sums are charged upon or payable out of the property which remains in settlement—namely, the equity of redemption.

For these reasons I think that the appeal ought to be allowed, and I respectfully differ from Phillimore, J., as I think for the reasons I have given that he did not give proper effect to the three cases of Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, Attorney-General v. Beech, and Attorney-General v. De Preville.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The short question here is whether the estate passed on the death of the duchess subject to the mortgage, or whether it passed not so subject. It is said that it did not pass subject to the mortgage because of the contract of indemnity. There seems to me to be nothing in the Act to justify that contention. There is nothing in the language of the Act to bear it out. An argument was based on section 7 with the view of inducing us to look at the spirit of the Act, and to deal with the matter upon that footing. When we examine section 1 it appears to me to be clear. The position of things was that after the mortgage was entered into there remained the equity of redemption, and what passed on the death of the duchess was that equity of redemption. Section 1 provides that there shall be "levied and paid upon the principal value ascertained as hereinafter provided of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person a duty called estate duty." What passed in this case seems to me to be clearly the equity of redemption and nothing more, and that disposes of the case. The appeal must consequently be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the defendant, Nicholl, Manisty, & Co.

Solicitor for the Crown, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

---

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L JJ.) } Dec. 11, 12, 20.

STAGG v. MEDWAY (UPPER) NAVIGATION CO. (a.)

Company—Borrowing powers—Company incorporated by statute—Power to mortgage surplus lands—Security for existing debt—Transfer of mortgage—Ultra vires.

A company incorporated by special Act, though possessing no express powers of borrowing except on the security of its undertaking, has power to charge its surplus lands for the purpose of further securing a valid debt already incurred.

Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 15 W. R. 325, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 201, and Ex parte Grissell, 15 W. R. 324, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 385, discussed and applied.

Decision of Swinfen Eady, J. (50 W. R. 446), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Swinfen Eady, J. (reported 50 W. R. 446), in an action to restrain the defendant company from mortgaging its surplus lands.

By the Medway (Upper) Navigation Acts, 1664 and 1739, the Company of Proprietors of the Navigation of the River Medway were incorporated for the purposes of improving the navigation of the river.

These Acts did not give the company any power to borrow on mortgage, but in 1892 the Medway (Upper) Navigation Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. lxxxvii.), was passed re-incorporating the company and changing its name to the Medway (Upper) Navigation Co.

The Act contained a recital that the company had borrowed on mortgage of their lands, tolls, rates, and duties a sum of £6,000, which was still due and owing, and that it was expedient that they should be empowered to pay off these moneys notwithstanding any question as to the legality thereof.

Section 13 accordingly provided as follows: "Notwithstanding any question as to the legality of the power of the company to borrow" the moneys in question, "and which moneys have been expended upon the undertaking, the company shall be at liberty to repay the amounts" secured as in the section mentioned, "and for the purpose of paying off such mortgage the company may borrow on mortgage of their undertaking any sum not exceeding £6,000, provided that the amount to be borrowed under the general borrowing powers conferred by this Act shall be reduced by the amount borrowed under this section."

Section 15 empowered the company to borrow on mortgage of the undertaking any sum not exceeding in the whole £10,000. Section 18, sub-section 1, empowered it to retain and let or cultivate or use lands which were or would eventually be required, in the opinion of the company, for the purposes of the undertaking, and by sub-section 2 to sell land not so required. Sub-section 3 provided that moneys received in respect of lands were to be applied, if attributable to income, as income, and if attributable to capital, in repayment of moneys borrowed or for any other purpose for which capital was properly applicable, and meanwhile to be invested in trustee securities or in any other manner authorized by the company at a general meeting.

(a.) Reported by H. W. LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By section 16 the company might create debenture stock, but the interest on all debenture stock and all mortgages was to rank pari passu irrespective of the dates of the securities, and have priority over all principal moneys secured by the mortgages.

No express power of borrowing except on the security of the undertaking was conferred by the Act.

On the 18th of February, 1893, the company, in pursuance of the above provisions, paid off the old mortgage and mortgaged the undertaking afresh to William Levett, who had now called in £2,000 of the debt, and had therefore been given notice by the company that the whole would be paid off. For this purpose the company was making arrangements to transfer the mortgage; but the proposed transferees stipulated that the surplus lands and the proceeds of sale of them must be included in the security.

The plaintiff Stagg, who was a director and shareholder, thereupon brought this action to restrain the company from carrying out the arrangement on the ground that it was ultra vires to mortgage the surplus lands.

Swinfen Eady, J., held that the transaction was valid, on the ground that the company were making no fresh loan, but arranging terms with regard to an antecedent debt, and that if the surplus lands were liable to be taken by a judgment creditor, the company could anticipate that event by making them a security for the debt.

The plaintiff appealed.

Rowden, K.C., and Leeke, for the appellant.—The company cannot charge its surplus lands for the purpose of securing or further securing a debt. There is no authority for the proposition that a company incorporated by special Act can do so. Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway, 15 W. R. 325, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 201 (see also Ex parte Grissell, 15 W. R. 324, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 385), decided that a mortgagee of the undertaking took nothing by way of rents or proceeds of sale of surplus land; and the railway company was in a much better position for giving a charge than the company here. If Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway could be treated as an authority for the respondent, it was a decision only on the particular facts of that case, which was very different from this case. If this is a good charge the company can raise money indirectly by transferring charges. Blackmore v. Yates, 15 W. R. 750, L. R. 2 Ex. 225, the principle of which Swinfen Eady, J., declared applicable, was a very special case.

They also cited Lady Wenlock v. River Dee Navigation Co., 10 App. Cas. 354, 33 W. R. Dig. 28; section 127 of the Land Clauses Act, 1845; and various sections of the company's special Act of 1892.

Theobald, K.C., and Dunham, for the company.—In Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway the question was whether a charge included surplus lands. The creditor here could obtain a judgment and take the lands in execution, and it is extraordinary if the company cannot anticipate this by giving a charge. Blackmore v. Yates is directly in our favour. [COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—Has that case ever been followed?] It has very often been cited. This transaction is not borrowing, but merely a transfer of a debt as a condition of which transfer the transferee requires further security. The Act of 1892 was intended to give this company increased powers, not to restrict it. In a case falling under the Lands Clauses Acts, which do not apply to this company at all, it may be that a mortgage of surplus lands is prohibited by implication, since there is an express direction for sale; but in the present case there is only a power, and there is nothing in the special Act to prevent the company from applying these lands, which are part of its capital, for the payment of its debts.

They also cited In re Ogilvie, 20 W. R. 226, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 174, and Pickering v. Ilfracombe Railway Co., 16 W. R. 458, L. R. 3 C. P. 235.

Rowden, in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 20.—The following judgments were delivered:

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think that the judgment of Swinfen Eady, J., was quite right and ought to be affirmed. His judgment is based upon principles recognized, as he points out, both in Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., Ex parte Grissell, and in Blackmore v. Yates. This, as Swinfen Eady, J., points out, is not a case of borrowing, or one in which the company contemplates borrowing. There was an existing debt, the validity of which is recognized by the Act of 1892. The company, acting under the powers of section 13 of the Act, borrowed £6,000 of Mr. Levett on a mortgage of the undertaking. This mortgage debt is now due, and the company has found certain persons who will take a transfer of Mr. Levett's mortgage, but require as a further security a charge on the surplus lands of the company. The sole question therefore is, can the company give this charge to secure this valid existing debt? I think it can, and that to do so is not ultra vires. The observation of Lord Cairns (then Cairns, L.J.) in Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., L. R. 2 Ch. App., at p. 219, seems plainly to apply. He says: "It cannot in my opinion be doubted but that the company, owing a sum to their contractors for works done, might have paid this sum out of those surplus sale moneys (the claim of debenture-holders being out of the way); and if so they might equally, as I think, have given the contractors a charge upon the sale moneys for the amount." It is true that this observation deals only with proceeds of the sale of surplus lands, and not with surplus lands themselves; but the security given was a charge upon the surplus lands, and the rents and proceeds of the sale of such lands, and the principle involved in the observation does not seem to be affected by being applied to the proceeds. I do not gather that Lord Cairns meant to exclude surplus lands, at all events in any case where such lands were extendible by elegit, and could thus be compulsorily applied to the satisfaction of the creditor's debt. This principle is recognized in Blackmore v. Yates, where a railway company conveyed to a creditor (before the Act for the protection of rolling stock) their rolling stock as security. I do not think that one ought to read the observation of Martin B., declining to determine what the shareholders or the Attorney-General might do to prevent the charge being given, as really affecting the principle. It is a remark made ex abundanti cautela. In In re Calne Railway Co., L. R. 9 Eq. 658, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 116, and in In re Ogilvie the right of a judgment creditor of a railway company to obtain an order for a conveyance in the former case, and an order for sale in the latter, was recognized. It is true that the transferees of this mortgage debt are not judgment creditors, but they could as transferees obtain judgment, and the company may give them by arrangement that which they could obtain by judgment. This being so, it is only necessary to ascertain whether there is anything in the Act of 1892 precluding this company from thus dealing with its surplus lands. I think not. Section 16, which was pressed upon us, deals only with priorities. Section 18 (2) does not seem to me to preclude a mortgage to secure an existing debt. It may be that there will be nothing upon which the mortgage can attach until the company has declared that in its opinion particular land will not be required for the purposes of the undertaking; but this does not make the mortgage ultra vires. And I see nothing in section 18 (3) to prevent the company applying moneys received in respect of the sale of surplus lands in payment of debts.

STIRLING, L.J., after stating the facts, said that the transferee was in the same position as the original mortgagee with regard to the debt, and that the case ought to be considered exactly as if the original mortgagee were applying for payment and being offered additional security, it being an arrangement between the company and its creditor for the payment of a valid debt. His lordship then continued: Now, the company is a statutory corporation, and therefore it has only such powers as the Legislature has conferred on it, whether expressly or by necessary implication. The Legislature, by section 13 of the Act of 1892, has conferred on the company a power of borrowing, but in my view of the facts the borrowing powers of the company are not in question in this case. The company has a power to contract debts, both by borrowing and otherwise, for the purposes for which it is incorporated, and is under an obligation to pay them when they become due. Of necessity it must have power to make proper arrangements for this payment when they become due, and in my judgment that includes a power of giving security to the creditor in a case where it is not in a position to make immediate payment. I think this power is clearly recognized both in Pickering v. Ilfracombe Railway Co. and in The Imperial Mercantile Credit Association's case in Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway, L. R. 2 Ch. App., at p. 219, both of which, especially the second, are cases of very high authority. Now, what is proposed in the present case is to give the transferee an equitable mortgage on all the surplus lands of the company and all proceeds of sale thereof or arising therefrom. Various objections were raised to the giving of this charge. In the first place, it was said that the company would thereby infringe section 16 of the special Act, which puts the holders of mortgages and of debenture stock on the same footing. But Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway shews that the surplus lands of a company of this kind do not form part of its undertaking, and therefore lie outside the mortgages of the undertaking authorized by section 13. That, therefore, does not stand in the way of this charge. But what was really relied on was section 18, the first sub-section of which empowers the company to retain and let or cultivate lands required for the purposes of the undertaking. These are lands of a different class from those comprised in the charge; but the second sub-section, empowering the company to sell lands not required for the purposes of the undertaking, does deal with the lands proposed to be charged, and the argument is, that inasmuch as the company has an express power to sell those lands, it is by implication deprived of a power of charging them. Now probably that is to some extent well founded. I should say, for example, that if the company were borrowing it could not create a charge on those lands, because all it has power to give a security upon by section 13 is the undertaking. But the Imperial Mercantile Credit Association's case, which I have already mentioned, is an express authority for the proposition that the company may create a charge on the proceeds of sale of its surplus lands for the purpose of securing a debt due and payable to the company. In the present case there are no rights of pre-emption hampering the exercise of the power of sale conferred upon the company, and that power may be exercised by the company for its own benefit as and when it thinks fit, and most certainly may be exercised for the purpose of paying its just debts which are payable. Under these circumstances I can see no reason why the company should not be able, for the purpose of securing the payment of a debt which it is not ready to pay at the moment, to give a charge upon the land themselves as well as on the proceeds of sale. I should just like to add this, that I have dealt with this case on the footing that this is a bonâ fide transaction between the company and the transferee of an existing mortgage. If it were made out that this power was being used merely as a cloak for adding to the borrowing powers of the company, very different considerations would apply, and a very different conclusion might be arrived at. But as it is I think the appeal ought to be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J. — This appeal raises the question whether it is competent to the defendant company to give a charge for an admitted debt upon the surplus lands of the company and the proceeds of sale of such lands. The transaction is not one of borrowing. It will be convenient to consider this question in the first instance as though the company were a railway company governed by sections 127-131 of the Land Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and afterwards to consider the language of the special Act governing the company. It was expressly decided by the Court of Appeal in 1867 in Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., that such a charge would be good as against the surplus sale moneys. [His lordship here read the words of Lord Cairns, quoted above by Vaughan Williams, L.J., and also the succeeding sentence in Lord Cairns' judgment.] It was not necessary in that case to go any further. The company there would doubtless have been involved in trouble and expense in dealing with a great number of small strips of land if the concurrence of the contractors, whose debt was £135,000, had been necessary to the completion of every transaction. The contractors were content with the charge given by the Lords Justices upon the sale moneys. I cannot, however, read that judgment as a decision that the surplus land could not be charged, though the proceeds of sale might be charged, nor can I see any ground for such a distinction. It has repeatedly been held that a judgment creditor to whom land has been delivered in execution may obtain an order for sale of surplus lands, although under ordinary circumstances the court would in the first instance only direct inquiry as to what lands are superfluous and whether there are any incumbrances: see Gardner v. London Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., Ex parte Grissell. It has never been held that the obligations imposed upon the company to sell the superfluous land within a certain period, or under some circumstances to give a right of pre-emption to the adjoining owner, were obligations of such a nature as to be inconsistent with a sale. The judgment of James, V.C., in In re Calne Railway Co. is a clear authority on this point. In that case the judgment creditor obtained an immediate order for sale under 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112 to the adjoining owner, who had a right of pre-emption, and the court ordered the company to join in the conveyance. The Vice-Chancellor pointed out that under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 3. the judgment creditor had the same remedies as if the company had by writing agreed to charge the land with the judgment debt. Neither a mortgage given expressly nor a mortgage created by virtue of the Judgments Acts over superfluous lands in any way interferes with the company's undertaking. If the company could charge or sell an old engine not required for the purposes of the railway, as I think it could, there seems no reason why the same principle should not apply to surplus lands. The mortgagee will, of course, take such interest only as the company has in the land, subject to all rights of pre-emption and other rights which might be available against the company.

It remains to consider whether there is anything in the special Act of 1892 to distinguish the position of the company here from that of an ordinary railway company. Section 18 is the only section which can seriously be relied on. There are three points of distinction—(1) No time is limited within which superfluous lands must be sold; (2) no right of pre-emption is given to adjoining owners; (3) the opinion of the company and not the verdict of the judge or the judgment of a court decides whether land is superfluous. I cannot see that these points of distinction are really material. The charge does not profess to extend beyond lands which in the opinion of the company are superfluous lands, and the proceeds of sale thereof, nor can I find anything in the directions for application of the purchase-money if the company sells, inconsistent with the proposed transaction. For these reasons I think Swinfen Eady, J.'s, judgment is correct, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Routh, Stacey, & Castle; Tarry, Sherlock, & King.

---

From P. D. & Ad. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew, L.J.) — Dec. 1.

"THE DUC D'AUMALE." (a.)

Admiralty—Practice—Writ—Service out of the jurisdiction — Collision outside territorial waters — Action against owners of English tug and foreign tow—Proper party—Action properly brought—Ord. 11, r. 1 (g).

A collision occurred outside British territorial waters between an English steamship and a French sailing ship which was in tow of an English tug. The owners of the French ship commenced an action against the owners of the English steamer in the French court. The owners of the English steamer then commenced an action in personam in the Admiralty Division against the owners of the French ship and the owners of the tug, and, having served the writ on the owners of the tug, obtained leave to issue a concurrent writ and serve notice thereof on the owners of the French ship out of the jurisdiction. The owners of the French ship, after obtaining judgment by default in the French action and compelling the owners of the English steamer to give security in the nature of bail in order to avoid the arrest of their vessel, took out a summons asking that the order giving leave to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction might be discharged.

Held, that the order ought not to be discharged, for the action was properly brought against the owners of the tug as well as against the owners of the tow, and the owners of the tow were proper parties to the action; and the order was not the less rightly made because the cause of action arose out of the jurisdiction.

Decision of Barnes, J., ante, p. 271, affirmed.

Appeal from the refusal of Barnes, J., to discharge an order giving leave to the plaintiffs to issue a concurrent writ and serve notice thereof out of the jurisdiction (reported ante, p. 271).

On the 22nd of June, 1902, a collision occurred in the English Channel, outside British territorial waters, between the steamship Camrose, belonging to the plaintiffs, the Marychurch Steamship Co., and the French sailing ship Duc d'Aumale, belonging to La Compagnie Maritime Française. At the time of the collision The Duc d'Aumale was in tow of the English tug Challenge, but there was no collision between The Camrose and The Challenge. After the collision The Duc d'Aumale was towed to Dunkirk for repairs and The Camrose proceeded to Antwerp.

On the 8th of July the owners of The Duc d'Aumale commenced an action against the owners of The Camrose in the French court at Nantes. The owners of The Camrose wished to have the question between the parties tried in the English courts, but the French company declined to consent to that jurisdiction.

On the 11th of July the owners of The Camrose commenced the present action by issuing a writ in personam against the owners of the tug Challenge and the owners of The Duc d'Aumale, claiming compensation against the defendants "as owners respectively of the steam-tug Challenge and the barque or vessel Duc d'Aumale for damage occasioned by a collision which took place in the month of June, 1902, between the plaintiffs' steamship Camrose and the barque Duc d'Aumale whilst in tow, or having been in tow, of the tug Challenge."

This writ was duly served on the owners of The Challenge, and on the 22nd of July the President of the Admiralty Division, Sir Francis Jeune, on the application of the plaintiffs, made an order giving leave to the plaintiffs to issue a concurrent writ and to serve notice thereof upon the defendants, La Compagnie Maritime Française, in France. The application was supported by an affidavit on behalf of the plaintiffs that the owners of The Duc d'Aumale were necessary or proper parties to the action brought against them and the owners of The Challenge, "inasmuch as the plaintiffs allege that the said collision was caused or contributed to by neglect or default in the navigation of The Duc d'Aumale and The Challenge." The order, however, did not limit a time for appearance.

On the 2nd of August the French company entered a conditional appearance under protest to the writ with notice of which they had been served.

On the 8th of August the President set aside his former order as being defective, and made a fresh order giving the plaintiffs leave to issue a concurrent writ and to serve notice of it on the French company in France, and fixing the time for appearance as within twelve days from the service of the notice of the writ.

On the 14th of August the French company were served with notice of the fresh writ.

On the 20th of August, the owners of The Camrose not having entered an appearance to the French action, judgment by default was obtained against them in the court at Nantes, and the French company, taking advantage of a convention between France and Belgium for the enforcement of French judgments in Belgium, threatened to arrest The Camrose in the port of Antwerp. In order to avoid her arrest the owners of The Camrose were compelled to give security in the nature of bail. On the 25th of August the French company entered a conditional appearance to the second writ under protest, and on the 23rd of October they took out a summons asking that the order giving leave to issue the writ and serve notice thereof out of the jurisdiction might be discharged and the service set aside.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By ord. 11, r. 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, "Service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons or notice of a writ of summons may be allowed by the court or a judge whenever . . . (g) any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction."

Barnes, J., refused to discharge the President's order, being of opinion that the action was properly brought against the owners of the tug as well as against the owners of the tow, and that the owners of the tow were proper parties to the action; but he gave leave to appeal.

The owners of The Duc d'Aumale appealed.

Scrutton, K.C., and Lewis Noad, for the appellants.—This case is not within the rule. The rule only applies where the plaintiff has a bonâ fide cause of action against the person served within the jurisdiction. If the owners of the tug and the owners of the tow had both been within the jurisdiction, the owners of the tug would not have been made defendants, and the plaintiffs ought not to be allowed to bring the foreign owners of the tow within the jurisdiction of the court by the mere device of adding the owners of the tug as defendants: Witted v. Galbraith, 41 W. R. 395, [1893] 1 Q. B. 577; see also Williams v. Cartwright, 43 W. R. 145, [1895] 1 Q. B. 142. Further, the collision in respect of which the action is brought occurred out of the jurisdiction, and in such a case an order cannot be made under the rule for service out of the jurisdiction on foreign defendants. It was held under the rules of 1875 that in such a case an order could not be made: Harris v. Owners of Franconia, L. R. 2 C. P. D. 173, 25 W. R. Dig. 209.

Pickford, K.C., and Balloch, for the respondents, the owners of The Camrose, were not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—In my opinion this case comes clearly within the rule. The words are "any person out of the jurisdiction" who "is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction." The criterion is not whether the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction, but whether the other person has been duly served within the jurisdiction. On the question whether the owners of the tug were properly made defendants I entirely agree with Barnes, J.

MATHEW, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, William A. Crump & Son.

Solicitors for the respondents, Thomas Cooper & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Farwell, J. } Jan. 15.

TODD v. NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Practice — Costs — Taxation — Chancery Division — Apportionment—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 65, r. 2.

Plaintiffs in an action claimed an injunction against defendants restraining them from interrupting an access to the plaintiffs' premises, and they also claimed damages for trespass. Defendants paid £60 into court in lieu of damages for the trespass. Plaintiffs failed on the first issue, and accepted the sum of £60 paid into court as satisfaction of the second issue. The court dismissed the first part of the action without costs, but the defendants were ordered to pay the costs of the second part of the action. The taxing-master allowed the plaintiffs all the general costs of the action, so far as related to the issue upon which the plaintiffs were successful. The defendants objected that the order of the court involved an apportionment of the general costs of the action, and that if it had been intended that the plaintiffs were to recover the whole of the general costs the order would have directed the defendants to pay the plaintiffs "their costs of this action except so far as such costs have been increased by the issue upon which the plaintiffs have been unsuccessful." The taxing-master, in reply, referred to the addition to ord. 65, r. 2, in R. S. C., 1902, and stated that this rule gave effect to the established practice of the King's Bench Division.

Held, that the effect of the addition to ord. 65, r. 2, was to give the judge power to make an apportionment of the costs in the action. The practice in the Chancery Division had not been altered, and remained as it was laid down in Jenkins v. Jackson, 39 W. R. 242, [1891] 1 Ch. 89.

This was a summons taken out by the defendants to vary the taxing-master's certificate in the above action.

The plaintiffs in the action claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from altering the level of a road so as to intercept an access to the plaintiff's premises, and also damages against defendants for entering upon the plaintiff's premises and pulling down part of a wall.

The plaintiffs failed to obtain the injunction, but the defendants, having paid £60 into court in lieu of damages claimed by plaintiff, this sum was accepted as satisfaction.

The court made the following order: "This court doth order that the £60 paid into court by the defendants in satisfaction of the cause of action stated in paragraph 8 of the statement of claim be paid out to the plaintiffs as directed in the schedule hereto, and it is ordered that the defendants, the North-Eastern Railway Co., do pay to the plaintiffs their costs of this action so far as relates to the said claim stated in paragraph 8 aforesaid, such costs to be taxed by the taxing-master. And it is ordered that the rest of the plaintiffs' action do stand dismissed out of this court without costs."

Paragraph 8 referred to the claim against the defendants for trespass.

The taxing-master allowed the plaintiffs all the general costs of the action so far as related to the issue upon which the plaintiffs were successful. To this the defendants objected that there were two issues in the action, in respect of one of which the defendants paid £60 into court with their defence, which sum was accepted, and in respect of the other of which issues the action was dismissed. The order directed the defendants to pay to the plaintiffs their costs of this action so far as relates to the said claim stated in paragraph 8 of the statement of claim. The defendants submitted that in accordance with the settled practice of the Chancery Division an order in the above form involved an apportionment of the general costs of the action. If it had been intended that the plaintiffs were to recover the whole of the general costs, the order would have directed the defendants to pay to the plaintiffs "their costs of this action except so far as such costs have been increased" by the issue upon which the plaintiffs were unsuccessful.

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In support of their contention the defendants referred to the following authorities, in which the distinction between the different forms of order was clearly stated: The Annual Practice for 1903, vol. 1, p. 925; Pridmore's Guide to Costs (10th ed.), p. 55; Seton's Judgments and Orders (6th ed.), vol. 1, pp. 248 and 264; and Jenkins v. Jackson, 39 W. R. 242, [1891] 1 Ch. 89. R. S. C., ord. 65, r. 2, as altered in 1902, had made no change in the practice as stated in Jenkins v. Jackson.

The taxing-master answered these objections: "I have come to the conclusion that the intention of the learned judge was that the plaintiffs should have their full costs of the proceedings they took to prosecute the claim stated in paragraph 8 of the statement of claim on which they were successful. The order gives the plaintiff their costs of this action so far as relates to this particular claim, and the remainder of their action is dismissed without costs. The defendants get no costs of the other issue (on which they succeeded), so that there is no set off, as was the case in Jenkins v. Jackson. I think, therefore, that under the actual wording of the order the plaintiffs are entitled to their costs as if their action had been limited to the claim on which they succeeded. If I am right, no question of the apportionment of the general costs of the action arises. All charges relating to the claim on which the plaintiffs failed have been excluded in the taxation. But on the subject of the effect of the addition to ord. 65, r. 2, made by the Rules of the Supreme Court, January, 1902, I may point out that the addition was expressly made for the purpose of giving effect to the established practice in the King's Bench Division as laid down in Sparrow v. Hill, 29 W. R. 490, 7 Q. B. D. 362, and Jones v. Curling, 32 W. R. 651, 13 Q. B. D. 262, and to alter the Chancery practice stated in Jenkins v. Jackson, the case referred to in the objections. It was strongly urged by Bowen, L.J., in that case that there should be one and the same practice in both Divisions, and the new rule was passed with the intention of giving a party who had succeeded on one out of two or more of his claims the general costs of the action, and to do away with the necessity for the taxing-master apportioning such general costs —in other words, to make the Chancery practice conform to that which has long been the practice in the King's Bench Division—I have disallowed the objection."

The addition to ord. 65, r. 2, referred to above is as follows: "And an order giving a party costs, except so far as they have been occasioned or incurred by or relate to some particular issue or part of his proceedings shall be read and construed as excluding only the amount by which the costs have been increased by such issue or proceedings, but the court or judge, if the whole costs of the action are not intended to be given to the party, may, wherever practicable, by the order direct taxation of the whole costs and payment of such proportion thereof as the court or judge shall determine."

Mark Romer, for the defendant, referred to the case of Jenkins v. Jackson.

Frank Dodd, for plaintiff.

FARWELL, J.—In my opinion the taxing-master is wrong in the construction he has put on the addition to ord. 65, r. 2. The practice in the Chancery Division is well known, and is stated in Jenkins v. Jackson, and that has remained the practice down to the present time, unless the addendum to ord. 65, r. 2, has altered it. I am unable to find anything in that rule which has altered the practice. It is said that the words "the court or judge . . . may . . . direct taxation of the whole costs and payment of such proportion thereof as the court or judge shall determine" have affected the practice of the court. In my opinion, the object of this addition is plain. It was doubted whether a judge had power to avoid the expense and trouble of an apportionment of each item of costs by the taxing-master. This addition was put in to remove that doubt. It is better that the judge should make an apportionment of the costs when the matter is fresh in his mind, and that liberty be allowed him to give fractional shares in the costs, as was done by Kekewich, J., in In re Pollard, (1902) W. N. 49, and by myself in Bourne v. Swan & Edgar, ante, p. 213, [1903] 1 Ch. 211. The taxing-master has put a wrong construction on the rule, and the matter must go back to him.

Solicitor for the defendants, A. Kaye Butterworth.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, Nash, Field, & Co., for W. M. Pybus & Son, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

---

Chan. Div. } Feb. 13.
Buckley, J. }

In re HARROGATE ESTATES (LIMITED). (a.)

Company— Debenture— Registration — Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), s. 14.

The registration under sub-section 4 of section 14 of the Companies Act, 1900, of the particulars therein mentioned protects the whole of the series of debentures in respect of which such registration is effected, at whatever time such debentures are issued, provided they be not issued more than twenty-one days before such registration.

The meaning of section 14 of the Companies Act, 1900, discussed.

On the 18th of November, 1901, resolutions were passed creating a series of 150 debentures of £100 each; each debenture itself contained a charge.

On the 13th of December a trust deed was executed for securing the issue, which also contained a charge.

On the 31st of December the trust deed and ninety-nine debentures actually issued up to that date were sent in for registration.

The particulars sent in were (as was held by Buckley, J.) sufficient to comply with section 14, sub-section 4, of the Companies Act, 1900, save that the date of the resolution was wrongly given as the 13th of December.

Further debentures subsequently issued were subsequently carried in for registration, and on the 1st of January, 1903, forty debentures were sent in for registration, of which ten had been issued to the subscribers within the preceding twenty-one days, but more than twenty-one days had elapsed since the issue of the remaining 30.

(a.) Reported by L. W. BYRNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The registrar refused to register the thirty debentures last mentioned.

This was a motion under section 15 of the Companies Act, 1900, asking for (i.) an extension of the time for registering these thirty debentures (if necessary), and (ii.) the rectification of the mistake above-mentioned as to the date of the resolution.

Maugham, for the applicants.

Fulton Carr, for the trustees of the debenture trust deed.

BUCKLEY, J., made an order rectifying the mistake as to the date of the resolution, and in dealing with the application for extending the time for registration, said: The frequency of applications for an extension of time for registering securities under section 15 of the Companies Act, 1900, makes it desirable, in my opinion, to express my view of the true construction of section 14 of that Act. The relevant events are commonly as follows—(1) The company passes a resolution and thereby resolves to issue debentures or to execute a trust deed securing debentures; there is no charge created, only an intention expressed to thereafter give a charge. (2) Either (a) debentures are issued—that is to say, money is paid to the company and an instrument under the company's seal is handed to the person making the payment; or (b) a trust deed is executed for securing a series of debentures, and a charge is thereby expressed to be given to the trustees to secure sums to be thereafter advanced upon debentures, and debentures are subsequently issued to persons who make a money payment and thereupon become entitled to a charge. (3) Some instrument or particulars are sent in for registration.

The question is whether when such instrument and particulars are so sent in the twenty-one days in section 14, sub-section 1, have run.

Sub-sections 1, 2, and 3 deal with a case in which a charge is created in favour of a person, either (i.) named in the debenture or (ii.) who can be named because he is the bearer of the debenture, who becomes entitled to the charge. The twenty-one days runs from the date at which a person so becomes entitled; sub-section 1 speaks of the creation of a charge and of a "security thereby conferred"; sub-section 3 speaks of "charges created" and registration of "the names of the . . . persons entitled to the charge"; sub-section 2 deals with property abroad in respect of which "further proceedings may be necessary to make . . . a charge valid and effectual according to the law of the country in which such property is situate," and makes registration of "a deed purporting to specifically charge such property" sufficient. The twenty-one days mentioned in sub-section 1 run, not from the resolution, but from the date at which the charge was created in favour of a person entitled to its benefit.

Sub-section 4 contains a proviso allowing a different course to be pursued; where a series of debentures is created (whether accompanied by a covering deed or not) the Act allows the registration, not of the charge, but of the resolution creating the series and (if there be one) of the covering deed, which does not necessarily "create" but may only "define" the security. At the date of registration that deed may secure, not advances actually made, but advances to be made if anyone takes up the debentures; registration duly made under sub-section 4 will protect debentures subsequently issued, notwithstanding that the charge contained in such debentures or given by the covering deed has not arisen at the date of registration, and will not arise until the issue of the debentures. No period of twenty-one days from the date of the resolution or covering deed is mentioned in sub-section 4; this is still governed by sub-section 1, and the registrar ought to register under sub-section 4 at any time, irrespective of the date of the resolution or of the covering deed. Such registration will protect all debentures subsequently issued and all debentures issued not more than twenty-one days before registration, but will not protect debentures issued at an earlier date. In sub-section 4 the words "debentures containing any charge" are equivalent to "debentures having the benefit of a charge." The case in which a charge is contained in the covering deed only, and not repeated or extended by the debentures, is within this sub-section.

Sub-section 5 relates to cases where registration has been made under sub-section 4, and provides that the registrar may be required to "register the date and amount of any particular issue," but this is not essential to the validity of the debentures.

Sub-section 6 relates to a certificate which the registrar, of course, cannot give until the registration has been effected. It nevertheless provides for a copy of the certificate being endorsed on every debenture the payment of which is secured by the charge. This is consistent with the interpretation above given of sub-section 4.

As regards the certificate itself, it assumes a different form according as the registration is made under sub-sections 1, 2, and 3 or sub-section 4; if under sub-sections 1, 2, and 3, it will be a certificate of the registration of the particular mortgage or charge registered; if under sub-section 4, the registrar ought to certify that the particulars required by that sub-section have been registered, inserting the relevant particulars for each case. If that registration is made under sub-section 4 it is unnecessary that each particular debenture should be registered within the twenty-one days mentioned in sub-section 1. In this case no further registration was required if the registration under sub-section 4 has been properly made, as will be the case if the mistake as to the date of the resolution is corrected.

I do not propose to make any order extending the time for registration as in my opinion no such order is required. I think the parties are at liberty to carry in before the registrar under sub-section 5 a memorandum in such form as he thinks right giving the particulars under sub-section 5 and identifying these debentures as part of those already protected by the original registration under sub-section 4.

Solicitors, Metcalfe, Birkett, & Rowlatt; Goldring & Philips.

---

Chan. Div. Joyce, J. } Jan. 28.

In re UNDERWOOD.
In re BOWLES.
U. v. W. (a.)

Practice—Writ ne exeat regno—Non-compliance by trustee with order to pay money into court—Evidence of actual receipt—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 4 (3).

The circumstances under which the court will allow a writ ne exeat regno to issue must be such as would justify the issue of a writ of attachment, and in addition the evidence as to the intention of the defendant to leave the country must be direct and unequivocal.

(a.) Reported by ALAN C. NESBITT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This action had been commenced for the administration of the estates of the two above-named deceased persons, and for the appointment of a new trustee of the will of M. A. Underwood, and for accounts and inquiries.

The usual decree having been pronounced, the master by his certificate found that there remained due from the defendant W., first, a sum of £133 odd in respect of rents and profits of the real estate of J. H. Bowles, deceased, and received by him as trustee thereof; secondly, a sum of £153 odd in respect of personal estate received by him as the executor of M. A. Underwood; thirdly, a sum of £122 odd in respect of the rents and profits of the real estate of M. A. Underwood and received by him as trustee of her will; and lastly, a sum of £288 odd received by him during the lifetime of M. A. Underwood, and had and received to her use. The evidence upon which the master so found consisted of the accounts submitted by W.

By the order, dated the 16th of December, 1902, made on further consideration of the action, the defendant W. was ordered on or before the 20th of December, 1902, or subsequently within four days after service of the order on him, to lodge in court to the credit of the action the four sums so certified to be due. A copy of the order was duly served upon him on the 20th of January, 1903, together with the paymaster's directions as to lodgment. This order remained uncomplied with, and it being understood that W. intended to sail for Canada on the 29th of January for a wedding tour of indefinite duration, notice of motion was served to restrain his departure.

The only evidence of intention was an affidavit of information and belief by a solicitor deposed to "from information given to me by several persons who are intimately acquainted with the defendant, and who have obtained their knowledge either directly or indirectly from the defendant himself, but who decline to depose to these facts or to allow me to use their names as informants."

J. G. Wood, for the motion.—The evidence of intention to leave the country is sufficient although indirect: Collinson v. ——, 18 Ves. 353. As regards evidence of "actual receipt" by the defendant, the case of In re Fewster, Herdman v. Fewster, [1901] 1 Ch. 447, 49 W. R. Dig. 180, is against me, but that was a case of attachment and not of ne exeat.

He also referred to Colverson v. Bloomfield, 33 W. R. 889, 29 Ch. D. 341.

JOYCE, J.—This is an application of a most unusual kind, and I should certainly never allow a writ ne exeat regno to issue unless I were positive I was right in doing so. In the present case I am not satisfied with the nature of the evidence furnished of the defendant's intention to leave England, and further than that, I am by no means certain that this money has ever been "in his possession or under his control" within the meaning of the exception in section 4 (3) of the Debtors Act, 1869. There is no strict evidence to show that the defendant ever actually received this money, and the same considerations apply as in the case of In re Fewster, which was a case I decided myself. I shall decline to go behind that decision, and and as upon this evidence under other circumstances a writ of attachment would not be granted, so no case is here shown for the issue of a writ ne exeat regno. The writ cannot go.

Writ refused.

Solicitors, Nussey & Fellowes.

Later in the same day the application was renewed before the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens Hardy, L.JJ.)

J. G. Wood, for the motion.

THE COURT refused the application upon grounds similar to those upon which Joyce, J., based the above decision.

---

K. B. Div. (Wright, J.) — Jan. 16.

BLORE v. GIULINI AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Power given to lessee to determine lease on notice — Lessor's remedies for antecedent breaches of covenant to repair not reserved—Liability of lessee.

By an indenture of lease for fourteen years it was provided that the lessees might, upon giving six months' previous notice in writing, determine the lease at the end of the first seven years, and that in such case the "indenture and every clause, matter, and thing" therein contained should upon the expiration of the notice "cease and determine and be void." The lease did not contain any proviso that the exercise by the lessees of their power to determine should be subject to the lessor's rights and remedies for existing breaches by the lessees of the covenants. The lessees duly determined the lease at the end of the seven years and left the premises out of repair.

Held, that the lessor was entitled to sue the lessees upon the covenant to repair contained in the lease, on their determining the lease under their above power, notwithstanding that no such right was expressly reserved.

Point of law raised on the pleadings.

In this case the action was brought by a lessor against lessees to recover damages for breach of covenant to repair.

From the pleadings it appeared that the plaintiff granted to the defendants a lease of a dwelling-house, 36, Brompton-square, for the term of fourteen years, from the 25th of March, 1895.

The lease contained the usual covenant by the lessees to repair and deliver up the premises in good repair, and it also contained a proviso giving to the lessees power to determine the lease at the end of the first seven years on giving six calendar months' previous notice in writing, and in such case it was provided that "this present indenture and every clause, matter, and thing therein contained, shall, upon the expiration of the said notice, cease and determine and be void, anything hereinbefore contained to the contrary notwithstanding."

There was no provision in the deed that the exercise by the lessees of the power to determine the lease should be subject to the lessor's rights and remedies for existing breaches by the lessees of the covenant to repair.

The defendants terminated the lease at the end of the first seven years by giving six months' notice, and they gave up the premises without having done any repairs.

On the plaintiff bringing his action for breach of the covenant to repair, the defendants by their defence pleaded that upon the determination of the lease they were exonerated and discharged from all liability under the covenants.

The question of law raised by the defence was ordered to be tried first.

W. Stewart, for the plaintiff.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Frankau, for the defendants.—Upon the expiration of the notice determining the lease the covenants became void, and therefore the covenant to repair could not be sued upon. It is usual in leases when power is given to the lessee to determine the lease at the end of seven or fourteen years to provide that such determination shall be subject to the rights and remedies of the lessor for or in respect of any rent in arrear or any breach of any of the lessee's covenants: see Prideaux's Precedents in Conveyancing (17th ed.), p. 66, and Key & Elphinstone's Precedents in Conveyancing (7th ed.), p. 714. No such proviso was inserted in the present lease. Upon the expiration of the notice it was provided that everything in the indenture should become void, and no provision was inserted preserving the rights of the lessor in respect of any antecedent breach of any covenant or condition contained in the deed. The omission to do so gives the defendant in this case a good defence to the action. Hartshorne v. Watson, 4 Bing. N. C. 178, is distinguishable from this case. There the covenants were not affected by the re-entry, and it was held that an action of covenant lay for rent accruing before a re-entry for a forfeiture notwithstanding that the lessor under such re-entry was to have the premises again "as if the indenture had never been made."

WRIGHT, J.—In my opinion the point raised by the defence cannot be supported. I do not suppose for a moment that the parties to this deed ever intended that the liability of the lessees to pay damages for breaches already committed by them of the covenant to repair should be put an end to merely by the exercise by the lessees of the power given them to determine the lease at the end of seven years. To hold so would be contrary to common sense. Hartshorne v. Watson sufficiently decides this point. In that case Tindal, C.J., said: "It would be a singular construction to hold that to an action for rent on an instrument under seal, the lessee or assignee may plead, not payment, but that the lessor entered for non-payment; in other words, may deprive the lessor of his rent because he declines to submit to any further loss. The argument would apply equally to covenant for repairs, or other services to be rendered by the lessee, and is so unreasonable that it cannot be upheld." There must be judgment for the plaintiff.

Judgment for plaintiff.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Child & Child.

Solicitor for the defendants, A. J. Adams.

---

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div.
Earl of Halsbury, L.C., Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Sir F. Jeune, P. — Feb. 19.

BOZSON v. THE URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL OF ALTRINCHAM. (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Order whether final or interlocutory—Order to try preliminary question of liability—Action dismissed—Appeal to Court of Appeal—Rules of the Supreme Court, ord. 58, rr. 3 and 15.

In an action for breach of contract the judge at chambers made the following order: "It is ordered that the action be transferred to the non-jury list. Questions of liability and breach of contract only to be tried. Rest of case (if any) to go to the official referee."

At the trial the judge made an order dismissing the action on the ground that there was no binding contract, and judgment was entered for the defendants. From this order the plaintiff appealed.

Held, that the appeal must be treated as an appeal from a final order, and not as from an interlocutory order.

Salaman v. Warner, 39 W. R. 547, [1891] 1 Q. B. 734, not followed.

Shubrook v. Tufnell, 30 W. R. 740, 9 Q. B. D. 621, preferred.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from an order made by Wills, J.

The action was brought by the plaintiff, a contractor, against the defendants for damages for breach of contract.

On the 29th of January, 1902, the following order was made by the judge in chambers: "It is ordered that the action be transferred to the non-jury list. Questions of liability and breach of contract only to be tried. Rest of case (if any) to go to the official referee."

On the 6th of March, 1902, the case came before Wills, J., at Manchester, when the learned judge made an order dismissing the action on the ground that there was no binding contract, and upon that order judgment was subsequently entered for the defendants.

From this order the plaintiff, on the 3rd of May, 1902, gave notice of appeal.

[On the case being called on counsel for the defendants raised a preliminary objection.]

Pickford, K.C. (Langdon with him), for the defendants.—This appeal is from an interlocutory order, and is therefore out of time, as notice should have been given within fourteen days from the date of the order. This case is covered by Salaman v. Warner, 39 W. R. 547, [1891] 1 Q. B. 734. In that case a point of law had been raised on the pleadings and the judge at chambers ordered that the point should be set down for argument and disposed of before the trial, and the Divisional Court, after argument, ordered that the action should be dismissed. Thereupon the plaintiff gave a four days' notice of appeal as from an interlocutory order, and the Court of Appeal, on a preliminary objection being raised that the notice of appeal should have been a fourteen days' notice, the order being a final order, held that the order was not a final order within ord. 58, r. 3. Lord Esher, M.R., in the course of his judgment, in speaking of the order, said the question whether the order, for the purpose of giving notice of appeal under the rules, was final or not must depend on what would be the result of the decision of the Divisional Court in that case, assuming it to be given in favour of either of the parties. "If their decision, whichever way it is given, will, if it stands, finally dispose of the matter in dispute, I think that for the purposes of these rules it is final. On the other hand, if their decision, if given in one way, will finally dispose of the matter in dispute, but if given in the other, will allow the action to go on, then I think it is not final, but interlocutory." That exactly meets the present case. If the decision in the present case had been in favour of the plaintiff it would not have finally disposed of the matter in dispute, because the case would then have had to go to the official referee. The order made by the learned judge is therefore an interlocutory one. The principle laid down in Salaman v. Warner is affirmed in the case of In re Herbert Reeves, 50 W. R. 252, [1902] 1 Ch. 29. There is, however, the earlier case of Shubrook v. Tufnell, 30 W. R. 740,

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

9 Q. B. D. 621, to which the attention of the court ought to be drawn, for undoubtedly it is difficult to reconcile it with Salaman v. Warner, in which case it does not appear to have been referred to. In Shubrook v. Tufnell an arbitrator, under an order of reference, stated a case for the opinion of the court, which provided that, if the opinion of the court should be one way, the case was to be referred back to the arbitrator; if the other way, judgment was to be entered for the defendant. The Divisional Court decided in favour of the plaintiffs and referred the case back to the arbitrator. On appeal the Court of Appeal (Jessel, M.R., and Lindley, L.J.) held that the order was a final one. Salaman v. Warner, however, has always been followed.

Montague Lush, K.C. (M. Macnaghten with him), for the plaintiff, was not called on.

The Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I prefer to follow the earlier case of Shubrook v. Tufnell. I think that this is an appeal from a final order, and that the notice of appeal was therefore given in time.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J. — I agree. In my opinion the real test whether an order should be considered final or interlocutory is this—if the order, as made, finally determines the rights of the parties, it ought to be treated as final for all purposes; if, on the other hand, further proceedings are necessitated, the order ought to be treated as interlocutory.

Sir FRANCIS JEUNE, P.—I am of the same opinion.

The appeal was then heard on the merits and dismissed.

Objection overruled; appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, G. J. Fowler, for Grundy, Lamb, & Grundy, Manchester.

Solicitors for the defendants, Robbins, Billing, & Co., for Nicholls, Harris, & Lindsell, Manchester.

---

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) } Nov. 6, 7, 10, 24; Feb. 3.

BENNETT v. STONE. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Conditions of sale—Wilful default — Form of conveyance — Honest mistake—Interest—Vendor in possession—Account of rents and profits not on the footing of wilful default—Occupation rent—Losses incurred by vendor in carrying on business.

A contract provided that interest should be paid on the purchase-money if the completion were delayed from any cause other than the wilful default of the vendors. The vendors insisting on the insertion of a particular clause in the conveyance, the purchaser brought an action and obtained judgment for specific performance.

Held, by Stirling and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ. (Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissentiente) that the purchaser was liable to pay interest on the purchase-money.

By Stirling, L.J.—The persistence of the vendors in having the clause inserted, though arising out of an honest mistake on their part, amounted to wilful default within the contract, but the real cause of the delay in completion having been the inability of the purchaser to find the purchase-money, he was not thereby relieved from his liability for interest.

By Cozens-Hardy, L.J.—The vendors had not been guilty of wilful default within the meaning of the contract.

By Vaughan Williams, L.J.—The vendors had been guilty of wilful default within the meaning of the contract, and had thereby become disentitled to any interest.

Decision of Buckley, J. (50 W. R. 118, [1902] 1 Ch. 226), affirmed.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J. (reported 50 W. R. 118, [1902] 1 Ch. 226).

By an agreement dated the 26th of September, 1898, the defendants agreed to sell to the plaintiff the Stoneleigh estate, near Epsom, for £75,000, of which £1,000 was to be paid immediately as a deposit, and the balance on the 2nd of January, 1899.

Article 2 of the agreement provided that on the purchaser paying his purchase-money on the date aforesaid, he should, as from the 25th of December, 1898, be let in possession or into receipt of the rents and profits, and up to that day all rents, rates, taxes, and outgoings should (if necessary) be apportioned, and if from any cause whatever other than the wilful default of the vendors the completion of the purchase was delayed beyond the 2nd of January, 1899, and the agreement should not be cancelled and the deposit forfeited by the vendors under the last clause thereof, the purchase-money should bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum to the day of actual payment thereof.

The deposit was paid, but the purchase was not completed on the 2nd of January, 1899, and in fact the purchase was not yet completed, nor the balance of the purchase-money paid.

The draft conveyance furnished by the purchaser to the vendors contained the following words to enure to him the benefit of certain covenants which had been entered into by William Cunliffe with the defendants: "Together with the full benefit of the covenants on the part of the said William Cunliffe with the said Edward Mulready Stone and Frederick William Stone contained in the said indenture of the 29th day of August, 1898." The defendants substituted for these words the following: "But with the benefit of the covenants on the part of the said William Cunliffe with the said Edward Mulready Stone and Frederick William Stone contained in the said indenture of the 29th day of August, 1898 (so far as the said Edward Mulready Stone and Frederick William Stone are now in law or in equity entitled to assign the benefit of such covenants) without thereby warranting that such covenants are now enforceable by the assigns of the said Edward Mulready Stone and Frederick William Stone."

The plaintiff objected to the clause as altered, and on the 22nd of June, 1899, commenced an action for specific performance.

On the 2nd of February, 1900, Buckley, J., holding that the defendants were wrong in insisting on this addition, pronounced judgment for specific performance, and ordered that interest, if any, be computed at the rate of 5 per cent. on the £74,000, or at such lower rate as the same might be reducible to under the contract, from the 2nd of January, 1899; the judgment also ordered an account of the rents and profits of the said hereditaments received by the defendants or by any other person or persons by the order or for the use of the defendants since the 2nd of January, 1899.

By his certificate, dated the 13th of June, 1901, the master found that the amount of the interest due from the plaintiff to the defendants was £8,661 12s. 6d., and that the defendants had received on account of the rents and profits of the hereditaments £776 18s., and that they had paid, or were entitled to be allowed on account thereof, £1,797 6s. 10d. It appeared that the tenant of about two-thirds of the land had given up possession on the 29th of September, 1899, and that the defendants, instead of letting his farm, had entered into possession themselves, and, for the purpose of working it had purchased quantities of farming stock and utensils; the sums paid for these, as well as £469 11s. 9d. paid to the outgoing tenant in respect of his tenant rights, were included in the £1,797 6s. 10d.

The plaintiff took out a summons to vary the certificate (1) by disallowing the amount allowed for interest; (2) by disallowing such of the expenses comprised in the £1,797 6s. 10d. (including the £469 11s. 9d.) as were incurred by the defendants in consequence of their farming the land themselves; (3) by charging the defendants with an occupation rent in respect of the land they did not let.

Buckley, J., was of opinion that there had been no such wilful default on the part of the vendors as to disentitle them to interest; and he further held that the real cause of delay was the inability of the purchaser to procure the purchase-money. On both these grounds he held that the first point raised by the summons failed. On the other two points he refused to disallow to the defendants the £469 11s. 9d. and to charge them with any occupation rent, but he thought that they could not be allowed the losses incurred in carrying on the farming business.

The plaintiff appealed.

H. Terrell, K.C., and Sheldon, for the appellant.

Astbury, K.C., and Dunham, for the respondents.

H. Terrell, K.C., replied.

The arguments used were similar to those reported in the court below.

Cur. adv. vult.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case the vendors refused to execute a conveyance except in a form which they were not entitled to insist upon. The purchaser thereupon brought an action for specific performance and got judgment in that action with costs.

The first question which arises in this case is whether such conduct amounts to wilful default by the vendors so as to exempt the purchaser from payment of interest.

This is a question of contract. It is in no sense a question of judicial discretion. If the conduct of the vendor amounts to "wilful default" the contract exempts the purchaser from the interest during the period of delay caused thereby, and the court has, in my judgment, no jurisdiction to deprive the purchaser of that exemption.

In this case the vendor insisted, under threat of cancelling the contract and forfeiting the deposit, upon the purchaser with twelve days of the 12th of June, 1899, approving a form of conveyance which it was ultimately held he had no right to insist upon.

The purchaser on the 22nd of June issued his writ in an action for specific performance. He succeeded in the action, and got judgment on the 2nd of February, 1900. Buckley, J., is of opinion that this conduct by the vendor does not amount to "wilful default." I cannot agree. I think that the conduct of the vendor did amount to wilful default—did amount, that is, to a conscious abstention by the vendor from doing that which reasonably he ought to have done. I think that the judgments of Romer, J., and the Court of Appeal in In re Woods and Lewis's Contract, 46 W. R. 643, [1898] 2 Ch. 211, go a long way to consolidate the results of the authorities into one consistent whole. The judgment of Bowen, L.J., in In re Young and Harston's Contract, 34 W. R. 84, 31 Ch. D. 168, is the basis of the judgment both of Romer, J., and of the Court of Appeal. The outcome of this case, to my mind, is this—that it leaves untouched the proposition of Bowen, L.J., that "wilful" implies nothing blamable, but merely that the person of whose action and default the expression is used is a free agent, and that what has been done arises from the spontaneous action of his will, and also leaves untouched the words of Lindley, M.R., in In re Hetling and Merton's Contract, 42 W. R. 19, [1893] 3 Ch. 269: "Whatever may be the popular meaning of wilful default, whatever the expression may mean in dealing with other matters, it is now settled that moral delinquency, intentional delay, wilful obstruction on the part of a vendor may all be absent and yet there may be wilful default on his part disentitling him to interest under such a contract as that before us." But while the judgments In re Woods and Lewis's Contract affirm the statement of law just cited from the judgments of Bowen, L.J., and Lindley, M.R., these judgments also expressly affirm the dictum of Bowen, L.J., defining "default" thus: "Default is a purely relative term, just like negligence. It means nothing more and nothing less than not doing what is reasonable under the circumstances—not doing something which you ought to do—having regard to the relations which you occupy towards the other persons interested in the transaction." Honesty of intention, therefore, will clearly not prevent the act of the vendor from being "wilful," but mere failure to perform will not constitute "default"; there must be, to constitute default, neglect of a duty, neglect to do something which the vendor ought to have done having regard to his duty to the purchaser. This view brings the observation of Turner L.J., in Williams v. Glenton, 14 W. R. 294, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 200, into line, and shows that the proposition established by that case—that mere difficulties of title, although involving a certain degree of default on the part of the vendor, are not sufficient to exempt the purchaser from the payment of interest under the ordinary interest clause—is not an exception grafted by judicial decision on the words of the contract, but is merely an instance in which the courts have uniformly found that the vendor has not failed in doing what is reasonable under the circumstances. It is pointed out by Knight-Bruce, L.J., in Sherwin v. Shakspear, 2 W. R. 668, 5 De G. M. & G. 517, that, considering the nature of the titles to land according to our institutions and the present course of practice, it could not in general reasonably be expected that at the time appointed for the delivery of the abstract an abstract should be delivered at once clear of all difficulty, of all doubt, or even of all objection. Knight-Bruce, L.J., goes on to point out that the ordinary clauses in a contract for the sale of land show that the parties thereto must have contemplated the possibility of a title imperfect at first or an abstract originally incomplete. This confirms, to my mind, the view that the failure to make title is only an instance in which generally the failure will not involve neglect to do that which the vendor ought reasonably to have done. The conclusions which I have here stated are to a large extent inferences from the terse judgment of Collins, M.R., in In re Woods and Lewis's Contract. I should add I do not think Lord Lindley qualifies Bowen, L.J.'s, observations by anything he says in The Mayor of London and Tubbs' Contract, [1894] 2 Ch. 524. Applying these conclusions to the present case, in my judgment it was wilful on the part of the vendor to strike out the clause relating to Cunliffe's covenant, but in so doing he did not do anything involving a failure in his reasonable duty as vendor—so far there is no wilful default. But, in my judgment, to add to this erasure the threat, if it was not accepted to cancel the contract and forfeit the deposit, was a neglect by the vendor to conduct the sale to its completion in the manner in which he ought to have done. This justified, as the result shows, the purchaser in bringing his action for specific performance, and in my judgment the vendor cannot claim interest during the time occupied in bringing the action to a conclusion—that is, from the 22nd of June, 1899, to the 2nd of February, 1900.

To allow him to do so would be to allow the vendor to take advantage of his own wrong. If this were not so, no prudent purchaser would fight the vendor, however unreasonable his claim. The vendor would have a good investment, whatever the result of the action or inquiry. I think it would be lamentable that the liability for interest and the right to it should depend upon the form of the order which the plaintiff accepted. A great portion of the time occupied by the inquiry was occupied by a claim which the learned judge himself has since decided that the vendor could not support.

Here again to give the vendor interest would be to enable him to take advantage of his own wrong.

The conditions in this case are concurrent. The vendor must be willing to convey, and the purchaser to pay the price. But in such a case the vendor who seeks to recover interest must show that he is ready and willing to perform the concurrent conditions so far as it lies on him.

It is said by Buckley, J., that the action ought never to have been brought. The fact that the plaintiff obtained judgment with costs seems the answer to this. Assuming that it was a matter of very little importance to either side whether the conveyance contained this clause, this shows how unjustifiable it was for the vendor to insist upon it with a threat of cancellation and forfeiture.

As to the time occupied by the inquiries ordered, I think that the learned judge ought to have decided the question as to interest by his order. Be this how it may, in my judgment the vendor cannot have interest for the time occupied by him in making claims he could not support.

I have only to add that I cannot agree that it has been shown in this case that the inability of the purchaser to find the purchase-money was, as Buckley, J., puts it in his judgment on the motion to vary the certificate, the causa causans of delay. On the contrary, it seems to me that the proper answer to this is given in Buckley, J.'s, own judgment in the action for specific performance. In that action the vendor pleaded that the plaintiff purchaser was not ready and willing because he was unable to pay the balance of the purchase-money. Buckley, J., gives judgment in favour of the purchaser for specific performance, and when Mr. Astbury at the conclusion of the judgment says, "They have had eighteen months and have not been able to find the purchase-money," the learned judge answers, "Because the conveyance was not in a fit form."

If I had to draw an inference of fact myself in this case, I should infer that the purchaser had an extremely good bargain, leaving an ample margin for raising the money. What occurred in the negotiations at the end of the case before us confirms this view.

STIRLING, L.J.—In this case Buckley, J., has held that the plaintiff, the purchaser, is liable to pay interest on the unpaid balance of his purchase-money for two reasons—first, because the defendants, the vendors, have not been guilty of "wilful default" within the meaning of the contract; secondly, because the real cause of the delay in the completion of the purchase is the default of the purchaser. On the appeal both grounds of decision have been controverted and have been fully argued; and it is necessary to consider both. First, has the vendor been guilty of wilful default?

According to the rule laid down in the Court of Appeal in In re Young and Harston's Contract, a vendor commits a default if he fails to do something which he ought reasonably to do, regard being had to the terms of the contract which he has entered into with the purchaser; and he is guilty of wilful default if he so fails when he is a free agent and knows what he is doing and intends to do what he does. It follows that the vendor may be guilty of wilful default, although he may not have any intention of breaking his contract, and this appears to be clearly recognized in the judgment of the Court of Appeal delivered by Lindley, L.J., in In re Hetling and Merton's Contract. It was subsequently held by the majority of the Court of Appeal in In re Mayor of London and Tubbs' Contract that the rule laid down in In re Young and Harston's Contract does not apply in cases of "honest mistake or oversight"; and Buckley, J., has held that the present case falls within that category. To ascertain whether this be so the decisions in In re Hetling and Merton's Contract, and In re Mayor of London and Tubbs' Contract must be carefully examined.

In In re Hetling and Merton's Contract two trustees of a voluntary settlement entered into a contract for sale of a piece of land which was subject to a mortgage in favour of Petch and Hetling, the latter being a vendor. The purchaser required that Petch should concur. Petch, who was a solicitor, had gone abroad, having given to his partner a power of attorney, authorizing him to execute deeds and transfer any property held by him as trustee or mortgagee. The vendors knew and relied on his power of attorney but the purchaser declined to complete without a conveyance from Petch himself, and this the vendors after some delay procured. It appears that the purchaser had his money ready on the day fixed for completion, and kept it ready without receiving any interest on it. The court held that the purchaser's objection was well founded; and further, that the delay in completion was attributable to the wilful default of the vendors, and that they were not entitled to any interest on the purchase-money. So far as appears, the vendors there fell into an honest mistake as to the efficacy of the power of attorney on which they relied.

In In re Mayor of London and Tubbs' Contract the contract for sale contained a statement as to the title of the vendors, which upon investigation by the purchaser proved to be inaccurate as to a portion of the property. The vendors, upon a requisition being made by the purchaser, admitted the inaccuracy, and and on the day after that fixed for completion delivered a further abstract of title of this part of the property. It appeared that the vendors had a good title and the purchaser ultimately accepted it after a delay of about three months. The question then arose as to whether the vendors were entitled to interest during this period; and it was held by the majority of the court (Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.) that they had not been guilty of wilful default, and were consequently entitled to interest.

Lindley, L.J., put the matter thus: "Unfortunately the title was not examined or not examined with proper care before the conditions of sale were framed. This was unquestionably a default, but in my opinion it was not 'wilful.' I do not propose to examine this word with scientific accuracy; it is sufficient to observe that to make up one's mind not to verify a statement is 'wilful,' but that simply not to think about verifying it is not." It appears, in my opinion, from the rest of the judgment that the general rule laid down in In re Young and Harston's Contract was not intended to be departed from. Further, I do not think that it was intended to lay down that every case of honest mistake lies without that rule; so to hold would seem to me to be inconsistent with the decision in In re Helling and Merton's Contract.

I attach great weight to the observations made by Lindley, L.J., in In re Mayor of London and Tubbs' Contract on the meaning of the word "wilful"; they appear to me to indicate with sufficient clearness for ordinary purposes how the line is to be drawn in this class of cases. It is important also to observe that there the vendors in answer to the purchaser's requisitions admitted their mistake and proceeded to rectify it. The decision, therefore. only covers the case of a mistake honestly made at first and not persisted in when called to the vendor's attention; it is a different matter where a vendor has in the first instance been led through honest mistake or inadvertence into some act or omission which amounts to a default, but persists in it when it is called to his attention. In that state of things it seems to me that a default originally attributable to mistake or inadvertence may become wilful.

It was argued before us, as it was in the court below, that the decision in In re Mayor of London and Tubbs' Contract only applies where a vendor makes a mistake as to title. I agree with Buckley, J., in thinking that this distinction is not well founded. It seems to me that the rule must be the same whether the mistake of the vendor relates to title or evidence of title or conveyance. I wish, however, to point out that not every failure on the part of a vendor to fulfil his contract is a "default"; in each case the circumstances must be looked at; and if it turns out that the vendor using reasonable care has failed to observe some matter which gives rise to a proper requisition on the part of the purchaser, but proceeds with reasonable diligence to comply with the requisition, he will not be guilty of a default: In re Woods and Lewis's Contract.

In my opinion the circumstances may be such that the vendor will not commit a default unless and until the court has determined that his contract puts him under an obligation to comply with the purchaser's requisition.

In the present case the default complained of is the refusal of the vendor to execute a conveyance to the purchaser in the form required by the purchaser.

From the judgment delivered by Buckley, J, at the trial of the action, it appears that the purchaser claimed to be entitled under the purchase contract to the benefit of covenants entered into by one Cunliffe with the vendors by an indenture dated the 29th of August, 1898; and in the draft conveyance as ultimately tendered by him there were inserted for the purpose of passing this benefit these words: "Together with the full benefit of the covenants on the part of the said W. Cunliffe with the said E. M. Stone and F. W. Stone contained in the said indenture of the 29th day of August, 1898."

The vendors agreed that the purchaser was to have the benefit of the covenants, and left the words just quoted standing in the draft as finally approved on their behalf, but added these words—"so far as the said E. M. Stone and F. W. Stone are now at law or in equity entitled to the benefit of such covenants without thereby warranting that such covenants are now enforceable by the assigns of the said E. M. Stone and F. W. Stone." The purchaser objected to these words, and the vendors, on the 21st of June, 1899, refused to execute a conveyance without them, and persisted in such refusal. Whether they were right in so doing was the only question between them and the purchaser when the action was brought and was tried.

The learned judge decided that the vendors were bound to execute a conveyance without the addition on which they insisted. This decision has not been appealed from, and in my judgment it was perfectly right. Then arises the question, did the vendors act reasonably in refusing to comply with the purchaser's requirements as to the form of conveyance? In my opinion they did not act reasonably. The learned judge said that the parties were fighting about nothing, meaning, as I understand, merely about a matter of form. The conveyance is prepared by the purchaser, and it was a matter of great importance to him that it should be clearly expressed upon the point as to which the question arose; while in this respect the form was a matter of no importance to the vendors. The vendors therefore, in my opinion, committed a default, they did so deliberately, and consequently were guilty of wilful default during part at least of the time subsequent to the 21st of June, 1899. Secondly, was the delay in the completion of the purchase attributable to the default of the purchaser? It is admitted that the purchaser was unable to complete the purchase out of his own moneys; there is no evidence that he ever found anyone to advance the unpaid balance. Buckley, J., was of opinion that the real cause of the delay was that the purchaser was not provided with the money to complete his purchase, and I am unable to differ from this conclusion.

Now the contract provides that the purchaser shall pay interest "if from any cause whatever other than wilful default on the part of the vendors the completion of the purchase is delayed." Here the real cause of delay was not the wilful default of the vendor; and it appears to me that the purchaser, insisting as he does on specific performance of the contract, cannot be relieved from payment of interest. To hold otherwise would in my opinion be inconsistent with the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Mayor of London and Tubbs' Contract, where the same point arose, and all the learned judges agreed that even if the vendors were guilty of wilful default, the purchaser was liable for interest.

I think, therefore, that on this last ground the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J. — This appeal raises an important question as to the effect of the common form clause providing for payment by the purchaser of interest on purchase-money from the day named for completion except in the case of wilful default on the part of the vendor. The facts are happily such as have not often to be considered by the court. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:] As to the occupation rent, for the reasons assigned by Buckley, J. I think the plaintiff's contention is hopeless.

But as to the claim for interest there is more difficulty. It was not seriously argued before us that the plaintiff is not liable to pay interest for some period. And in my point of view I think the plaintiff must pay interest from the 2nd of January, 1899, to the 22nd of June, 1899, when he first approved a conveyance in what the court held to be a proper form.

The subsequent period may conveniently be divided into two parts: (a) From the writ to the judgment; (b) from the judgment to the present time. The position of vendor and purchaser under a contract which is silent as to possession and as to interest does not now admit of doubt. From the time when the purchaser could prudently take possession—that is to say, from the time when a good title is first shown—the parties, in the view of a court of equity, change characters. The purchaser becomes the owner of the land and entitled to the rents and profits and bound to discharge outgoings, and the vendor becomes entitled to the purchase-money with interest until actual payment; and in respect of this right the vendor has a lien upon the land for his unpaid purchase-money which the courts will enforce. Whether the interest is greater or less than the rents and profits is wholly immaterial.

There may, however, be conduct on the part of the vendor or the purchaser which suffices to relieve the purchaser, wholly or in part, from the liability to pay interest. A familiar example is where the purchaser, complaining of delay, informs the vendor that the purchase-money is lying idle on deposit at a bank, and that he will object to pay anything beyond the bank interest. As it is often difficult to ascertain precisely when this change would take place, it has long been usual to insert express stipulations fixing a date for completion without reference to the question whether a good title has been shown, from which date, on the one hand, the purchaser is to be entitled to the rents and profits, and, on the other hand, the vendor is to be entitled to interest. Such a stipulation recognizes that in dealings with land in England it is the rule, and not the exception, that actual completion does not take place on the day named. There are two forms, the first of which says that "if from any cause whatever" the purchase is not completed on the day named the purchaser shall pay interest at the agreed rate, and the second of which adds the words "other than the wilful default of the vendor." The courts have so construed the first of these forms as to prevent a vendor from taking advantage of his own wrong: see Williams v. Glenton; In re Woods and Lewis's Contract, 46 W. R. 643, [1898] 2 Ch. 211, per Lindley, M.R., at p. 213.

The second of these forms may be somewhat more extended in its operation in favour of the purchaser, but I do not think the difference is great. If both vendor and purchaser are to blame, the exception of wilful default of the vendor has no operation, and, indeed, the court will always struggle to prevent the purchaser from receiving the rents and profits without any correlative liability to pay interest on his purchase-money: see Birch v. Joy, 3 H. L. Cas. 565. It is, moreover, well settled that the second form does not apply even though the purchaser is in no way to blame if the delay is due to any inability on the part of the vendor to make out a title in due time, or to what has been called by Lord Lindley "an honest mistake" on his part. There are at least three classes of objection or difficulty which may arise in completing a purchase. There are, first, objections to the vendor's title; second, objections as to the evidence or proof of title; and third, objections as to the form of conveyance. The distinction between a question of title and a question of conveyance is very refined. The court, either on a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, or in an action for specific performance, deals with objections of each of these three classes, and as a rule visits the unsuccessful litigant with the costs of the litigation. I am not, however, aware that any such distinction has ever been drawn as that a vendor wrongfully refusing to comply with an objection to title should be decreed not guilty of a wilful default but would be held guilty of a wilful default if the objection were one as to conveyance and not as to title. In either case the vendor may act with perfect honesty and under skilled advice, and I can see no reason why, having regard to the difficulties incident to the law of real property and the practice of conveyancing, any such distinction should be drawn. Reference has been made to cases in which the title has been accepted, the forms of conveyance settled, and the conveyance engrossed, but the vendor has not been ready to execute the conveyance, and in such a case the courts have held that it was wilful default on his part. In those cases all difficulties alike of title and of conveyance had been got rid of, and it was naturally held that the vendor claiming interest would be taking advantage of his own wrong, or be guilty of wilful default.

Applying these observations to the facts of the present case I cannot regard the view taken by the vendors acting under the advice of counsel as to the proper form of the conveyance to be other than an honest though mistaken view. They were made to pay the costs of the action as they would have been made to pay the costs of a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act addressed solely to the point whether the conveyance was in proper form. But I cannot hold that there was within the meaning of the rule any such wilful default as to exempt the purchaser from his liability to pay interest. This covers the period up to judgment.

With respect to the period since the judgment I think there is much less difficulty. It is impossible to say that the delay was due solely to the vendors. The plaintiff denied his liability to pay any interest and took the judgment in a form which enabled him to raise this point. He also contended that the defendants ought to be charged with an occupation rent. These two contentions he raised in the proceedings before the master, and upon his summons to vary the master's certificate, and he has again raised them in the notice of appeal to this court. Under these circumstances I think the plaintiff is liable to pay interest not merely for the period before action, but also for the whole period from the writ until the actual completion shall take place. I am aware that the rents and profits are small and the interest is large, but in my view the rights of the parties cannot depend upon this. Buckley, J., based his judgment partly on the ground that the delay was not attributable to the alleged wilful default on the part of the vendors, but to the plaintiff's inability to procure the purchase-money. I do not dissent from this view, but I prefer to base my judgment on the ground that there was no wilful default on the part of the vendor. The result is, that in my opinion Buckley, J.'s, order against the plaintiff on the summons to vary was correct, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Solicitors, Swepstone & Stone; Henry White.

---

From Registrar in Bankruptcy. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Jan. 30.

In re CHARLES BRIGHT.
Ex parte CHARLES BRIGHT. (a.)

Bankruptcy — Jurisdiction — Foreigner "ordinarily resident"—Hotel—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 6, sub-section 1 (d).

A foreigner who, for purposes of litigation, has stayed in England at hotels during nine months of the year immediately preceding the date of the presentation of a bankruptcy petition, has "ordinarily resided" within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 6, sub-section 1 (d).

This was an appeal from a receiving order made by Mr. Registrar Giffard.

(a.) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question for decision was whether the debtor had ordinarily resided in England within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 6, sub-section 1 (d), which enacts as follows: "A creditor shall not be entitled to present a bankruptcy petition against a debtor unless the debtor is domiciled in England, or, within a year before the date of the presentation of the petition, has ordinarily resided or had a dwelling-house or place of business in England."

The facts were as follows:

Mr. Bright, an American subject with an American domicil, came over to England in January, 1900, for the purpose of litigation. He stayed in England until the 7th of August, 1900, on which date he returned to America. He came back to England on the 11th of November, again for litigation purposes, and remained until May, 1901. Whilst in Europe he stopped at various London hotels and also paid several short visits to the continent, chiefly to Paris, where he had a flat. For three months—viz., May to July, 1900, he had, without paying anything, occupied the room of a friend at the Hotel Cecil.

In May, 1901, a bankruptcy petition was presented against him, and a receiving order was made on the 30th of July, 1901.

This was affirmed by the Court of Appeal in November, 1901, but in November, 1902, the court ordered the petition to be re-heard on the ground that there had been a misunderstanding as to the facts.

The registrar re-affirmed his decision and came to the conclusion on the evidence that the debtor had resided in England for 242 days during the year in question—viz., May, 1900, to May, 1901.

The debtor appealed.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and Newton Crane, for the debtor.—Mr. Bright never stayed anywhere except at hotels, and hotels are something quite different from lodgings. The mere staying at an hotel is not sufficient: In re Hecquard, 38 W. R. 148, 24 Q. B. D. 71; In re Norris, 5 Morr. 111. The leaning of the courts is against treating a foreigner as having ordinarily resided: In re Cunningham, 33 W. R. 22, 13 Q. B. D. 418. A residence for litigation purposes is not ordinary residence. Mr. Bright was on many occasions on the continent, and he only came over here when he was obliged. The character of the residence must be looked at as well as the quantity of the residence.

C. A. Russell, K.C., Muir Mackenzie, and Disturnal, for the petitioning creditors, were not called upon.

Van Neck, for other persons interested.

COLLINS, M.R.—In this case there is no controversy about the domicil of the debtor. The question is whether he has ordinarily resided or had a place of business in England within a year of the presentation of the petition. It was decided by this court in November, 1901, on the statement of the facts then before them, that the debtor had so resided. The matter, however, was subsequently sent back to the registrar on the ground that there had been some material misunderstanding, the court, in allowing the rehearing, acting ex maiori cautela. The learned registrar has again held that the debtor had "ordinarily resided" and had "a place of business" in accordance with the section. In dealing with the decision of the registrar, unless we can see that he has applied some wrong principle of law, we ought not to interfere with his decision on a question of fact. The facts show that for only three months during the year in question was the debtor continuously absent from London. During the rest of the time he was in London for a definite purpose, and, though he made occasional visits to the continent, yet London was his central place of dwelling. It has been argued that in point of law the debtor cannot have "resided," because his place of dwelling was not a lodging-house but simply one or more hotels, and that, unless it is shown that he paid for his rooms, whether he occupied them or not, he cannot be said to have resided in them. It is important to bear in mind that the "residence" of the section is not residence at large, but residence within a particular year. A long sojourn is not a sine qua non. The residence may be a temporary residence for a particular purpose. There must, of course, be some duration—for instance, two or three days would not be sufficient. The purpose for which the debtor was here is one of the elements to be taken into consideration. If he was here for a particular purpose which could not be conveniently disposed of without his presence, and was here for a substantial time, then it becomes a question of fact whether he was ordinarily resident or not. In my opinion there is abundant evidence to support the learned registrar's conclusion.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of opinion that the learned registrar has come to a correct decision on a point of fact.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor, J. D. B. Lewis; Church, Rendell, & Co.; Blair & W. B. Girling.

---

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Jan. 28.

ZIMBLER v. ABRAHAMS. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Contract of letting—Document not under seal—Weekly rent—Contract not to give notice to quit—Lease for life—Agreement for lease—Specific performance—Ejectment.

By a document not under seal it was expressed that the plaintiff had let a house to the defendant at a weekly rent, and that the plaintiff agreed not to raise the rent so long as the defendant lived in the house and paid rent regularly, and that the plaintiff would not give the defendant notice to quit, and that, if at any time the defendant wished to move out, the plaintiff promised to return to him the sum of money he had paid on taking possession.

In an action of ejectment brought after the defendant had refused to quit, in pursuance of a week's notice to quit,

Held, that the interest intended to be created by the document was a lease to the defendant for his life subject to certain conditions; that though it would be void as such a lease for want of a seal, it might be used as an agreement for such a lease; and that such an agreement was capable of specific performance; and that, therefore, the defendant, electing to ask for specific performance, was entitled to judgment.

Appeal from the judgment of Darling, J., on the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought by a landlord against a tenant to recover possession of a house.

Prior to the month of October, 1896, the defendant held the premises of the plaintiff as a weekly tenant.

On the 5th of October, 1896, the parties having agreed to an alteration in the weekly rent, a document in the following terms, and not under seal, was signed by the plaintiff's agent and delivered to the defendant:

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"I, the undersigned, S. Beron, of 13, Samuel-street, Commercial-road, E., have let to Mr. Abrahams the house situated at 24, Morgan-street, Commercial-road, E., at a weekly rental of 23s., and I agree not to raise Mr. Abrahams any rent as long as he lives in the house and pays rent regular. I shall not give him notice to quit. Any time Mr. Abrahams wishes to move out, I promise to return to him the £6 he has paid me on taking possession of the house.—S. BERON."

On the 30th of September, 1901, a week's notice to quit was given on behalf of the plaintiff to the defendant.

The defendant refused to go out of possession on the expiration of the notice, but remained in the house and proposed to continue payment of the weekly rent. His contention was that the plaintiff was bound by his agreement that he would not give him notice to quit.

The plaintiff refused to receive further rent and brought this action for recovery of possession. He alleged that the defendant held the premises on a weekly tenancy, and his case was that the condition as to not giving notice to quit was repugnant to the nature of a weekly tenancy, and was, therefore, not binding. Further, the plaintiff contended that, if the document, on the construction of it, amounted to a demise for the life of the defendant, it was as a lease for life void for not being under seal.

Darling, J., gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

Tindal Atkinson, K.C., and Holloway, for the plaintiff.

Foà, for the defendant.

The following cases were cited in argument: Browne v. Warner, 14 Ves. 156, 409; Cheshire Lines Committee v. Lewis, 50 L. J. Q. B. 121, 29 W. R. Dig. 111; In re King's Leasehold Estates, L. R. 16 Eq. 521, 22 W. R. Dig. 129; Parker v. Taswell, 6 W. R. 608, 2 De G. & J. 559; Wood v. Beard 2 Ex. D. 30, 25 W. R. Dig. 134; Mardell v. Curtis, [1899], W. N., p. 93.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think that the judgment of Darling, J., should be affirmed, but that the terms of it should be somewhat varied. Where there is an attempt to create an interest in land which for some reason or other fails, and in the same document in which that interest in land is attempted to be created there is an agreement by the grantor that he will not during the life of the grantee take any steps to enforce his, the grantor's, rights to resume possession of the land, then, in my opinion, unless the agreement creates in the grantee either a leasehold estate, or something beyond a leasehold estate, like a life estate, such agreement cannot be enforced. It may be as clear as possible that the grantor and the grantee did not intend that any action should be brought by the grantor to recover possession of the land during the life of the grantee. Still, however plain that may be, in my judgment, unless the agreement is such as to create in some way or other an effective interest in land in the grantee, the grantor has a right to bring his action to recover possession, and the right of the grantee, if any, under the agreement, is not a right to defeat an action by the grantor in the nature of ejectment, but a right to recover damages for breach of contract.

The whole question, therefore, in this case is whether, in effect, the document with which we have to deal either creates an immediate interest in land in the grantee or gives the grantee a right to call upon the grantor to execute such a document as shall convey to the grantee an interest consonant with the agreement and defeating the grantor's right to bring an action to recover possession of the land. It seems to me to be plain that this document does not create an immediate interest in land at law as between the plaintiff and the defendant. It does not vest in the defendant any interest in land whatsoever. That is so by reason, among other things, of the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, which requires any conveyance of an interest in land (subject to certain exceptions) to be under seal. But it is contended that, though this document is not under seal, and therefore ought not to be construed as a present demise, yet it may be construed as an agreement to demise of which a court of equity would grant specific performance; that, though the effect of the statute may be such as to render it impossible to rely on the document as an effective lease for the want of a seal, yet the grantee may treat it as being an agreement for a lease and as giving him the right to come to a court of equity and ask for an order for specific performance of it. And it is said that that is equally so, whether the document appears on the face of it to be a mere agreement to grant a lease, or whether it appears on the face of it to be a present demise but fails to comply with the requirements of the statute by not being under seal. For the first part of the proposition reference is made to the decision of Lord Eldon in Browne v. Warner, and for the second part reliance is laid on the judgment of Lord Chelmsford in the case of Parker v. Taswell. The latter judgment contained the following passage: "But the instrument now in question could not amount to a lease, because it was not signed by an agent lawfully authorized by writing, nor was it signed in the name of the principal, so as to render it a lease binding upon the lessor. Assuming, however, that it had been signed in the name of the lessor, and would, therefore, have amounted to a lease, as containing words of present demise, yet there is nothing in the Act to prevent its being used as an agreement, though void as a lease because not under seal."

I suppose, therefore, that I must take it that, unless there is something in this document rendering it impossible for judgment to be given for specific performance, the grantee is entitled to specific performance, if it either appears to be, within the rule laid down by Lord Eldon, a mere agreement to grant a lease, or if it appears to be in terms a present demise, but void as such under the Act of 8 & 9 Vict. for not being under seal. That seems to be the effect of the authorities. And if the defendant is entitled to specific performance there is an end to this action. If he ever had a right to have a lease executed he cannot be ejected. unless in accordance with any of the terms of the agreement, as by a notice to quit, any interest which he may have acquired has come to an end. Then what interest was intended to be created by this document? I find a difficulty in construing it as an agreement to create a tenancy from week to week. If not, what is it? It seems to me to be an agreement for a lease for the rest of the defendant's life, subject to two conditions—(1) that that the lessor may turn him out of possession if he does not pay his rent regularly; and (2) that the defendant may determine his own life estate by deciding to move out and, presumably, giving notice of his intention to do so.

Speaking for myself I should have doubted whether a court of equity would grant specific performance of a contract of that sort; for the moment after specific performance has been ordered it will be open to the lessee to determine his life estate and make the lease futile. The authorities, however, are in favour of the view that this is an agreement of which specific performance might be ordered.

But I do not think that our judgment ought to end there. This is an action for recovery of possession of land; and it seems to me that the plaintiff is entitled to recover unless the defendant within a specified time elects to take specific performance of the agreement and pays the arrears of rent now due. If the defendant within the time limited puts himself in a position to get specific performance by paying the arrears of rent, the appeal will be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. If the words of this instrument are sufficient to make it a demise, it is, as such, bad at law for not being under seal. But the judgment of Lord Chelmsford in Parker v. Taswell shows that that does not conclude the case. Although the instrument is void as a lease because it is not under seal, it may be used as an agreement for a lease. The question arises whether it is an agreement which is capable of specific performance. As regards that question, a doubt was expressed by Brett, L.J., in Cheshire Lines Committee v. Lewis. But in the case of Mardell v. Curtis, which was similar to the present case, Cozens-Hardy, J., granted specific performance. I see no reason to dissent from that decision, and I think that this agreement is capable of specific performance. I agree that the defendant, electing to ask for specific performance, is entitled to judgment, on condition that he pays the arrears of rent within the time limited.

MATHEW, L.J., concurred.

Judgment varied.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Brighten & Lemon.

Solicitors for the defendant, G. Van Damm & Co.

---

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Byrne, J. } Nov. 6, 26; Jan. 26.

In re RYLAND.
ROPER v. RYLAND. (a.)

Will—Charity—Terminable interest of real estate—Tenant for life—Consent—Mortmain—Vesting—Official Trustee of Charity Lands—Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 73), ss. 3, 5, 6.

A testator, by his will and codicil, gave his real and personal estate to trustees on trust for sale, but directed that no part of his freeholds and leaseholds should be sold during the life of his widow without her consent; and, subject to certain legacies and annuities, he gave one-fourth of the income, rents, and profits of his estate to his widow, and the remaining three parts of said income to certain charities; and he directed that after his widow's decease the whole of the said residuary estate should go to the said charities. The widow was alive, and had not consented to a sale, and more than a year had elapsed since testator's death.

Held, that the will gave two interests to the charities: (1) a reversionary interest, expectant upon the widow's decease, in the proceeds of sale of land, and this was not land within the meaning of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891; (2) a terminable interest in the income of land, which the trustees were expressly forbidden to sell during the lifetime of the widow without her consent in writing, and this was land, which, not having been sold within the year, had vested in the Official Trustee of Charity Lands.

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Summons.

This was a summons for the construction of the will of William Ryland, late of Rye Lodge, Sheffield, deceased, to determine, inter alia, whether under the provisions of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, the legal estate in a portion of testator's real estate comprised in the said will, and not yet sold, vested in the Official Trustee of Charity Lands. Herbert J. Roper, one of the executors and trustees of the will, was plaintiff, and Clara Ryland, testator's widow, and the other acting trustee and executrix under the will, certain charities, and the Official Trustee of Charity Lands were defendants.

The facts of the case were as follow:

By his will, bearing date the 13th of July, 1900, the testator gave his real and personal estate to his trustees therein named upon trust to carry out the following instructions. And after bequeathing certain legacies and annuities to his wife and others, and making a bequest of certain drawings as therein mentioned, testator directed all his pictures to be sold as therein mentioned and any pictures not sold to be disposed of as therein provided, and continued: "My trustees shall invest the net moneys realized from the sale of my pictures in any societies authorized by law for the investment of trust funds, or in the purchase of freehold ground-rents in England, or of debentures or debenture stock of any railway the works whereof shall be situate in Great Britain or which shall for the time being be paying dividends on its ordinary stock, or on the mortgage debenture bonds or mortgage debenture stock of any limited company in England which shall for ten years preceding the investment have paid dividends of not less than an average of 5 per cent. per annum on its ordinary shares, but not in any other mode of investment, and may from time to time vary or transfer such stock for others hereby authorized, in their discretion; and the income to be applied during the lifetime of my wife as follows: after satisfying the above-mentioned annuities for the time being payable, one-fourth to my said wife during her life and the remainder equally between and amongst the National Lifeboat Institution, the Port of Hull Society and Sailors' Orphan Home (Orphanage Branch), the Royal Masonic Institution for Boys and Royal Masonic Institution for Girls; and after the death of my wife the said purchase-moneys shall sink into and form part of my residuary estate. My trustees shall convert into money the residue of my estate at their discretion, but I direct that my trustees shall sell no part of my freeholds or leaseholds during the lifetime of my said wife without her consent in writing, and my executors and trustees are authorized to retain any of my investments in their present form without incurring any responsibility for any loss to be occasioned by such retention." And testator directed that the residue of his estate should be divided as follows: Two-fifths to the National Lifeboat Institution, two-fifths to the Port of Hull Society and Sailors' Orphan Home, one-tenth to the Royal Masonic Institution for Boys, one-tenth to the Royal Masonic Institution for Girls, in accordance with the directions thereby given.

On the 4th of October, 1900, testator added a codicil to his will whereby he declared his intention as follows: (1) That the annuities by his said will given should be payable out of his general estate, and not exclusively out of the moneys realized from the sale of his pictures. (2) That the directions as to the mode of investment of moneys realized from the sale of his pictures should apply also to his general estate as and when the same should be realized. (3) That the income of his general estate, after satisfying the annuities for the time being payable, should be applied in the manner in his will described with reference to the income arising from the moneys realized from the sale of his pictures.

The testator died on the 11th of October, 1900, and his will was, on the 28th of December, 1900, proved by two of his executors, the third having renounced probate, at the Wakefield District Registry. A year had thus elapsed since the testator's death, and all the real estate comprised in the will had not been sold.

The official trustee claimed that the legal estate had vested in him.

G. Cave, for the plaintiff.

Levett, K.C., and Nicholas, for the widow.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the official trustee.—So long as there is a prohibition on sale there is no equitable conversion. In re Sidebottom, 50 W. R. 641, [1902] 2 Ch. 389, has no application to this case, and section 5 of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, must apply: Attorney-General v. Dodd, 42 W. R. 524, [1894] 2 Q. B. 150; Lewin on Trusts (7th ed.), pp. 739, 810, 811.

W. M. Cann, M. Romer, and Peterson, for the charities.

In re Wilkinson, [1902] 1 Ch. 841, 50 W. R. Dig. 22, was also referred to.

Cur. adv. vult.

BYRNE, J. (after stating the facts).—The first question is whether or not, a year having elapsed since the date of the death of the testator and the time for sale not having been extended under section 5 of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, the interests given by the testator to charities have vested in the Official Trustee of Charity Lands under the same Act. It will be observed that there is a trust for sale applicable to the whole of the land which must be exercised upon the death of the widow, but the exercise of which during her lifetime without her consent in writing is expressly prohibited.

It is settled by the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of In re Sidebottom, that the proceeds of the sale of land subject to an immediate trust for sale are not land within the meaning of the Act of 1891, and that the provisions of sections 5 and 6 have consequently no application. In such a case the charity takes the interest in the proceeds given to it without any obligation to apply for an extension of time should the trustees neglect or be unable to sell within a year from the death of the testator, although this does not justify the trustees in indefinitely postponing the sale. Where the interest given is reversionary, if it is only an interest in proceeds of sale subject to a trust of sale to take effect immediately upon prior life or other estates in the land itself, I think such an interest is also not land within the meaning of the Act of 1891, and that the provisions of section 5 and 6 do not apply. It appears to me that upon the true construction of the will and codicil in this case there are in fact two interests given to the charities—the one a reversionary interest which is not land within the meaning of the Act, and as to which there is no necessity under this Act for an extension of time and no question of vesting in the Official Trustee of Charity Lands, and the other an immediate terminable interest in the income of land which the trustees are expressly forbidden to sell during the lifetime of the widow without her consent in writing. No such consent has been given, and at the expiration of a year from the testator's death the land from which the income arises remained, and it still remains, unconverted. I consider that the interest in the income given to the charities is land within the meaning of the Act, and that consequently, such interest not having been sold within the year, and no application under the Act for an extension of time having been made within the period, it has by force of the Act vested in the Official Trustee of Charity Lands. It appears to me that the words of section 6 are clear and precise, and that there can be no reasonable ground for saying that the court can avoid the vesting by an order extending the time on a subsequent application. There is a class of cases to which I was referred, showing that when there is a trust for conversion with the consent of a certain person, the introduction of the words "with the consent" was not sufficient to prevent conversion, there being an absolute trust for conversion. But it appears to me that I have a different case to deal with here, because, as I have said, there is an express negation of power to sell, except with consent in writing.

Then there is one other point I may mention, although it is not now before me for decision, I am not prepared to say that in the hands of the official trustee of the charities there is not power in them, in the Charity Commissioners, or in the court, as the case may be, to enlarge the time notwithstanding the fact that the year has elapsed. I do not decide that because it is not before me. [His lordship declared that the interest of the charities during the life of the widow in the income of the real estate had vested in the official trustee.]

Solicitors, Williamson, Hill, & Co., for Storey, Williams, & Storey, Halifax; Waterhouse & Co.; Parker, Garrett, Holman, & Howden; Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for Cooper & Sons, Manchester.

---

Chan. Div. Buckley, J. — Feb. 4, 5.

In re ROMAIN. (a.)

Solicitor—Remuneration—Conveyancing—Purchase and re-sale — Scale fees — Negotiation — Commission to agent — "Completing" conveyance — General order under Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44), Schedule I., Part I., r. 11.

In order to earn the scale fee for negotiating a purchase or a sale, a solicitor must arrange it—that is to say, must substantially do all the negotiations connected therewith, and not merely be one of a group of persons who negotiate; he must also show that no commission has been paid to another agent in respect of the negotiation.

In re Withall, 39 W. R. 529, [1891] 3 Ch. 8, followed.

In order to earn the scale fee for completing a purchase or sale, he must do all the work specified in the schedule, so far as the contract requires it to be done. Where there is a purchase and a re-sale of the whole of the purchased property, and the conveyance is from the vendor to the ultimate purchaser, the solicitor is not entitled to such a scale fee.

In re Read, 42 W. R. 601, [1894] 3 Ch. 238, distinguished

In re Baillie & Co., 15 Times L. R. 277, followed.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application on the part of a client to review the decision of the taxing-master, refusing to disallow certain items in a solicitors' bill for work done in connection with the purchase and re-sale of some house property.

On the 19th of February, 1902, Finkelstein and Diamant introduced the house property in question to the notice of the applicant, one Barnett Levy, with a view to its purchase and re-sale by him at a profit; on the same day they received a commission note from him, under which they were to receive £75 if the sale to him went through. He thereupon put himself into communication with a firm of estate agents, who were acting for the vendor, and who offered to submit his offer of £3,000 to the vendor.

On the 24th of February the estate agents informed Levy that there was a better offer for the property. On that day Levy, on the advice of Finkelstein and Diamant, consulted the solicitor.

On the 4th of March, Levy, in the presence of the solicitor, himself bid £50 more than another offer of £3,300, and the result was the purchase.

In the meantime, on the 26th of February, the commission note of the 19th of February had been replaced by another arrangement between the parties. Levy paid £10 in respect of the £75 to Diamant, and gave him another commission note for £45, payable if the re-sale to Davis should be carried through. Levy at the same time promised Finkelstein another commission note (which he ultimately gave him on the 6th of March, after the re-sale had been made) for £35 if the sale to Davis went through.

The re-sale to Davis was arranged on the 5th of March in the solicitor's office in the presence of Finkelstein and Diamant. Diamant, in an uncontradicted passage in his affidavit, swore that at the interview he opened the matter by "discussing the price with Davis, Levy having told me before the meeting that he would not take less than £3,700, which sum Davis eventually agreed to pay."

The conveyance, when prepared, was one from the original vendor to Davis, Levy being made a party. The applicant said that all that the solicitor had done in connection with it was to receive the abstract from the original vendor, copy it, and forward it to Davis's solicitors, to receive the requisitions from Davis's solicitors, copy them, and forward them to the original vendor, and that a similar process took place in regard to the observations and further requisitions. The solicitor said he had done more.

The items to which the applicant objected were—two scale fees for negotiating the purchase and re-sale respectively, and two scale fees, one for investigating the title and preparing and completing the conveyance to Levy, and one for deducing the title and perusing and completing the conveyance to Davis.

The master disallowed the objections, and the present summons was taken out. The applicant did not dispute that the solicitor was entitled to some remuneration.

P. S. Stokes and C. J. Mathew, for the applicant.—The solicitor is not entitled to the scale fee for negotiating the purchase and re-sale, by reason of rule 11 of the rules under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1883. He has not shown that he arranged the sale, and the price, and terms and conditions; neither has he shown that "no commission was paid by the client to an agent" in respect thereof: In re Withall, 39 W. R. 529, [1891] 3 Ch. 8; Drielsma v. Manifold, 42 W. R., 578, [1894] 3 Ch. 100. In the present case it is clear that Finkelstein and Diamant took the main part in arranging the sale and were paid for so doing. In re MacGowan, 39 W. R. 227, [1891] 1 Ch. 105, is not against us, because it was there held that the work in respect of which a commission was paid was something which did not come within the expression "negotiating a sale of property." As to the charge for completion, before the solicitor can charge the scale fee he must show that he has done all the services mentioned in the schedule: In re Lacy & Son, 32 W. R. 233, 25 Ch. D. 301. This case was said to have been distinguished in In re Read, 42 W. R. 601, [1894] 3 Ch. 238. But in In re Read there had been a purchase and a sub-sale of part of the property included in the original purchase, and the solicitor had done work in connection with both the purchase and the sub-sale. That was pointed out by the Court of Appeal in In re Baillie & Co., 15 Times L. R. 277, where, as in the present case, there was a conveyance from the original vendor to the ultimate purchaser, and it was held that the solicitor was not entitled to charge two scale fees.

H. S. A. Henriques, for the respondent.—As to the negotiation fee, the solicitor did in fact negotiate both the sale and the re-sale. Finkelstein and Diamant took no part in arranging the contract. All that they did was to introduce the purchaser; that is no part of the negotiation of the sale: In re Withall. Consequently the fact that they received a commission in respect of it is immaterial. The master decided this part of the case on the authority of In re MacGowan, and I submit that he is right. On the second point, the case falls within the principle of In re Read. In re Baillie & Co. is distinguishable; the ground on which it was decided was that the contract in respect of which the scale fee was charged was never really carried out.

BUCKLEY, J.—In this case I am unable to agree with the conclusion at which the taxing-master has arrived. If the matter involved a question of detail, of which he has very much greater experience than I, I should have more hesitation in differing from him than I have, but the question I have to determine is really one of principle arising from the construction of these rules and the decisions upon them. Now, if it were necessary to decide the point, I should, upon the affidavits, have very great doubt whether the solicitor in this case was employed to negotiate at all. But it is not necessary to determine that question, because, even if he was appointed to negotiate, I think the scale fee is not applicable for other reasons. [His lordship then stated the facts as to the negotiations, and continued:] The result of all this, as it seems to me, is this, that even if the solicitor did take some part in the negotiation, he did not take the entire part in it. Now, on that statement of the facts, I turn to rule 11, on which the question arises: "The scale for negotiating shall apply in cases where the solicitor of the vendor or purchaser arranges the sale or purchase, and the price, and terms and conditions thereof, and no commission is paid by the client to an auctioneer, or estate or other agent." Now, as Bowen, L.J., pointed out in In re MacGowan, there are two things to be satisfied—first, affirmatively, the solicitor must arrange the things mentioned; and further, negatively, no commission must be paid by the client to an auctioneer, or estate or other agent. I think the solicitor fails, in the first instance, upon the first part of that; I think he did not arrange the sale or purchase. As to what arranging means, I have the authority of the Court of Appeal in In re MacGowan, and again in In re Withall, for saying that that means that the solicitor must entirely conduct the negotiation. Those particular words are used by North, J., in In re Withall, [1891] 3 Ch. at p. 12, and his judgment is affirmed by the Court of Appeal. I do not understand that to mean that if the vendor introduces an intending buyer to the solicitor, and says to the latter, "Please negotiate," that the solicitor does not entirely conduct the sale. If those were the facts, a solicitor may entirely conduct the sale. But I think the words do mean that the solicitor is not to be one of a body of persons who negotiate; he must be the person who does the whole of the negotiation—that is to say, substantially the whole of the negotiation. Now, assuming, on the point as to which I say I am not satisfied, that the solicitor was employed to negotiate at all, then I think certainly he did not do the whole of the negotiation. He did not find the purchaser when the property was purchased, he did not find the purchaser when it was re-sold, and did not settle the negotiation in the matter of either one or the other.

Then the next point is this, that even if the affirmative words of rule 11 are satisfied, the negative words are not—"no commission is paid by the client to an auctioneer, or estate or other agent." In respect of both the purchase and the re-sale it seems to me that a commission was paid by the client to Finkelstein and Diamant. I think, therefore, that the solicitor is not entitled to the scale fee for negotiating either the purchase or the re-sale.

Then the next question is this, did he investigate the title and prepare and complete the conveyance when Levy purchased, and did he deduce the title and peruse and complete the conveyance when Levy sold. The facts are that, inasmuch as Levy had re-sold to Davis, the solicitor in fact did nothing at all but receive the abstract from the solicitors to Levy, hand it on to the buyer from Levy, and act in the same way with the requisitions when they came in. He did nothing at all. The conveyance when prepared was a conveyance from Levy's vendor to Levy's purchaser. Levy was made a party to it for the purpose of introducing the sub-purchaser, the proper person to whom the vendor could convey. I am not at all saying that the solicitor is not entitled to some payment for those things. He had to see that it was a proper conveyance for his client to concur in; but did he investigate the title and prepare and complete the conveyance in the one case, and peruse and complete the conveyance in the other? He did not. It was held in the Court of Appeal in In re Lacy & Son that in order to earn the scale fee the solicitor must do all those things so far as the contract requires them to be done; he must investigate the title, prepare the conveyance, and complete the conveyance, or, if it be a sale, he must peruse the conveyance and complete the conveyance. Did he do any one of those things? It appears to me he did not. It is said that in In re Read Kekewich, J., held that there might be a scale fee in circumstances which in some respects are similar to this. The essential difference, it appears to me, is this, that in the case before Kekewich, J., the sub-sale was a sub-sale, not of the whole, but of part of the property included in the head sale. Therefore there was a conveyance in respect of the original purchase, and there was another conveyance in respect of the sub-sale. It may very well be, under those circumstances, that some scale fee may be payable, and it may be that the scale fee in respect of the whole original purchase-money may be payable. As to that I say nothing at all; but it appears to me that In re Read has no application to a case where the sub-sale is a sale of the whole of the property included in the original sale, and where, therefore, the solicitor of the intermediate purchaser has nothing to do with completing the sale to his client, as distinguished from a sub-sale by his client. In re Lacy & Son was in the Court of Appeal, and was observed upon in In re Baillie & Son, where the Court of Appeal pointed out that In re Read had reference to such a state of facts.

It appears to me, then, that the solicitor must, in order to earn the scale fee, do all the things in that definition—he must investigate or deduce the title and prepare or peruse the conveyance, as the case may be, and he must procure the completion of the conveyance. This he has not done. I must, therefore, send the matter back to the taxing-master to deal with on the footing of this rule, as I understand the client does not at all dispute that the solicitor is entitled to be paid a proper fee.

Solicitors, J. S. Blankensee; D. A. Romain.

---

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) — Oct. 28.

HAYLES (Appellant) v. SANDOWN URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL (Respondents). (a.)

Local government—Street—Private street works—Final apportionment of expenses amongst frontagers—Right of frontager to object to apportionment—When to be made—Private Street Works Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 57), s. 12.

The respondents, an urban authority, acting in pursuance of section 6 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, which Act had been adopted by them, employed a contractor to execute levelling, paving, channelling, metalling, and other works in a certain road which was a street within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1875. Specifications, plans, and an estimate were duly made and deposited. The work was carried out, and on a final report by their surveyor that it had been satisfactorily completed the respondents paid to the contractor the contract price. The surveyor to the respondents then duly made a final apportionment of the expenses, and served notices of such apportionment upon the owners of premises affected thereby, in accordance with section 12 of the above Private Street Works Act. By sub-section 1 of that section it is provided that such final apportionment shall be conclusive for all purposes, and the sums thereby apportioned shall be recoverable in manner provided by the Act. Sub-section 2 of section 12 provides that within one month after notice of such final apportionment has been served, the owner of any premises charged with any expenses under such apportionment may object thereto upon the grounds, or any of them (inter alia), that the apportionment has not been made in accordance with the section, and that there has been an unreasonable departure from the specifications, plans, and sections.

The appellant, one of the frontagers affected by the notice of the final apportionment, objected thereto after one month had expired. The respondents took summary proceedings against the appellant to obtain payment of the sum apportioned upon him, and at the hearing before the justices the appellant objected that the works had not been completed within the meaning of section 12, because they had not been carried out in compliance with the specification, and that, therefore, the surveyor had no power to make a final apportionment of the expenses. He further desired to call evidence in support of his contention that the works had not been properly completed, but the justices refused to allow him to do so and ordered him to pay the sum claimed, on the ground that the final apportionment not having been objected to in manner provided by the Act was conclusive against him, and they therefore could not entertain the objections.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the decision of the justices was right.

This was a case stated under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts by justices for the county of Southampton.

At a petty sessions held at Newport, Isle of Wight, on the 12th of October, 1901, a complaint preferred by the clerk to the respondents, the Sandown Urban District Council, against George Hayles, the appellant, for that he owed to the respondents the sum of £38 7s. 1d., according to an apportionment made on the 15th ot April, 1901, under section 12, sub-section 1, of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, of expenses incurred in sewering, channelling, &c., a street called Wilton-road, Lake, was heard and determined, when the justices ordered the appellant to pay to the respondents the aforesaid sum with costs.

At the hearing of the complaint the following facts were admitted or proved.

The respondents had adopted the Private Street Works Act, 1892. Wilton-road was a street within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the appellant was the owner of premises abutting on it.

The respondents, acting under section 6 of the Private Street Works Act, being dissatisfied with the state and condition of the said street, resolved that the same should be sewered, kerbed, channelled, levelled, ballasted, metalled, and made good.

The notices, specifications, plans, sections, estimate and provisional apportionments required by section 6 were made, approved, and deposited, and copies thereof were duly served on the owners of the premises liable to be charged.

The works were executed under an agreement dated the 1st of May, 1900, made between the contractor of the one part and the respondents of the other part. The agreement provided, inter alia, that the respondents should pay to the contractor for the execution by him of the said works the sum of £279, or such greater or less sum or sums as according to the terms of the specification and general conditions therein referred to or contained should become payable by the respondents to the contractor, and would pay the same according to the terms of the said general conditions.

The cost of such works was arrived at by the respondents having caused a specification, plans, and estimate thereof to be prepared by their surveyor and deposited at the office of such surveyor, and having invited tenders for the works according to the specification and plans and according to the general conditions of the contract, and by their acceptance of the tender of the contractor at the sum aforesaid.

The respondents paid for the works the sum of £296 2s. 4d., made up as follows: Contract price, £279; extras, £3 0s. 4d.; surveyor's charges, £14 2s.

The respondents were satisfied with the works on the report of their surveyor and production of certificates given by him from time to time to the contractor, or during the progress of such works and of his final report and certificate on the completion of such works.

The surveyor inspected the works whilst they were in progress as often as he thought necessary, and when they were finally completed he, by personal inspection, satisfied himself that they had been completed in accordance with the terms of the contract, and he accordingly gave his certificate to the contractor for the payment to him of the balance due to him as provided by the contract, and reported the due completion of the works to his satisfaction to the works committee of the respondents, who thereupon reported to the respondents, who on production of the certificate of the surveyor directed payment of the balance so certified to be due to the contractor, and such final payment was made accordingly.

The amount sought to be recovered was apportioned against the appellant and notice thereof was on the 19th of April, 1901, duly served on him in the manner provided by the Act

The appellant failed to give notice to the respondents within the time prescribed of his intention to object to the final apportionment on any of the grounds set forth in section 12, sub-section 2, of the Act, nor did he raise any objection to such final apportionment until the 22nd of July, 1901, when he by his solicitor addressed the following letter to the respondents:

"I hereby give you notice that I consider the apportionment of the expenses of making up Wilton-road, Lake, made by your surveyor, invalid. Such apportionment should only be made when the work is complete, and from evidence obtained at the inspection made on the 24th of June last it is manifest that the road has not been formed and levelled, nor has it been ballasted with six inches of hard Ventnor rubble or white chalk, nor metalled with six inches best yellow gravel, nor have the footways been ballasted four inches thick, nor metalled with three inches fine St. George's Down gravel. Also the channelling and curbing does not comply with the specifications submitted and forming the basis of notice to frontagers. Mr. Hayles will therefore contest your right to recover payment from him, the Act requiring that the works shall be complete before the surveyor proceeds to make up his apportionment. It will be contended that it is equally necessary that the work should be complete in thickness as that it should be complete in width and length."

In reply the respondents wrote stating that the apportionment was final and had become binding and conclusive, no objection having been made thereto within the terms mentioned in the Public Street Works Act, 1892, under which the road was made, and therefore the matter could not be re-opened.

At the hearing of the complaint it was argued on behalf of the appellant that the works mentioned in the original estimate, specification, plans, and sections had only been partially completed and carried out; that actual completion was a condition precedent to the final apportionment; that as the works had not been wholly completed the final apportionment of the respondents' surveyor was null and void; and therefore it was unnecessary for the appellant to give notice of objection within the time and in the manner prescribed by section 12, sub-section 2, of the Act.

On the part of the respondents it was contended that as the appellant had failed to give written notice of his intention to object to the final apportionment on one or more of the grounds mentioned in the above sub-section within one month of the service of the notice of the same on him, such final apportionment was conclusive for all purposes, and the appellant was bound by the Act to abide by the apportionment.

The appellant desired to cross-examine the respondent's surveyor, and to call evidence in support of his contention that the original works had been only partially executed, but was not permitted to do so, the justices being of opinion that the final apportionment, not having been objected to in manner provided by the Act, was conclusive against the appellant; and they thereupon made the order now appealed from.

The questions now raised for the opinion of the court were: (1) Whether the justices were right in declining to allow the appellant to cross-examine and produce evidence in support of his contention; (2) whether having regard to the nature of the appellant's contention it was necessary for him to give notice of objection in the manner and within the time required by the Act; and (3) whether the final apportionment was made in accordance with the said Act.

By section 12 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 57), it is provided as follows:

"(1) When any private street works have been completed, and the expenses thereof ascertained, the surveyor shall make a final apportionment by dividing the expenses in the same proportions in which the estimated expenses were divided in the original or amended provisional apportionment (as the case may be), and such final apportioment shall be conclusive for all purposes; and notice of such final apportionment shall be served upon the owners of the premises affected thereby; and the sums apportioned thereby shall be recoverable in manner provided by this Act. . . ."

"(2) Within one month after such notice the owner of any premises charged with any expenses under such apportionment may, by a written notice to the urban authority, object to such final apportionment on the following grounds, or any of them:

"(a) That the actual expenses have without sufficient reason exceeded the estimated expenses by more than fifteen per cent.

"(b) That the final apportionment has not been made in accordance with this section.

"(c) That there has been an unreasonable departure from the specification, plans, and sections."

Montagu Lush, K.C. (C. B. Marriott with him), for the appellant.—The decision of the justices was wrong. By section 12 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, it is a condition precedent to the surveyor making a final apportionment of the expenses on the frontagers that the works be completed, and the appellant was entitled to adduce evidence before the magistrates to show that the works were not completed, and that, in consequence, the final apportionment was bad. The fact of the surveyor certifying that the work is done does not prove that the work has been done, and if the work is not done the apportionment is a nullity. In the case of Cook v. The Ipswich Local Board of Health, 19 W. R. 1079, L. R. 6 Q. B. 451, which was decided under the Public Health Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), an owner of property refused to pay the contribution apportioned to him, on the ground that he disputed the fairness and accuracy of the apportionment, and it was there held that the justices were not empowered under section 64 of the Local Government Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), to inquire into the actual expenditure, or as to the deposit of plans, their duty being simply ministerial, but the reason for that decision was that the remedy of the aggrieved party was by memorial to the Secretary of State under section 120 of the Public Health Act, 1848. There is no such remedy given by the Private Street Works Act, 1892.

Macmorran K.C. (C. Fleetwood Pritchard with him), for the respondents, was not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal fails, and that our judgment must be for the respondents. It is true that at the time Cook v. Ipswich Local Board of Health was decided it was the law that in proceedings to recover a sum due under an apportionment of paving expenses, made under section 69 of the Public Health Act, 1848, no question could be raised before the justices as to the validity of the apportionment on the ground that plans had not been deposited, or that the amount certified to have been expended was not correct; and it was pointed out in that case that under the above Act the remedy of the aggrieved party was by appeal to the Secretary of State. The Public Health Act, 1875, contains similar provisions to that Act, and provides an appeal to the Local Government Board. Then comes the Private Street Works Act, 1892, which gives the ratepayers valuable assistance and enables frontagers who are sought to be made liable under the Act to contribute towards the expenses of private street works very valuable rights which they had not before possessed. In the case of private street works under that Act it is provided that the surveyor shall prepare a specification, with plans and sections and an estimate of the probable expenses of the works and a provisional apportionment of the estimated expenses among the premises liable to be charged therewith, and these are, on approval by the urban authority, to be deposited for open inspection for the period of one month from the date of publication.

By section 7 any owner of any premises liable to be charged with any of the expenses may, during that month, by written notice served on the urban authority, object to their proposals on any of the several grounds specified in that section; and section 8 provides for the hearing and determination of such objections by a court of summary jurisdiction. Further, by section 12 they are given power of raising special points of objection after the works have been completed. [His lordship here read section 12.] If any of the grounds of objection in that section be made good, the court may amend or quash the apportionment. The appellant, however, in this case, has not availed himself of the remedy provided by section 12. Counsel on his behalf have contended that he could not avail himself of this remedy because the question he desired to raise cannot be brought within that section. It was further contended on his behalf that the final apportionment could not validly be made until the completion of the works, and that, therefore, if they had not been completed, he had a right to raise the question of the validity of the final apportionment on the hearing of the proceedings taken against him.

Speaking for myself I think it cannot be said that the appellant could not have raised the complaints, contained in the letter written on his behalf by his solicitor, under section 12. I think he could have raised them all, and that he had a remedy in respect of them.

Further, however, the facts as found in the case show that far from the works not having been completed, they had been completed to the entire satisfaction of the respondents. [His lordship here read the material parts of the finding as set out in the case.] Therefore, assuming that the matters which the appellant complained of were not such as could have been brought within section 12, the suggestion must be that the surveyor to the urban authority had been guilty of negligence or some improper conduct. There is nothing, however, in the Act showing that the owner of any premises liable to be charged an apportionment of the expenses of executing private street works has the right to raise the question of negligence or improper conduct of the surveyor as a defence to summary proceedings taken against him by the urban authority to recover the sum apportioned on him.

The Act does not give the frontager any new remedy, and I do not think that it can be said that, under the circumstances such as exist in this case, a frontager may dispute a final apportionment which the Act expressly declares shall be conclusive for all purposes. For these reasons I think the decision of the justices was right.

WILLS, J.—I agree.

CHANNELL, J.—I am also of the same opinion. I will only add a few words. I think it probable that the appellant had a remedy under section 12 if he had raised his objections in accordance with the provisions of that section. But assuming that he had no remedy under that section, I think he would have had no remedy at all, and I do not think it an unreasonable conclusion in one sense that he should have none. If the cost of the works executed in this case had not been chargeable to the frontagers, but to the ratepayers generally, and if the surveyor had been guilty of negligence or misconduct, the ratepayers clearly could not have disputed the rate out of which the costs were paid. I think the appellant is in no better position than an ordinary ratepayer against whom proceedings have been taken in a court of summary jurisdiction in order to recover payment of a rate made in respect of works executed at the cost of the ratepayers.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for appellant, Needham, Tyer, & Barrow, for John Marsh, Shanklin, Isle of Wight.

Solicitors for respondents, Wood, Bigg, & Co., for W. H. Wooldridge, Sandown, Isle of Wight.

---

Privy Council.

(From the Supreme Court of Victoria.)

July 9, 1902.

PAYNE v. THE KING.
THE KING v. PAYNE. (a.)

Victoria, Law of—Administration Act, 1890, s. 115—Conveyance, assignment, . . . or transfer with intent to evade payment of duty—Mortgage debt—Land mortgaged situated in different state to testator's domicil.

That part of section 115 of the Administration and Probate Act of Victoria, 1890, relating to conveyances, assignments, gifts, deliveries, or transfers "with intent to evade the payment of duty" is applicable to colourable transactions only. Therefore where a testator, a father, had bonâ fide transferred mortgages to his son to accustom him to the management of business and the responsibilities of property, and to make him independent,

Held, that the property transferred was not liable to duty.

Part of testator's property consisted of a mortgage on land situated in New South Wales, though both he and his mortgagee were resident and domiciled in Victoria, the debt being a specialty debt in New South Wales and a simple contract debt in Victoria.

Held, that the debt was an asset in Victoria, and therefore recoverable under a Victorian probate.

Appeal and cross-appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.

The facts are given at length in the judgment of their lordships.

E. F. Mitchell and J. Herbert Williams, for appellants in the appeal and respondents in the cross-appeal.

Haldane, K.C., and Rowlatt, for the Crown.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords MACNAGHTEN, DAVEY, ROBERTSON, LINDLEY, Sir FORD NORTH, and Sir ARTHUR WILSON) was delivered by Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The appellants, who are also respondents in the cross-appeal, are the executors of the will of the late Thomas Budds Payne, a gentleman of great wealth, who died on the 27th of August, 1897, domiciled in Victoria at the time of his death.

The proceedings out of which the appeal and cross-appeal arose were commenced by a petition of right, whereby the executors sought to recover back probate duty paid in respect of three several sums of £45,000, £75,000, and £63,000 and the interest accrued on those sums respectively at the time of the testator's death. The three principal sums were secured by three statutory mortgages of land in New South Wales, which are referred to in the proceedings as Kiddle's mortgage, McVean's mortgage, and McCulloch's mortgage. The sum of £45,000 secured by Kiddle's mortgage and the greater part of the sum of £75,000 secured by McVean's mortgage were made over by the testator in the year 1896 without consideration to his eldest son, the appellant John Frederick William Payne, and both mortgages were taken in his name.

The first question is, were these transfers made "with intent to evade the payment of duty" within the meaning of section 115 of the Administration and Probate Act of Victoria, 1890. The answer must depend on the true construction of that enactment and on the proper inference to be drawn from the evidence as to the real nature of the transaction between father and son.

The question in controversy with regard to McCulloch's mortgage is whether or not the principal sum secured thereby with the interest accrued at the date of the testator's death was an asset in Victoria so as to render it liable to duty there. This question would also have to be considered in reference to Kiddle's mortgage and McVean's mortgage in the event of it being held in accordance with a contention put forward on behalf of the respondent that the transfers of the two sums secured thereby were merely colourable.

The case came on to be heard before Madden, C.J. He decided the first question in favour of the executors, the second in favour of the Crown. On appeal the position was reversed. The full court determined the first question in favour of the Crown and the second in favour of the executors.

Section 115 of the Act of 1890 contains the following enactment:

"If any person has made or shall hereafter make any conveyance or assignment, gift, delivery, or transfer of any estate, real or personal, or of any money or securities of money with intent to evade the payment of duty under this part of this Act, in case such person should die the property contained in any such conveyance or assignment or the subject-matter of any such gift, delivery, or transfer shall, upon the death of such person, be deemed to form part of his estate for the purposes of this part of this Act upon which duty shall be payable under this part of this Act, and the payment of the duty upon the value of such property may be enforced against such property in the same way that duty under this part of this Act is enforceable, and as if such person had bequeathed or devised the said property to the person to whom the same may have been conveyed, assigned, given, delivered, or transferred."

The section then goes on to deal (1) with conveyances or assignments, gifts, deliveries, or transfers intended to take effect upon the death of the person making the same, which are "to be deemed to have been or to be made as the case may be with intent to evade the payment of the duty" under the Act, and (2) with donations mortis causâ which are "to be deemed to form part of the deceased's property for the purposes of estimating the duty."

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question of the meaning of the expression "with intent to evade the payment of duty" was discussed in the judgment of this board delivered by Lord Hobhouse in Simms v. Registrar of Probates, [1900] A. C. 323, 48 W. R. Dig. 184. Although the construction of the South Australian Act which was there in question involved the consideration of points not to be found in the present case, their lordships are of opinion that the principle of the decision must be applied, and that in conformity with that decision it must be held that the enactment contained in the earlier part of section 115 of the Victorian Act of 1890 extends to and strikes at colourable transactions only. It will be observed that in its terms the enactment is absolute without limitation of time or amount. It is difficult to suppose that the Legislature could have intended that on the death of a person dying after the passing of the Act a strict account should be taken of all transfers and gifts which the deceased had ever made in the whole course of his life being moved thereto more or less by the desire of avoiding payment of death duties, a motive which, in conjunction with others, operates frequently in the case of gifts to charitable institutions and certainly not unfrequently in the case of gifts to near relatives.

Then comes the question: Was the transaction as regards Kiddle's mortgage and McVean's mortgage real or only colourable? On the one hand there is the uncontradicted statement of Mr. John Frederick William Payne, who was examined and cross-examined on the subject. He seems to have given his evidence fairly and frankly. He was believed by the Chief Justice and not disbelieved by the Court of Appeal. He declared positively that in the case of both mortgages the gift to him was an absolute gift out-and-out not qualified by any reservation or trust or secret understanding of any sort or kind. On the other hand there is a circumstance which at first sight tends to create suspicion. Mr. John Frederick William Payne paid substantially the whole of the interest accruing on these mortgage debts to his father's account, and invested it or allowed it to be invested with his father's moneys. The learned Chief Justice thought that the peculiar position in which Mr. John Frederick William Payne was placed suggested an adequate and satisfactory explanation of his conduct. Mr. Payne, the father, had been a conveyancer. He retired from the profession, but still kept his office in Melbourne, and there he devoted his time and talents to the accumulation of money by prudent investments. Mr. John Frederick William Payne also began life as a conveyancer, but about twenty years ago, at his father's instance, he, too, gave up his profession. He was unmarried. He went to live in his father's house and assisted his father in the management of his business. He received no salary for his services, but he had the advantage of living in his father's house. There he had all he wanted. He had some means of his own, and from time to time he received presents from his father. He had no expensive tastes; his personal expenditure was not more than £300 or £400 a year. Then the intended disposition of his father's estate was no secret. There were three sons. They were to be residuary legatees in equal shares, and they were to bring into hotchpot all capital sums received from their father during his life. The gifts to Mr. John Frederick William Payne, large as they seem, were far short of his expectations under the will. The object of these gifts was, as he says, to accustom him to the management of business and the responsibilities of property, and to make him feel independent of his father, and possibly, he thinks, to induce him to marry. A younger brother who was married at the time had been advanced on his marriage. In these circumstances it does not seem so very extraordinary that the father should make large advances to his eldest son, and that the son, instead of hoarding the interest (which might have given rise to jealousy and ill-will), should throw the income which he did not care to spend into a common fund, investing it with his father's moneys for the ultimate benefit of himself and his brothers. Mr. Payne, the father, had such command of money and such skill in dealing with it that probably the son lost little or nothing by not keeping his own money in his own hands. On the whole their lordships see no reason to dissent from the conclusion at which the Chief Justice arrived. The judgment of the full court was based on a view which their lordships cannot accept. They thought that there could be no "reasonable motive" for making the gifts in question unless it were found in the intent to evade payment of duty. "The motive for saving probate duty," they say, "reconciles with reason what would otherwise appear to be useless proceedings." Though the gift might be a perfected gift and the conveyance might fulfil all legal requisites, a manifest desire on the part of the donor to avoid payment of duty was in their opinion enough to prove an intent to evade payment of duty within the meaning of the enactment.

There remains the question as to McCulloch's mortgage. That was the testator's property at the time of his death. The debtor as well as the testator resided in Victoria and was domiciled there. The debt, though a specialty debt in New South Wales, was a simple contract debt in Victoria. That being so, it seems to their lordships that the Chief Justice and Hood, J., who dissented on this point from their colleagues, were right in holding that the debt was an asset in Victoria and recoverable under a Victorian probate, although it may well be that in order to discharge the mortgage probate duty would also have to be paid in New South Wales, and the debt, if recovered in Victoria, might be retained in court until the mortgagees were in a position to discharge the mortgage. This result seems to their lordships consistent with the practice as established in England, and their lordships see no reason why a similar rule of practice should not be held to apply in an analogous case in the states of the Australian Commonwealth.

Their lordships will therefore humbly advise his Majesty that the order of the full court should be discharged, each party paying his own costs of the appeals thereto, and the order of the Chief Justice restored.

As the appellants have succeeded in their appeal and the respondents are successful in the cross-appeal there will be no order as to costs here.

Solicitors for the appellants, Burton, Yeates, & Hart.

Solicitors for the Crown, Freshfields.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Feb. 27.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN THE GODSTONE RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL AND THE CATERHAM URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Conversion of part of rural district into urban district—Adjustment of property and liabilities—"Property, income, debts, liabilities, and expenses"—Highway expenses—Loss of income to rural district—Local Government Acts, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), ss. 57, 62; and 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 54.

By an order made under section 57 of the Local Government Act, 1888, part of a rural district was converted into an urban district, and the property and liabilities of the rural district council, so far as regarded the area comprised in the new urban district, became vested in the urban district council, including the liability to maintain the highways. The rural district council claimed an adjustment of the income, liabilities, and expenses, under section 62 of the Act, in respect of the maintenance of the highways, upon the ground that the contributions formerly received by the rural district council from the area comprised in the new urban district exceeded the cost of the maintenance of the highways in that district, and that therefore there would be a loss of income to them by reason of the order.

Held, that this loss of income was a matter for adjustment under the words "property, income, debts, liabilities, and expenses" in section 62 of the Act.

Section 54 of the Local Government Act, 1894, does not apply to such a case.

Appeal by the Caterham Urban District Council from the judgment of Wright, J., upon an award of an arbitrator stated in the form of a special case.

In 1864 the Godstone highway district was formed under the provisions of the Highway Act, 1862. It consisted of the parishes of Bletchingley, Chelsham, Crowhurst, Farleigh, Godstone, Horne, Limpsfield, Lingfield, Oxted, Tandridge, Tatsfield, Titsey, Warlingham, Woldingham, and Caterham. The area of the Godstone Union, being the rural sanitary district of Godstone, consisted of the same parishes with the exception of the parish of Lingfield, which was in the East Grinstead Union. The parish of Lingfield was transferred to Godstone under the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1894, as from the appointed day.

In 1894, by virtue of the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1894, the Godstone Rural District Council became the successors of the Godstone Rural Sanitary Authority and of the Godstone District Highway Board, and the latter board ceased to exist, and all the powers, duties, and liabilities of the Godstone Rural Sanitary Authority and of the Godstone District Highway Board were transferred to the Godstone Rural District Council.

On the 18th of October, 1898, the county council of Surrey, in pursuance of the provisions of the Local Government Acts, 1888 and 1894, made an order constituting the parish of Caterham a special urban district, and on the 16th of February, 1899, this order was (with certain alterations) confirmed by an order of the Local Government Board. Under these orders the parish of Caterham ceased to form part of the rural district of Godstone, and was converted into and constituted an urban district; and the highways thereof had been since the 17th of April, 1899, under the separate control and management of the Caterham Urban District Council, and the parish of Caterham had ceased to contribute towards the highway expenses of the Godstone Rural District Council. By paragraph 8 of the order, on and after the day of the first meeting of the urban district council all the property and liabilities which were attaching to or vested in the Godstone Rural District Council, so far as regarded the area comprised in the urban district of Caterham, passed to and vested in the Caterham Urban District Council; but until such day the powers, duties, liabilities, and property of the rural district council should continue to be exercisable by, attached to, and vested in the rural district council. Any sum required to be paid by any authority affected by this order in pursuance of any agreement or of any award under the Acts might be paid out of such fund as should be determined by the agreement or by the award. In default of an agreement being made under the Acts as to any matters requiring adjustment by reason of a doubt as to the parties who should enter into such agreement, or for any other reason, the matter should be referred to the county council, who might make such order therein as might seem to such council to be equitable.

The Godstone Rural District Council proposed before the arbitrator to prove that during the three years preceding the 1st of April, 1899, and while the parish of Caterham was part of the district of the Godstone Rural District Council, the latter received from rates levied in the parish of Caterham for highway purposes a sum considerably greater than that expended during the same period by the Godstone Rural District Council in respect of the maintenance and repair of highways in the parish of Caterham. They tendered a document showing the half-yearly expenditure upon highways in the parish of Caterham and the remainder of the rural district of Godstone during the six half-years to the 31st of March, 1899, the assessable values of the parish of Caterham and the remainder of the rural district of Godstone, upon which general expenses were apportioned in respect of such half-years, the half-yearly contributions by Caterham towards highway expenses, and the half-yearly excess of contribution over expenditure. The Caterham Urban District Council admitted, for the purposes of the case, the correctness of the facts stated in this document, but contended that, assuming the facts to be as therein stated, there was no matter requiring adjustment under the provisions of section 62 of the Local Government Act, 1888.

The Godstone Rural District Council made a claim against the Caterham Urban District Council for that their income, liabilities, and expenses in respect of the maintenance and repair of highways were affected by the above orders by reason of loss of contributions from the parish of Caterham to the maintenance and repair of highways in the Godstone rural district; that is to say, that the contributions which had been withdrawn from the Godstone Rural District Council in consequence of the orders exceeded what it cost the council to maintain the highways in the parish of Caterham in proper repair, and the rates for the maintenance and repair of highways in the Godstone rural district had increased in consequence of the loss of the contributions from the parish of Caterham by the operation of the orders; and the Godstone Rural District Council alleged that they were entitled to have the claim adjusted by arbitration under section 62 of the Local Government Act, 1888.

The arbitrator was of opinion that the claim was a matter requiring adjustment under section 62, but consented to make his award in the form of a special case. If the court should be of opinion that the contention of the Caterham Urban District Council was correct in law, then judgment was to be entered for them with costs. If the court should be of opinion that the contention of the Godstone Rural District Council was correct in law, then judgment was to be entered for them for a declaration that they were entitled to have their claim adjusted by arbitration under section 62 of the Local Government Act, 1888.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wright, J., held that he was bound by the decisions in In re Rochdale Union and Haslingden Union, 47 W. R. 322, [1899] 1 Q. B. 540, and In re Buckinghamshire County Council and Hertfordshire County Council, [1899] 1 Q. B. 515, 47 W. R. Dig. 114, to decide in favour of the contention of the Godstone Rural District Council, and accordingly he gave judgment for them.

The Caterham Urban District Council appealed.

R. M. Bray, K.C., and Montague Shearman, for the appellants.

C. A. Russell, K.C., and George Humphreys, for the respondents.

In re Rochdale Union and Haslingden Union; In re Buckinghamshire and Hertfordshire County Councils; In re Sowerby Council and Mytholmroyd Urban Council, 74 L. T. Rep. 313, 44 W. R. Dig. 92; Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 144, 145; Local Government Act, 1888, ss. 32, 57, 59, 62; Local Government Act, 1894, ss. 25, 29, 54, 68.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question which we have to determine in this case is one that is raised by the arbitrator in the special case, and that question is raised by the contention of the Caterham Urban District Council that in respect of the claim of the Godstone Rural District Council there is no matter requiring adjustment under section 62 of Local Government Act, 1888; and by the decision of the arbitrator that the claim is a matter requiring adjustment under the section. Stated shortly, the claim of the Godstone Rural District Council is this. They say that, as the parish of Caterham has now been constituted a separate unit as an urban district, and as that parish was before the separation a constituent part of the rural district of Godstone, having regard to the order and the scheme embodied in the order for the constitution of the urban district of Caterham as a separate unit, there are matters which, under the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1888, ought to be adjusted as between Godstone and Caterham. The particular matter as to which it is claimed to have an adjustment relates to the maintenance and repair of the roads within the new urban district of Caterham, and it was put upon the ground that while the parish of Caterham was part of the rural district of Godstone the rates levied in the parish of Caterham for highway purposes exceeded in amount the sum expended upon the maintenance and repair of the roads within the parish, and that the maintenance and repair of these latter highways will now be taken over by the urban district of Caterham, and that therefore the Godstone Rural Council will now lose this profit, which is said to be £600 a year. We have to say whether this constitutes a matter which ought to be adjusted under section 62 of the Local Government Act, 1888.

Wright, J., has somewhat reluctantly held that this profit, which Godstone will cease to enjoy by reason of the constitution of the parish of Caterham into a new urban district, is a loss of income which ought to be adjusted within the meaning of section 62 and in coming to that conclusion he felt himself bound by the decision of this court in In re Rochdale Union and Haslingden Union. I agree with Wright, J., that that case completely covers the question raised in the present case, and it is a decision which is binding upon us, and the case of In re Buckinghamshire County Council and Hertfordshire County Council, before the Divisional Court, seems to me to have gone upon the same lines. For that reason I think that the decision of Wright, J., must be supported. But at the same time I think it right to consider the grounds upon which it is sought to distinguish the case of In re Rochdale Union and Haslingden Union from the present case. In In re Rochdale Union and Haslingden Union the adjustment was claimed under section 68 of the Local Government Act, 1894, which deals with the adjustment of "property, income, debts, liabilities, and expenses"—words which are similar to the words in section 62 of the Local Government Act, 1888. Now it will be seen that section 62 differs from other sections in the Act by the inclusion of the words "income and expenses." It is in consequence of the inclusion of those words in section 62 that it has been held that the loss of income caused by the withdrawal of an area which yields a profit is a matter which requires adjustment under that section, and which can be adjusted by agreement between the parties, or, in default of agreement, by arbitration. It follows from the authorities to which I have referred that primâ facie this loss of income which has accrued to Godstone by reason of the order constituting Caterham a new urban district is a matter which falls within section 62. The grounds upon which it is said that in this case such a loss of income cannot be properly dealt with by the arbitrator under section 62 are these. It is said, in the first place, that the scheme of the county council under section 57 of the Local Government Act, 1888, which was approved by the Local Government Board, has in fact dealt with this matter, and the way in which it is said that the county council has dealt with it is that in paragraph 8 of the order all the property and liabilities which were attaching to or vested in the Godstone Rural District Council, so far as regarded the area comprised in the urban district of Caterham, passed to and vested in the Caterham Urban District Council, and it is said that the proper inference from that is that, as the order has not dealt with this income, the county council did not think it was a matter for adjustment at all. I do not think that that is the proper inference. It is plain, if one looks further into the order, that the county council thought that there might be some matters which required adjustment. In my opinion, therefore, the county council has not so dealt with this matter as to exclude a subsequent adjustment. It is then said that under the later words of paragraph 8 of the order the adjustment, in default of agreement, must be made by the county council. I cannot agree. It is next said that section 62 of the Act of 1888 has no application at all to this case, because, whatever might have been the state of things prior to the Local Government Act, 1894, by reason of section 54 of that Act this subject-matter of adjustment is now outside the jurisdiction of the arbitrator. The argument was that, whereas section 62 of the Act of 1888 includes "income and expenses," one finds in section 54 of the later Act a provision which, it is said, governs this matter, and which only contains the words "property, debts, and liabilities." It was said that section 54, sub-section 1 (c) and sub-section 2 (b), apply to such a case as this, and that therefore the matters for adjustment are limited to property, debts, and liabilities I confess that, when this argument was put forward, I felt myself more than half persuaded; but afterwards the argument on behalf of the respondents displaced the view I was at first inclined to take. Section 54 of the Act of 1894 provides that: "(1) Where a new borough is created, or any other new urban district is constituted, or the area of an urban district is extended." Then follows clauses (a) and (b), which relate to purely parochial matters, and which have no bearing upon this case. Then comes (c): "Provision shall also (where necessary) be made for the adjustment of any property, debts, and liabilities affected by the said creation, constitution, or extension." Then comes sub-section 2: "The provision aforesaid shall be made . . . (b) where any other new urban district is constituted by an order of the county council under section 57 of the Local Government Act, 1888." There is no doubt that the words of sub-section 2 (b) are wide enough to cover the present case, and it is accordingly urged that the matters for adjustment are limited by sub-section 1 (c). The words, as I have said, are wide enough to include this case; but if we were to hold that, upon the creation of a new urban district, the matters for adjustment are for all purposes limited by sub-section 2 (c), we must come to the conclusion that it was intended to repeal section 62 of the Act of 1888 so far as this matter of income and expenses is concerned. I do not think that we ought so to read section 54, sub-section 2 (c). As Wright, J., pointed out in his judgment, we ought to deal with section 54 as governing those matters which it was necessary to deal with owing to the creation of parish councils under the Act of 1894. That argument, therefore, for the reasons given by Wright, J., cannot prevail.

I should like now to say a few words as to what we must be taken to decide in the present case. It has been suggested that what Godstone is claiming is a sum which would represent the capitalized value of £600 a year, and we were told that that sum was about £36,000. I wish to say most emphatically that there is nothing in our decision that that is the measure of the claim. The arbitrator will have to take relevant matters into consideration. I am not going to lay down a measure for the arbitrator, but I will merely point out certain matters which go to show that the measure is not represented by capitalizing the annual sum of £600. That capitalization is based on the assumption that, had it not been for the order creating the Caterham urban district, matters would have gone on for ever as they were before—that is to say, that the proportion of contribution to expenses would have remained unaltered. It is also based on the assumption that the roads in Godstone rural district, the liability for the maintenance of which is still retained by the Godstone Rural District Council, would be more useful to Caterham than to any other area in the original district. Let me take, however, another view. One cannot help thinking that there are roads in Godstone, the liability for the maintenance and repairs of which remains in the Godstone Rural District Council, which will be useless to Caterham, and that would be a matter to be taken into consideration in arriving at the amount, if any, which ought to be paid by Caterham to Godstone upon the adjustment. I was the more impressed by this by something which counsel for the respondents strongly urged in argument. I had put it to him that one was reluctant to come to the conclusion he contended for because it seemed to have no basis in natural justice. I pointed out that if there was an amalgamation of a number of units into one unit, and the amalgamation was not intended to be permanent, it is difficult to see why, upon the separation of that unit into its different parts, the different parts should be under a liability to maintain the income of the respective parts as at the time when they were members of the same unit. Primâ facie upon the dissolution of the unit each part would go back to its antecedent position. But counsel pointed out that there is a foundation of natural justice for an adjustment in the present case, because the roads in the Godstone district will probably be much more useful to Caterham, which has gradually grown into a town, than to any other member of the original unit. If it be true that that is in any sense a foundation for adjustment, it follows that the prospect of that state of things not being permanent, and anything that militates against the truth of the proposition that the roads in Godstone are more useful to Caterham than to any other member of the original district, must be taken into account. I do not say that in the particular circumstances of this case the facts are such that it will become necessary to give effect to all these considerations, except one general matter which any arbitrator is bound to take into consideration—namely, the permanency or otherwise of the existing proportion of expenditure to income. In these circumstances, I feel much more easy about the results of the conclusion at which we have arrived than if we thought that the result would be that Caterham would have to pay to Godstone anything approaching the capitalized value of £600 a year. The appeal must be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have little to add to the judgment of Vaughan Williams, L.J. It seems to me to be impossible to differ from the judgment of Wright, J. He followed the principles laid down by this court in In re Rochdale Union and Haslingden Union. It is true that that was a decision under sections 36 and 68 of the Local Government Act, 1894, whereas we are dealing with an order made under section 57 of the Local Government Act, 1888, in respect of which the necessary adjustment has to be made under section 62 of that Act. Still, in my opinion, if the claim put forward in In re Rochdale Union and Haslingden Union was admissible, as it was held to be, the claim put forward on behalf of the Godstone Rural District Council for adjustment is admissible here. That is all that we are required to decide. We are only asked whether the claim for adjustment is admissible. I quite agree with Vaughan Williams, L.J., that we are not to be taken as laying down that the sum payable is £36,000, which is said to be the capitalized value of £600 a year, or anything like it.

MATHEW, L.J.—I agree with Stirling, L.J., that there is little that need be added to the judgment of Vaughan Williams, L.J. It was contended for the appellants that an adjustment by arbitration could not have been intended because of the difficulty of arriving at any satisfactory conclusion. It was pointed out that no directions are given to the arbitrator as to the course that he should pursue, and as to the grounds upon which he has to make his award. It was asked if it could have been intended that he should capitalize the savings on the assumption that the existing state of things would be permanent. I desire to guard myself against being supposed to sanction any such calculation. The arbitrator will no doubt closely scrutinize any figures laid before him and consider the changes that may take place in the future. For instance, he may see that a district rural in character at present may in the near future tend to become urban. Again, that hereafter the extent of the user of the roads in Caterham may possibly be increased and involve additional expense. I should be slow to come to the conclusion that the claim as promulgated by Godstone for £36,000 was reasonable or equitable.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellants, F. B. Winter.

Solicitors for the respondents, Cooper, Turner, & Evans, for E. A. Head, East Grinstead.

From K. B. Div. and Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L.JJ.) } Feb. 16.

KOLCHMANN v. MEURICE.

Practice—Charging order—Shares—Power to order sale—Judgments Act, 1838 (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110), s. 14—Ord. 46, r. 1—Service of writ out of jurisdiction—Action to enforce charging order—Ord. 11, r. 1 (e).

Where a judgment creditor has obtained a charging order under section 14 of the Judgments Act, 1838, upon shares in a company standing in the name of the judgment debtor, the court has no power to make an order for the sale of the shares in the original action, but a separate action must be brought for that purpose.

Leggott v. Western, 32 W. R. 460, 12 Q. B. D. 287, approved.

Ord. 11, r. 1 (e) does not apply to the case of an action to enforce a charging order obtained under section 14 of the Judgments Act, 1838, and consequently leave cannot be granted to issue a writ for service out of the jurisdiction in such an action.

Moritz v. Stephan, 36 W. R. 779, approved.

Appeals from orders of Walton, J., and Joyce, J.

On the 14th of March, 1902, the plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant in an action in the King's Bench Division for £4,303. The defendant was out of the jurisdiction of the court, being resident in Paris.

On the 28th of May the plaintiff obtained a charging order absolute, under section 14 of the Judgments Act, 1838 (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110), whereby it was ordered that the defendant's interest in certain shares in an English company standing in his name should stand charged with the payment of the amount of the judgment.

Section 14 enacts that a charging order made thereunder shall entitle the judgment creditor to all such remedies as he would have been entitled to if such charge had been made in his favour by the judgment debtor. The section also provides that no proceedings shall be taken to have the benefit of such charge until after the expiration of six calendar months from the date of the order.

After the expiration of the six months the plaintiff took out a summons in the action by way of equitable execution asking for an order to enforce the charging order by a sale of the shares.

Walton, J., was of opinion, on the authority of Leggott v. Western, 32 W. R. 460, 12 Q. B. D. 287, that plaintiff's proper course was to commence a fresh action to enforce the charging order, and he accordingly refused to make an order for sale on this summons.

The plaintiff then applied in the Chancery Division for leave to issue a writ for service on the defendant out of the jurisdiction, under ord. 11, r. 1 (e), in an action asking to have an account taken of what was due under the judgment and to have the charging order enforced by a sale of the shares.

Joyce, J., refused the application, on the authority of Moritz v. Stephan, 36 W. R. 779.

The plaintiff appealed from both refusals, and it was arranged that the two appeals should be heard together.

Beddall, ex parte, for the plaintiff.—Walton, J., was mistaken in thinking that he had no jurisdiction to order a sale in the original action. The court has ample jurisdiction to grant relief by way of equitable execution in an action without the necessity of starting fresh proceedings. Section 24, sub-section 7, of the Judicature Act, 1873, is as follows: "The High Court of Justice and the Court of Appeal respectively, in the exercise of the jurisdiction vested in them by this Act in every cause or matter pending before them respectively, shall have power to grant, and shall grant, either absolutely or on such reasonable terms and conditions as to them shall seem just, all such remedies whatsoever as any of the parties thereto may appear to be entitled to in respect of any and every legal or equitable claim properly brought forward by them respectively in such cause or matter; so that, as far as possible, all matters so in controversy between the said parties respectively may be completely and finally determined, and all multiplicity of legal proceedings concerning any of such matters avoided." The case of Leggott v. Western, by which Walton, J., considered himself bound, is, no doubt, an express decision of a Divisional Court to the effect that an order for the sale of shares comprised in a charging order under the Judgments Act, 1838, cannot be made in the original action, but that it is necessary for the judgment creditor to institute separate proceedings for that purpose. But other authorities show that an agreement to compromise an action may be enforced in the action itself by an order for a stay, and that an order for the appointment of a receiver by way of equitable execution may be made in an action, without in either case any necessity for instituting separate proceedings: Eden v. Naish, 26 W. R. 392, 7 Ch. D. 781; Smith v. Cowell 29 W. R. 227, 6 Q. B. D. 75; In re Gaudet Frères Steamship Co., 12 Ch. D. 882, 28 W. R. Dig. 49; Salt v. Cooper, 29 W. R. 553, 16 Ch. D. 544. As to the question of service out of the jurisdiction, Joyce, J., followed the decision of North, J., in Moritz v. Stephan. The ground of that decision was that an action to enforce a charging order was not an action founded on breach of contract within the meaning of ord. 11, r. 1 (e). But it has always been held to be the law that an action of debt lay on a judgment: Com. Dig., Debt, A, 2; Williams v. Jones, 13 M. & W. 628. And by section 14 of the Judgments Act, 1838, a judgment creditor who has obtained a charging order on shares is in the same position as if the judgment debtor had actually made a charge in his favour. An action to enforce a charging order is, therefore, an action ex contractu. Unless the court overrules either Leggott v. Western or Moritz v. Stephan, it will be impossible for the plaintiff to get any benefit from his charging order.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my judgment both appeals fail. The argument has been ingenious, but the ingenuity suggests to my mind primâ facie a doubt as to whether the applications ought to be granted. When we consider that the state of legislation and procedure has been such as has rendered it possible that applications like the present might have been made during all the years which have elapsed since the passing of the Judicature Act, and when we find that in practice such applications have not been made, that alone, in my opinion, is sufficient to make us look very carefully to see why such procedure should never have been attempted to be adopted. I am not contented with the answer that the decision in Leggott v. Western has been acquiesced in because in most cases it was not worth while to question it. What is the procedure which it is suggested should be adopted? The judgment creditor has obtained an order charging the defendant's interest in certain shares with payment of the judgment debt, and it is suggested that, without any further proceeding other than a summons in the original action to give effect to that charging order, the court ought to make an order for the sale of the shares. In my judgment we ought not to do so. I think that the decision in the case of Leggott v. Western is right, and is conclusive on this point. Further, with an order limited as this charging order is to the defendant's interest in the shares, it would practically be very difficult, if not impossible, to work out an order for sale. That part of the case therefore fails.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

With regard to the appeal from the refusal of Joyce, J., to allow service of a writ out of the jurisdiction, it is only necessary to read rule 1 (e) of order 11 to see that that rule—the only rule relied on—has no application whatever to this case. It is impossible to say that the action which it is proposed to bring could be called an action for breach of contract. This appeal, therefore, also fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. With regard to the first appeal, the only order which we could possibly make would be an order that the defendant's interest in the shares should be sold. In the absence of any evidence as to what that interest consists of, it seems to me that it would be impossible to make any order for sale which could be successfully worked out. Apart from the difficulty as to making the order in the original action, I think that the order would be futile. But further, I do not differ from the decision in Leggott v. Western, which has been in force so long.

With regard to the second appeal, I agree that this case does not fall within ord. 11, r. 1 (e). The plaintiff desires to enforce his charge against the defendant's shares. But there is no power to issue a writ for service out of the jurisdiction in an action to enforce a charge against personal property.

Appeals dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Pakeman & Read.

---

From Chan. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Feb. 5.

VAN PRAAGH v. EVERIDGE. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Mistake—Bidding for wrong property—Contract signed by auctioneer—Authority—Error in date—Statute of Frauds.

A bidder at an auction bid for one property in the belief that he was bidding for another. The property was knocked down to him, but on finding out his mistake he refused to sign the contract. The auctioneer signed the contract on his behalf. The contract signed had been prepared with a view to an earlier sale, and bore date one month earlier than the actual date of the sale.

Held, that there was no memorandum in writing of the alleged contract sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds.

Decision of Kekewich, J., [1902] 2 Ch. 266, 50 W. R. Dig. 181, reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported [1902] 2 Ch. 266, 50 W. R. Dig. 181).

The plaintiff was the owner of a freehold house situate at Frognal, Hampstead, and known as "Saradith."

On the 18th of November, 1901, this house was put up for sale by auction. Two other properties were offered for sale at the same time—namely, an estate known as Parson's Mead, Ashtead, and No. 24, Cullum-street, in the City of London.

The defendant, who was a builder, attended the auction with the intention of bidding for Parson's Mead. He was present in the auction room at the commencement of the sale, and took a seat in the second or third row from the front. Affixed to the auctioneer's rostrum was a large notice stating the order of sale to be as follows: "(1) "Saradith," Hampstead; (2) Parson's Mead, Ashtead; (3) 24, Cullum-street." There were also distributed about the sale room a number of smaller printed notices to the same effect.

The auctioneer, on entering the rostrum, began by stating the order in which he would offer the properties, and he then proceeded to offer the Hampstead property, which he fully described.

The defendant made three or four offers for this property and it was ultimately knocked down to him for £4,500. The defendant, who was somewhat deaf, believed that he was bidding for the Ashtead property. The auctioneer then sent his clerk to the defendant for his name and address to fill up the necessary contract, but the defendant objected that he had not purchased the Hampstead property but had purchased the Ashtead property. The clerk informed the auctioneer that the defendant denied having bought the Hampstead property, but the auctioneer, who had proceeded some way with the description of the Ashtead property, declined to interrupt the sale of that property, which was ultimately bought in at £16,000.

Before Lot 3 was offered the defendant had an interview with the auctioneer and told him that he had made a mistake and believed that he was bidding for the Ashtead property. The auctioneer replied that he must hold him to his bargain and requested him to sign the contract. This the defendant refused to do. Accordingly the auctioneer, before leaving the rostrum, signed the contract as agent for the defendant.

The particulars and conditions of sale used with reference to the sale of "Saradith" were prepared with a view to a sale on the 17th of October, 1901, which was eventually postponed till the 18th of November. On the actual sale the date on the outside of the particulars was altered to the 18th of November, but the dates in the conditions and contract at the end were not altered. The result was that the contract which was signed appeared as "Dated this 17th day of October, 1901," and commenced "I . . . do hereby acknowledge that I have this day purchased."

The conditions stated: (3) That the purchaser should at the close of the sale pay a deposit of £10 per cent. on the amount of the purchase-money, and should pay the remainder "on the 21st day of November, 1901 . . . at which time . . . the purchase shall be completed." (4) The purchaser should within seven days after the delivery of the abstract send his objections and requisitions. (7) The purchaser should deliver engrossment of conveyance four days at least before the 21st of November, 1901, and the draft was to be left for perusal and approval by the vendor at least seven days before delivery of the engrossment. And lastly, if the purchaser should neglect or fail to comply with any of the above conditions, his deposit money should be forfeited to the vendor, who might with or without notice re-sell the property.

The defendant having repudiated the contract, the plaintiff commenced the present action for specific performance and damages. The defendant resisted the action on the ground of mistake, and alleged that he never agreed to purchase the Hampstead property. He also pleaded that there was no memorandum of the alleged contract sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds.

Kekewich, J., held that there had been a bonâ fide mistake on the part of the defendant, but that the mistake was no answer to an action for specific performance. He also held that the error in the dates did not prevent the contract from being a good memorandum.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant appealed.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and Norman Craig, for the appellant.—In the first place, there was no consensus ad idem, and therefore no binding contract. Secondly, it is impossible to suppose that the defendant could have authorized the auctioneer to sign on his behalf a contract in these terms. There is therefore no memorandum sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. [They were stopped by the court.]

Warrington, K.C., and Frederic Thompson, for the vendor.—Apart from the errors in the dates, the contract is a sufficient memorandum to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, and is one which could have been signed by the auctioneer on behalf of the defendant. The error in the dates is a mere clerical error, and as a matter of fact the correct date appears on the particulars.

COLLINS, M.R.—I think that the point raised by the defendant that the contract bears date the 17th of October, when the sale actually took place on the 18th of November, is sufficient to dispose of this case. The plaintiff cannot succeed in the absence of a contract. The Statute of Frauds requires a contract to be evidenced by some memorandum in writing, and there is no such memorandum here, for there is no contract on the 18th of November, and on the 17th of October, the date mentioned in the contract as the date of sale, there was no sale. The auctioneer could have no authority to sign this contract importing conditions which are applicable to a sale a month earlier than the actual sale. Consequently, the plaintiff has no contract on which he is entitled to sue. There is a supplemental point as to whether the parties were ad idem. I do not think they were, but I will say nothing further with regard to that point as it is not necessary to decide it. The result is that the appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I also agree. I observe that Kekewich, J., in giving judgment held that the wrong date in the contract was not a "substantial error." With that I cannot agree, for the contract imposes substantial conditions on the purchaser. The appeal must be allowed with costs.

Solicitors, Edward Chester; Law & Worssam.

---

From Chan. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Jan. 21, 22.

In re GREENWOOD.
GOODHART v. WOODHEAD. (a.)

Will—Construction—Condition that devisee should take testator's name—Condition precedent—Condition subsequent—Death of devisee in lifetime of tenant for life—Impossibility of performance—Act of God.

A testator devised real estate upon trust for his daughter for life, and after her death for her children; and if she should have no child, then upon trust for his cousin, on condition, nevertheless, that if the testator's wife should be then living she should have the enjoyment of the dwelling-house for the remainder of her then life, and on further condition that he should take and use the testator's name, but subject to the payment of certain legacies. The devisee died in the lifetime of the testator's daughter without ever having taken the testator's name.

Held, on the construction of the will, that the condition was a condition subsequent which was not intended to operate unless and until the devisee actually came into possession of the estate. The performance of the condition having been rendered impossible by act of God, the estate consequently passed discharged from the condition.

Decision of Joyce, J., [1902] 2 Ch. 198, 50 W. R. Dig. 186, reversed.

This was appeal from a decision of Joyce, J. (reported [1902] 2 Ch. 198, 50 W. R. Dig. 186).

The testator, J. N. Greenwood, by his will, dated the 24th of May, 1853, devised his real estate to trustees upon trust for his daughter Jane during her life for her separate use, and after her death upon trust for her children or remoter issue born in her lifetime as she should appoint, and, in default of appointment, upon trust for all her children, or her only child if but one. And if she should have no child, the testator devised his real estate to his cousin, W. A. Newsome, his heirs and assigns, on condition, nevertheless, that in case the testator's wife should be then living she should have the use and enjoyment for the then remainder of her life of the dwelling-house in which the testator then resided, and on further condition, nevertheless, that he take and use the name of Greenwood only, but subject to the payment of certain legacies therein mentioned.

The testator died on the 11th of August, 1853, and his wife was also dead. The testator's daughter Jane was now the wife of William Woodhead. She had had no issue and was now in her fifty-ninth year.

W. A. Newsome died intestate on the 5th of November, 1855, leaving his only son, Colonel W. Newsome, his heir-at-law. Colonel Newsome died on the 26th of July, 1900. The plaintiff was his administrator with the will annexed, and for the purpose of passing his administration accounts it became necessary to ascertain the value of the interest, if any, which Colonel Newsome took in the real estate devised by the will of J. N. Greenwood.

Accordingly the plaintiff took out a summons against the trustees of the will of J. N. Greenwood and Mrs. Woodhead, the testator's heiress-at-law, for a declaration that the plaintiff, as the legal personal representative of Colonel Newsome, was entitled to the real estate devised in trust by the will of the testator in remainder after the death of Mrs. Woodhead without children, subject to the payment of the legacies therein mentioned.

Joyce, J., held that the condition, being one which might be performed by the devisee at any time he pleased, was broken by the death of the devisee without having performed it. He therefore dismissed the summons.

Subsequently it was ascertained that W. A. Newsome had died in a lunatic asylum, into which he had been admitted on the 26th of April, 1855, and that previously to his admission he had suffered from an attack of insanity which was alleged to have commenced in April, 1854.

In these circumstances the case was re-argued before Joyce, J., who, however, adhered to his original judgment.

The plaintiff appealed.

Haldane, K.C., Badcock, K.C., and E. S. Ford, for the appellant.

Neville, K.C., Hughes, K.C., and Clayton, for Mrs. Woodhead.

Leigh Clare, for the trustees of the will.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The following authorities were referred to in the course of the argument: Woodhouse v. Herrick, 3 W. R. 303, 1 K. & J. 352; Lady Langdale v. Briggs, 4 W. R. 703, 8 De G. M. & G. 391; Egerton v. Lord Brownlow, 4 H. L. Cas. 1; Gulliver v. Ashby, 4 Burr. 1929; In re Farrer & Champion, [1887] W. N. 202; Sheppard's Touchstone, 132, 157.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from Joyce, J., on the construction of a will. I need only briefly summarize the point which gives rise to the question from the head-note of the report in the court below, which is, "The testator, by his will dated in 1853, devised his real estate to his daughter for her life, and after her death for her children, and if she should have no children the testator devised his real estate to N. on condition that he should take and use the testator's name only." I refer to the exact words of the condition because I think the whole question turns upon what was the intention of the testator as disclosed by the terms in which he himself has imposed the condition which is the subject of this inquiry, the question being in effect, Was the condition a condition precedent or a condition subsequent, and if a condition subsequent, subsequent to what date? If it was a condition precedent it is admitted on all hands that it has not been performed, and therefore the devisee never obtained the benefit of the devise. If it is a condition subsequent, what on the true construction of the will is the date to which it is subsequent? Now, the wording of the will is this: [His lordship read the material words and stated the facts, and continued:] The question is, whether the devisee, having died within the lifetime of the tenant for life, and not having taken the name of Greenwood, failed to perform the condition, and therefore took nothing under the devise. Now, the learned judge has held, in the first instance with some hesitation, but he has, I think, held the condition to be a condition subsequent, or at all events he has treated the condition as not being a condition precedent. If it was a condition precedent it is conceded that it has not been performed, and that the devisee never took the estate. But treating it as a condition subsequent, the learned judge has nevertheless arrived at the conclusion that it was not performed, and that its performance was not excused by the act of God—namely, the death of the devisee during the lifetime of the tenant for life, his ground being that there was a vested interest in the devisee and that he had it in his power at any time after the estate vested in him in remainder, although not in possession, if he had been so minded to take the name, and that therefore he cannot be said to have been prevented by his own death, as he might have performed it at any time during his own lifetime. Therefore, this being a condition subsequent which it cannot be asserted that he was excused by the act of God from performing, he has failed to perform the condition, and accordingly the estate has gone from him. Now that conclusion depends, in my opinion, entirely upon the construction of the will and the true intention of the testator in creating this condition, and as to that, upon the authorities cited to us, it seems to me clear that even where the condition is one dealing with real estate, if it is so framed in such terms that it is capable of being construed fairly as a condition subsequent and not as a condition precedent, the court ought to construe it as a condition subsequent. Where the intention of the testator, as evidenced by the words used and the disposition he has made, is more consistent with the inference that he did intend the condition to be a condition subsequent and not a condition precedent, then if the words are capable of admitting both constructions the court ought to hold it to be a condition subsequent. Now in this case it seems to me that the words themselves in which the condition is framed point to this, that the time the testator is dealing with is the death of the tenant for life. Then, and not till then, as it appears to me, this condition comes into force, and the testator obviously does not regard it as coming into force till that time. He is dealing first of all with what he calls a condition that the property is to be enjoyed by his wife if living. Strictly speaking that is not a condition at all, but it is material in so far as it points to the death of the tenant for life as the period of time which was present to the mind of the testator, because it is all one sentence, and the time referred to in the first part affecting that which is called a condition as to his wife's enjoyment seems to me to be the same time as that which is dealt with in the subsequent part—namely, the conditions affecting the right of the devisee to take the estate. These are the words, "on condition, nevertheless, that in case my wife shall then be living," clearly showing that the point of time in his mind is the death of the tenant for life, "she shall have the use and enjoyment for the then remainder of her life," and so on, "and on further condition, nevertheless, that he take and use the name of Greenwood only." Now it seems to me that that language points clearly to his taking and using the name as soon as and after he comes into possession and not before. If that be the fair meaning of it, then in my opinion, both according to the words used and the common sense of the thing, his wish is that the person who takes his estate, not as the owner in remainder, but as the owner in possession, shall bear his name. That is the object the testator wishes to carry out, and in my opinion he could not have intended, and it is very unlikely that he did intend, that there should be any obligation or inducement whatever put upon the person to take his name before the occasion arose for taking it—that is, before he became entitled to hold the estate in possession. The devisee is to take and use the name just as he is to take and use the estate. The two things being put together, Joyce, J., has held that it was competent for the devisee to have taken the name before he came into possession. He never did come into possession, but Joyce, J., says that it was competent for him to have taken the name, and that therefore he cannot say he was prevented by the act of God from taking it, because he might have taken it during his life. Now it seems to me, and indeed it was admitted by counsel for the respondent, that if on the fair construction of this will the obligation to perform this condition did not arise until after possession was taken, then it was not ad rem to point to the fact that the devisee had the opportunity to do the act before the occasion for doing it arose. That is not a matter with which we are concerned at all. The obligation to do the act and the immunity from not doing it are both measured by the same standard—namely, what are the limits of the condition; in other words, when does the obligation arise under the condition. If the right conclusion is that the condition is meant to operate only after possession taken, then the excuse for not performing it arises then, and not till then, and it is immaterial to consider whether the devisee could have performed it at an earlier date. The question is, is he excused by the act of God from doing it within the time within which the testator contemplated that he should do it. If the time when the estate falls into possession is the standard, obviously the devisee was incapacitated from performing it, because he had previously died. It seems to me, therefore, that on the true construction of the will this condition was a condition subsequent: that the devisee was prevented from performing it by the act of God, and that therefore the person claiming under him is in a position to retain the estate. On these grounds I do not think that the decision of Joyce, J., can be supported, and in my opinion the appeal should be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I also am of opinion that upon this will the condition, upon which the question the subject of this appeal turns, was a condition subsequent in the truest sense of the term. That is to say, I think it only contemplated Mr. Newsome doing something upon or after the death of the testator's daughter without leaving children. The wording of the condition supports that view and the position in which it is supports that view because it appears amongst a bunch of conditions so called. Whether they were strictly so called or not I need not pause to deal with, because the gift is to Mr. Newsome on the death of the daughter without leaving children on condition that in case the testator's wife shall then be living she shall have the use and enjoyment for the then remainder of her life, and then on further condition that he shall take and use the name of Greenwood only, which to my mind points to something he is then to do. Then it goes on: "And subject to the payment of the following legacies"—again clearly pointing to something he has to do after that time. The position and the wording of the condition to my mind shows that, as I have said, it was strictly speaking a condition subsequent—that is to say, a condition solely intended to refer to and dealing with something that he was to do when he became possessor of the estate. Now I think that is borne out by considering this, what could be the only object and intention of the testator in this case when he wanted Mr. Newsome to take and use the name, except that he contemplated his becoming the owner of the estate? He only wanted him to use the name as owner of the estate. It does not appear to me that the testator had contemplated anything with reference to Mr. Newsome irrespective of the estate or a time when he never could have come into possession of the estate. It seems to me to have in no wise concerned the testator what Mr. Newsome might have done with regard to using or abandoning the name before he came into possession of the estate. I think it was because Mr. Newsome was to come into possession of the estate that he then required him as the possessor of that estate to take and use the name, and as I have said, I think that is borne out by the other considerations in the case. At any rate, to my mind, on the construction of this will, it appears to me that is what the testator meant and has said. I cannot help thinking that a condition of this kind ought to be construed strictly, and construing this condition accordingly, it appears to me that, seeing this condition was one which, under the circumstances, could not have been complied with, the result is that the estate is held free from the condition. I therefore think that this appeal ought to succeed, and that the decision of the learned judge in the court below should be reversed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree, and I have very little to add. Assuming that this is a condition subsequent—not to repeat the language of the clause—it is, as Romer, L.J., has said, in the midst of a series of clauses stating certain things to be done whenever the estate falls into possession—not things to be done before possession was acquired, but things to be done after. Now, if it was a condition subsequent it was subsequent to what? Subsequent, it seems to me, to the actual enjoyment in possession of the estate. There is no obligation whatever upon Mr. Newsome to do anything until after the event, which might never have happened, did happen of the estate becoming an estate in possession, and I doubt very much indeed whether any act done by Mr. Newsome before the estate came into possession would in any way be relevant to the performance of the condition. If, for instance, Mr. Newsome had in the daughter's lifetime taken the name of the testator, and had then abandoned it and survived the death of the daughter some time, and came into possession of the estate, and had done nothing afterwards with regard to the name, as at present advised I do not think the case would have been altered. If that be not so, it seems to me that it is plain that there is a time in which this condition might be complied with—namely, the whole period before the estate fell into possession. If that be the true construction, then in my view the appeal is right, and the judgment of the court below must be reversed.

Solicitors, Robins, Hay, Waters, & Hay; Jaques & Co., for Watts & Sons, Dewsbury.

---

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) June 30; July 1; Dec 6, 12, 1902.

AFLALO v. LAWRENCE & BULLEN (LIMITED). (a.)

Copyright—Literary copyright—Encyclopædia—Contributor and publisher—Employment and payment—Ownership of copyright—Separate publication—Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45), ss. 2, 3, 18.

In a case where an author agrees with publishers to write for payment articles for an encyclopædia to be published by them, and there is no express agreement as to the ownership of the copyright in the articles, it is not to be inferred as a matter of law from the fact of employment and payment that the employment was on the terms that the copyright should belong to the publishers. And such articles are "separately published" within the meaning of the definition of "book" in section 2 of the Copyright Act, 1842.

So held by Romer and Stirling, L.JJ. (dissentiente Vaughan Williams, L.J.)

Held, by Vaughan Williams, L.J., that in the absence of evidence to the contrary the true inference was that the copyright in the articles was to belong to the publisher, and that they were not "separately published."

Sweet v. Benning, 3 W. R. 519, 16 C. B. 459, discussed.

Decision of Joyce, J. (50 W. R. 24, [1902] 1 Ch. 264), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Joyce, J. (reported 50 W. R. 24, [1902] 1 Ch. 264).

In the year 1896 the plaintiff, Frederick George Aflalo, conceived a scheme for the publication of a work called "The Encyclopædia of Sport," and submitted it to the defendants, a firm of publishers, with a view to their undertaking the publishing of it.

The work was to consist of articles, arranged alphabetically, relating to various branches of sport, contributed and signed by persons well known in connection with the various subjects.

The defendants agreed to publish the work, and on the 10th of July, 1896, they entered into an agreement in writing with Mr. Aflalo, providing for the publication of the work at their expense, and for the payment by them to Mr. Aflalo of £500 for his editorial expenses besides reimbursing him the postage expenses, and for the insertion in the preface of a statement that Mr. Aflalo had suggested the scheme.

(a.) Reported by H. W. LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was further agreed that Mr. Aflalo should write without further fee 7,000 words of the special articles and contribute all the unsigned articles that might be required; that the defendants should supply him with an assistant; that he should be entitled to pursue his other literary work so far as it did not interfere with the due performance of his editorial duties, and that should the defendants consider it desirable to discontinue publishing the encyclopædia before Part X. had been completed they would pay Mr. Aflalo £250, provided that the stoppage of the work was not caused by his own action.

The encyclopædia was published in parts, and was ultimately completed in 1899 under the part editorship of Mr. Aflalo, who contributed, in accordance with the agreement, a signed article entitled "Sea Fishing."

Shortly before the date of the above-mentioned agreement Mr. Aflalo had arranged with Mr. Charles Henry Cook, well known as a writer on angling under the pseudonym of "John Bickerdyke," for the latter to contribute signed articles of 5,000 words each to the encyclopædia; and Mr. Cook accordingly contributed three articles which were published in the encyclopædia, entitled respectively "Coarse Fish," "Pike," and "Trout," for which the defendants paid him at a fixed rate of £2 per 1,000 words.

Mr. Aflalo and Mr. Cook were severally registered as proprietors of the copyright of the articles contributed by them; but in 1900 the defendants, without the knowledge or consent of either of them, published an abridged edition of the encyclopædia called "The Young Sportsman," which included the articles contributed by Mr. Aflalo and Mr. Cook.

Mr. Aflalo and Mr. Cook thereupon demanded the discontinuance of the further sale and publication of this book, and compensation for infringement of copyright; and on the defendants refusing they brought this action asking for an injunction to restrain the publication and sale of "The Young Sportsman" and for damages. The defendants contended that as they were the registered proprietors of the copyright of "The Encyclopædia of Sport" the plaintiffs had no copyright in their articles; and they counterclaimed for a declaration to that effect, and for an order expunging from the Book of Registry the plaintiffs' entries of copyright, and for damages.

Joyce, J., held that there was no special circumstance in the nature of the work or the terms of employment leading to the inference that the copyright of the articles in question was intended to be in the publishers, and that it was therefore in the authors.

The defendants appealed.

The appeal was first argued on the 30th of June and the 1st of July, and was further argued, by direction of the court, on the 6th of December on the question whether the plaintiffs had acquired a title by separate publication.

Younger, K.C., and J. L. Gilmour, for the appellants.—In the absence of special circumstances, of which there are none here, when you have a case of employment and payment, the copyright is vested in the publishers, and this is the ordinary inference to be drawn. If the judgment of the court below is right, not only the respondent, but all the other contributors, can deprive the publishers of all rights in their articles, on the publication of which the publishers have expended a large sum. Section 18 of the Copyright Act was intended to deal with cases of employment and payment. If the publishers are held entitled to the copyright the writers of the articles are in no way injured, except that they cannot republish their actual articles, and it is always possible for writers to reserve the copyright when contributing to encyclopædias. No real distinction can be drawn between the literary skill required here and that required in Sweet v. Benning, 3 W. R. 519. 16 C. B. 459. There was no publication in a separate form here. [They also cited or referred to Lamb v. Evans, 41 W. R. 405, [1893] 1 Ch 218; Walter v. Howe, 29 W. R. 776. 17 Ch. D. 708; Barfield v. Nicholson, 2 Sim. & St. 1; Hatton v. Kean, 8 W. R 7, 29 L. J. C P. 20; and Bishop of Hereford v. Griffin, 16 Sim. 190.] The conclusion that the copyright was intended to remain with the author would be utterly unbusiness-like—per Bowen, L.J., in Lamb v. Evans, [1893] 1 Ch., at pp. 227-8. The Pictorial Copyright Act of 1862 confirms our interpretation of section 1 of the older Copyright Act and of Sweet v. Benning.

Hughes, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the respondents.—It is clear that apart from section 18 the copyright is in the writer, and in cases arising on the Dramatic Copyright Act—Shepherd v. Conquest, 4 W. R. 283, 17 C B. 418; Levy v. Rutley, 19 W. R. 976, L. R. 6 C. P. 523; Eaton v. Lake, 36 W. R. 277, 20 Q. B. D. 378—the fact of employment has been held not to affect the question. The author can sue for infringement before separate publication: Johnson v. Newnes, 43 W. R. 572, [1894] 3 Ch. 663. Bishop of Hereford v. Griffin has always been treated as an authority for the proposition that the copyright remains in the writer notwithstanding employment and payment, and it is the only decision in the books on the case of encyclopædias: see also Smith v. Johnson, 12 W. R. 122, 4 Giff. 632. Sweet v. Benning may have been rightly decided on the facts of the case, but some of the observations of Jervis, C.J., and Maule, J., as to the presumption that the copyright is in the publishers, which is said to be raised by employment and payment, go too far, and were not necessary for the decision. In the absence of agreement the copyright remains in the author.

They also cited Moffatt v. Gill, 50 W. R. 528. 86 L. T. Rep. 465, and White v. Geroch, 2 B. & Ald. 298. [ROMER, L.J., referred to Mayhew v. Maxwell, 9 W. R. 118, 1 Joh. & Hem. 312.]

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 18.—The following judgments were delivered:

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., after stating the facts, continued: The judgment of Joyce, J., cannot, in my opinion, be supported unless the plaintiffs have vested in them the copyright in their contributions to the encyclopædia. By section 2 of the Copyright Act of 1842, "copyright" is defined as "the sole and exclusive liberty of printing or otherwise multiplying copies of any subject to which the said word is herein applied," and "book" is defined as meaning and including "any volume, part or division of a volume, pamphlet, sheet of letterpress, sheet of music, map, chart, or plan separately published." And by section 3 the copyright in a book is made to endure for the natural life of the author and a term of seven years from his death, and is declared to be the property of the author and his assigns. In my opinion the plaintiffs do not get the copyright in their articles by virtue of section 3; for nothing is a book unless it is separately published, and I think these articles were not separately published. I think the publication here is the encyclopædia, which was edited by one of the plaintiffs as the paid agent of the publishers. The only other section of the Act which, in my opinion, can give the plaintiffs the copyright is section 18, which is as follows: "Provided also that nothing herein contained shall alter or affect the right of any person who shall have been or who shall be so employed as aforesaid to publish any such his composition in a separate form who by any contract, express or implied, may have reserved or may hereafter reserve to himself such rights, but every author reserving or retaining or having such right shall be entitled to the copyright in such composition when published in a separate form according to this Act, without prejudice to the right of such proprietor, projector, publisher, or conductor as aforesaid." Clearly there is no such reservation in this case. With regard to the question whether the copyright is vested in the appellants, Joyce, J., seems to assume that it is not vested in them unless you can find special circumstances from which the court can infer it. I think, however, that the true result of Sweet v. Benning is that the copyright is to be inferred to belong to the publisher unless there is evidence to the contrary. Jervis, C J., says (16 C. B., at p. 480): "At the close of the argument we intimated an opinion that the plaintiffs had a copyright within the meaning of the 18th section, because it seemed to us—and I believe we all remain of the same opinion—that where the proprietors of a periodical employ a gentleman to write a given article, or series of articles or reports, expressly for the purpose of publication therein, of necessity it is implied that the copyright of the articles so expressly written for such periodical, and paid for by the proprietors and publishers thereof, shall be the property of such proprietors and publishers; otherwise it might be that the author might, the day after his articles has been published by the persons for whom he contracted to write it, republish it in a separate form, or in another serial, and there would be no correspondent benefit to the injured publishers for the payment they had made." These observations are perfectly general, and not based in any way on special circumstances relating to the employment of the reporters in Sweet v. Benning. Then Maule, J., says, at p. 484: "But, though no express words to that effect are stated in this special case, I think that where a man employs another to write an article or to do anything else for him, unless there is something in the surrounding circumstances, or in the course of dealing between the parties, to require a different construction, in the absence of a special agreement to the contrary, it is to be understood that the writing or other thing is produced upon the terms that the copyright therein shall belong to the employer, subject, of course, to the limitation pointed out in the 18th section of the Act." Cresswell, J., at p. 488, says: "Under the circumstances stated in the special case, the copyright in the reports in question clearly vested in the plaintiffs as the proprietors of the work for which they were prepared." And Crowder, J. (at p. 489), says that, "looking to the language of the 18th section and the facts stated in the special case, it seems to me that it was not necessary that there should be any express stipulation as to the terms upon which the reports were to be composed in order to confer the copyright upon the plaintiffs; but that the terms might be inferred from the general nature and character of the employment; and that sitting as we do, with power to draw such inferences as a jury might draw, we may reasonably arrive at the conclusion that the undertaking between the authors of those reports and the proprietors of the work in which they were published was that the latter should have the copyright therein." The whole case seems to me to show that in the absence of evidence to the contrary the court will infer, from the fact of employment and payment, that the copyright is to belong to the employer. No doubt in Walter v. Howe Jessel, M.R., said that the evidence did not show that the proprietor of the newspaper was entitled to the copyright or that the author was not the owner of it; but Sweet v. Benning was not cited, and his judgment is really based on the non-registration of the newspaper. I think also that in Lamb v. Evans the Court of Appeal affirmed Sweet v. Benning and the principle laid down in it. This appears from the judgment of Lindley, L.J., who states, [1893] 1 Ch., at p. 225, the nature of the articles in that case, which were merely the headings to groups of advertisements with translations, and says that the view of Maule, J., in Sweet v. Benning may very safely be acted upon. And Bowen, L J. (at p. 227-8), says that Sweet v. Benning would be an authority if necessary for the proposition that the terms may be gathered from the transactions. Then he says that you may collect the terms from the nature of the business itself; "and it seems to me impossible, as a matter of business, to suppose that these headings were composed and furnished to the plaintiff upon any other terms than that he was to have the copyright in them, because otherwise those who also composed them and furnished them to the plaintiff might themselves have published them and defeated his object." If in the case of a book so composed and published employment and payment afford primâ facie evidence that as between the publisher and the various authors employed by him to write the articles, the publisher will have whatever property the law will give him in the book, I think the appellants ought to succeed; for I cannot find in the written agreement, or in any of the circumstances of the case, or in the nature of the encyclopædia and articles, anything whatever to negative this presumption. On the contrary, one cannot suppose, as a matter of business, that the publishers employed the writers of the articles on such terms that the writers could print, publish, and sell these very articles the day after the encyclopædia was published. I decline to draw the inference that the writers were employed on the basis that they should licence the publishers to issue the first publication of the articles; and I consider that the inference from the nature of the employment arises equally whether the contract is oral or contained in a written document, and is not an addition to the contract but an inference from it, just as the indemnity of the agent by the principal is an inference from a written contract of agency. I think we cannot uphold the judgment of Joyce, J, without overruling Sweet v. Benning; and I think we ought not to do this after such a lapse of time, and after it has been approved in Lamb v. Evans, even if we thought it wrong, and for myself I think it was quite right. In addition to the authorities bearing directly upon the question I may refer to Shepherd v. Conquest, where Jervis, C.J., in my opinion, inclines to the view that the employer may become the owner of the copyright ab initio. I think the principle laid down by Leach, V.C., in Barfield v. Nicholson, that the person who forms the plan and embarks in the speculation and employs various persons to compose different parts of the work is the author and proprietor, is clearly recognized by section 18, and that we ought to decide in favour of this principle unless we are prepared to hold that the conditions of section 18 cannot be satisfied without express terms.

ROMER, L.J.—I think this appeal fails. The respondents are admittedly the writers of the articles in question and are primâ facie entitled to the ordinary rights of authors; and if the appellants say that they have acquired some of the author's rights so as to entitle them to publish the articles separately the onus of proving this lies on them. Under section 18 they must establish three things: (1) Employment by them of the respondents to compose the articles, (2) that the articles were composed on the terms that the copyright should belong to the appellants, and (3) that the latter paid for the articles. I think it cannot rightly be said that in every case of an article written for an encyclopædia mere proof by the proprietor of the encyclopædia of employment and payment of the writer of the article primâ facie gives the copyright to the proprietor. The Legislature has expressly said that not only must there be employment and payment, but it must be established that the employment was on the terms that the copyright should belong to the proprietor. Those terms cannot therefore of necessity be implied from the fact of employment and payment; nor ought they to be implied in every case where the author does not prove they were not part of the contract. I think that proof by the proprietor of employment and payment does not as a matter of law throw on the author the onus of proving that they were not part of the contract; for the section is dealing with a class of books and periodicals as to which the payment by the employer to the author may well be for the right of separate publication only, and not for the copyright. It may well be worth the proprietor's while to employ and pay a writer of an article on the terms that the writer retains the copyright, since the proprietor gets the benefit he chiefly desires by being able to publish the article; and though no doubt the term that the copyright shall belong to the proprietor may be inferred in his favour, even though not expressly mentioned, from the special circumstances of the case, yet there must be special circumstances to justify the inference. Therefore I think that the observations of Jervis, C.J., and Maule, J., in Sweet v. Benning go too far, unless they are construed in reference to some particular circumstances of that case; and the observations of Shadwell, V.C., in Brown v. Cooke, 16 L. J. Ch. 140, and of Jessel, M.R., in Walter v. Howe fortify me in this opinion. I think that in this case there are no special circumstances to justify the inference; certainly not in the case of Mr. Cook, though that of Mr. Aflalo is not so clear. But in his case there is the written contract between him and the proprietors of the encyclopædia purporting to set forth the exact terms of his employment and containing no term that the copyright in his articles shall belong to the proprietors; and I think under the circumstances that such a term ought not to be inferred as a matter of fact, while I have already pointed out why I think that it cannot be inferred as a matter of law. With regard to the further point taken by the defendants, which formed the subject of the argument on the rehearing, I need only say that I adhere to the view which I took in Johnson v. Newnes, and hold that the articles in question were "separately published" within the definition of "book" in section 2 of the Act. With regard to the proviso at the end of section 18, I think it deals with the case of an author who has reserved or retained a right of separate publication, which seems to me to presume that he has not the ordinary copyright, and to be addressed only to the case where the author, under the first part of the section, has parted with his copyright. But even if the proviso has a larger operation, it clearly implies that the author alone is entitled to the right of separate publication; and the plaintiffs are therefore entitled to the injunction granted by Joyce, J.

STIRLING, L.J.—The first question in the action is whether the defendants are or are not entitled to the copyright in four separate articles signed by the plaintiffs respectively, and contributed to the "Encyclopædia of Sport" published by the defendants. The answer to the question depends on section 18 of the Copyright Act, 1842; and under it the defendants, in order to make out their title, must establish three things—(1) That they employed the plaintiffs respectively to compose the respective articles for publication in or as part of the encyclopædia; (2) that the articles respectively were composed under such employment, on the terms that the copyright therein should belong to the defendants; and (3) that such articles have been paid for by the defendants. There is no dispute that the defendants have proved the existence of the first and third of these facts, but there is a great contest as to whether or not they have established the second. Now the agreements between the plaintiffs and the defendants have been reduced to writing; and neither agreement contains any express stipulation as to the proprietorship of the copyright in the articles. It has, however, been decided in two cases, Sweet v. Benning and Lamb v. Evans, that such stipulations need not be express, but may be inferred; and although in those cases the agreements were verbal only, it is contended that the like inference ought to be drawn in the present case. In Sweet v. Benning the learned judges who took part in the decision give the reasons for it in somewhat different terms. Crowder, J., appears to me to have arrived at his conclusion as to the terms on which the reports then in question were composed as an inference of fact from the general nature and character of the employment. I also think that each of the learned judges who constituted the Court of Appeal in Lamb v. Evans drew a similar inference from the nature of the employment and the surrounding circumstances of the case. I admit that Jervis, J., and Maule, J., in Sweet v. Benning used language which is susceptible of the interpretation that the inference drawn by them was one of law and not of fact; but I am not sure that they really meant this; if they did, I can only say, with all the deference which is justly due, and which I fully entertain, to such high authorities, that I am unable to see that it is in accordance with a sound construction of an Act of Parliament which requires three conditions to be satisfied in order that the copyright may belong to the publisher, to hold that the existence of one of the three is to be inferred as a matter of law from that of the other two. I think, therefore, that the inference which has to be drawn is one of fact and not of law. If, in the present case, we had to deal with verbal contracts, I should feel great difficulty in drawing an inference of fact similar to that which was drawn in Sweet v. Benning and Lamb v. Evans. The plaintiff Cook, for example, is a writer of great reputation on the subjects of the articles composed by him; he received for each what certainly appears the moderate sum of £10. So far as I can see, such an expenditure on the part of the publisher might well be made to secure the increase of reputation likely to accrue to the encyclopædia by reason of its containing articles by a writer of such eminence, even though the copyright should remain vested in him. The inference appears to me to be still more difficult to draw where, as here, the agreements between the plaintiffs and defendants have been reduced to writing. The written documents on the face of them appear to contain the whole of the agreements between the parties, and there is no evidence that they were intended to express only part of them. In these circumstances the presumption is that the writings contain everything material which has been agreed on; and evidence of surrounding circumstances is only admissible for the purpose of construing them. When the documents are construed in the light of surrounding circumstances it does not appear to me that any stipulation as to proprietorship of the copyright can be spelt out of either of them. Incidents as to which a written contract is silent may, no doubt, be annexed either by virtue of some usage, or by the general law—as, for example, the obligations as to title imported into a contract for the sale of land, and the warranty of seaworthiness implied in a policy of marine insurance. In the present case there is no evidence of any usage, and, as I have already said, it is not, in my judgment, in accordance with the provisions of section 18 of the Copyright Act, 1842, to hold that one of three necessary conditions for the existence of the proprietorship of the copyright can, as a matter of law, be inferred simply from the existence of the other two. If such an inference were drawn in this case it seems to me that we should be using the surrounding circumstances, not to construe the documents, but to add to them.

The second question is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to any copyright or right of action which would enable them to maintain this action. It is contended that the plaintiffs are entitled to the copyright in these articles by virtue of section 3 of the Copyright Act, 1842, which provides "that the copyright in every book which shall after the passing of this Act be published in the lifetime of its author shall endure" for the period therein mentioned "and shall be the property of such author and his assigns." It is said that none of these articles constitutes "a book," but that each of them is only part of a book. In White v. Geroch a precisely similar question arose under the statute 54 Geo. 3, c. 156 (repealed by the Copyright Act, 1842), which provided that from and after the passing of the Act the author of any book or books which should thereafter be composed, and be printed and published, and his assignee or assigns should have the sole liberty of printing and reprinting such book or books for the time mentioned. The plaintiff there sued in respect of the infringement of the copyright in a musical composition which formed a single sheet of a book containing a large number of other musical pieces not composed by the plaintiff. It was held by the Court of King's Bench that he was entitled to maintain the action. Abbott, C.J., said: "I am of opinion that any composition, whether large or small, is a book within the meaning of this Act of Parliament. It is perfectly clear that it would be a book if printed as a separate and distinct work; and if so, it seems to me that it does not lose that character by being found in company with other compositions." These observations apply to the signed articles of which the plaintiffs claim the copyright. It is said, however, that this decision does not apply to the Act of 1842, because section 2 provides "that in the construction of this Act the word 'book' shall be construed to mean and include every volume, part or division of a volume, pamphlet, sheet of letterpress, sheet of music, map, chart, or plan separately published"; and it is said that none of these articles constitute a volume, or a part or division of a volume, separately published. In my judgment this argument ought not to prevail. The object of the Act of 1842, as expressed in the preamble, was "to afford greater encouragement to the production of literary works of lasting benefit to the world"; and the provisions of the statute show that this object was intended to be effected by conferring greater benefits on authors than were enjoyed by them under the preceding statutes. It could not have been the intention of the Legislature, therefore, to take away from authors any benefit which they possessed before, and the definition clause ought not to be read so as to produce such an effect, unless its language is susceptible of no other meaning, and, in my opinion, the true meaning and effect of that language is not to cut down but to extend the meaning of the word "book." Even if this were not so, I should still be of the opinion that the plaintiffs' signed articles, being distinguished from the rest of the volumes in which they are found, were separately published within the meaning of section 2. I think, therefore, that under section 3 the plaintiffs acquired copyright in these articles subject to the provisions of section 18, if and so far as that section affects the rights of the plaintiffs. This conclusion agrees with the opinion expressed by Shadwell, V.C., in Bishop of Hereford v. Griffin, by Stuart, V.C., in Smith v. Johnson, and Romer, L.J., when a judge of first instance, in Johnson v. Newnes.

There remains the question whether there is anything in section 18 to affect the rights of the plaintiffs. It was suggested that the words at the close of the section—"Every author reserving, retaining, or having such right" (that is, a right of publishing his composition in a separate form) "shall be entitled to the copyright in such composition when published in a separate form, according to this Act, without prejudice to the right of such proprietor, projector, publisher, or conductor as aforesaid"—might be held to impose on the plaintiffs the obligation of publishing their articles in a separate form in order to acquire the copyright. I am not, however, prepared to differ from the construction placed on these words by Romer, L.J., in Johnson v. Newnes—viz., that they only refer to a case where the author has parted in the first instance with the copyright to the proprietor of the work in which it appears. In any case, I should be of opinion that, even if the plaintiffs were not yet entitled to the copyright in these articles, they would be entitled to restrain the defendants from publishing them separately, on similar grounds to those given by Lord Hatherley, when Vice-Chancellor, in Mayhew v. Maxwell. Although I regret that Vaughan Williams, L.J., differs, and I necessarily feel some distrust as to the conclusion at which I have arrived, I think that the appeal fails, and ought to be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Dixon, Elkin, & Dixon; Field, Roscoe, & Co.

---

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — Dec. 5.

In re BROWNE'S POLICY. (a.)
BROWNE v. BROWNE.

Married Woman—Insurance policy—"For the benefit of his wife and children"—Second wife—Children of second marriage—Participation—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 11.

Where a man effects an insurance policy on his own life "for the benefit of his wife and children," his surviving wife (if any), whether his then living wife or one he may have married after the date of the policy, and his surviving children, whether by his then living wife or any after-taken one, are entitled to participate in the policy moneys.

On the 31st of December, 1891, George Henry Browne effected an insurance on his own life "for the benefit of his wife and children" under the powers conferred by section 11 of the Married

(a.) Reported by C. W. MEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Women's Property Act, 1882. At the date of the policy he had a wife living and children of that marriage. She died in 1894. In 1895 G. H. Browne married the defendant, Florence Browne, by whom he also had children. G. H. Browne died intestate, leaving his second wife, the defendant Florence, and children of both marriages surviving him. His widow took out letters of administration to his estate.

A summons was taken out by the children of the first marriage against the widow and the child of the second marriage to determine on the construction of the policy whether the respondents were entitled to any and what share of the policy moneys.

The summons was argued in chambers, but the written judgment was delivered in court.

J. Gatey, for the children of the first marriage.

J. Austen Cartmell, for the widow, relied on In re Seyton, Seyton v. Satterthwaite, 35 W. R. 373, 34 Ch. D. 511, and In re Davies' Policy Trusts, [1892] 1 Ch. 90, 40 W. R. Dig. 141, as showing that the widow and children took as joint tenants.

Hon. Frank Russell, for the child of the second marriage.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 5.—KEKEWICH, J.—This case was argued in chambers, but having reason to believe that the points in issue are likely to be, if they have not already been, raised in other cases, I have deemed it right to give my judgment in court. Mr. George Henry Brown, on the 31st of December, 1891, effected a policy of assurance on his own life under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 11, for the benefit of his wife and children. At that date he had a wife living, and there were also living children of his by her. That wife died, and he subsequently married the defendant Florence Browne, by whom also he had children. Florence Browne survived him, and so did children of each marriage. The questions are, first, whether Florence Browne takes any interest under the policy; and second, whether the children entitled to take are the children of one marriage exclusive of the children of the other, or whether children of either marriage stand on the same footing. It is settled that all parties interested under a policy in this form take as joint tenants. Regarding the case apart from the language of the Married Woman's Property Act, 1882, one is met by the presumption, which is rather one of common parlance and common sense than of law, though it has been recognized by legal authority, that a married man speaking of his wife intends his wife at that time and does not contemplate one whom he may marry after her death, and the observation holds good as to the allusions by another to a given man's wife. But in construing an instrument intended to make provision for a wife after the husband's death this seems to lose weight, and is countervailed by the consideration that he in all probability intended to provide for her who survived him, and for that reason stood in need of the provision. A similar line of reasoning points to the conclusion that he intended to benefit all the children, which is strengthened by the reflection that he cannot reasonably be supposed to have intended to benefit only the children living at the date of the policy to the exclusion of afterborn children by the then existing wife. The claim of the children by the second wife to share in the policy moneys is, I think, unanswerable, and if they are let in, I fail to see any good reason for excluding their mother. Turning to the Act, I find little assistance in the language used, which really throws me back on the proper construction of the policy. The Act says such a policy shall create "a trust in favour of the objects therein named." No one is in the strict sense named in this policy, and the word is not happily used. There is no reason why the trust should not include objects as yet unascertained, and of course the ordinary marriage settlement creates a trust of that character. Therefore what the Act means is that there is a trust created by the policy in favour of the persons designated thereby, and for such interests as are there stated according to the true construction of the instrument. I hold that by his wife and children the settlor intended his surviving wife (if any) and his surviving children whether by his then living or any after-taken wife. I made the order in chambers for the appointment of a trustee and the payment of costs out of the policy moneys. This will be embodied in an order to be dated the 5th of December declaring the construction of the policy according to this judgment.

Solicitors, Patersons, Snow, Bloxam, & Kinder, for J. G. Bishop, Brynmawr, Brecon.

---

K. B. Div. (Kennedy, J.) — Jan. 24.

MATVEIEFF & CO. v. CROSSFIELD. (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Custom at Lloyd's—Periodical settlement between broker and underwriter—Bankruptcy of broker—Liability of underwriter.

A policy of insurance was effected on a cargo of tea by an insurance broker on behalf of the plaintiff, and the defendant, a member of Lloyd's, subscribed the said policy. In accordance with a custom at Lloyd's, the broker and the defendant had a running account which was periodically settled, whereby premiums due to the defendant were set off as against losses due to the broker.

A loss under the said policy was thus settled in an account.

The broker, before paying the plaintiff the sum so due, became bankrupt, and the plaintiff sued the defendant.

Held, that the plaintiff was not bound by the custom unless he knew of its existence, and that it lay on the defendant to prove that the plaintiff knew of the custom; and that Sweeting v. Pearce, 9 W. R. 343, was not affected by Robinson v. Mollett, L. R. 7 H. L. 802, 24 W. R. Dig. 222.

Action tried in the Commercial Court.

A policy of marine insurance was effected by insurance brokers, on behalf of the plaintiffs, on a cargo of tea.

The said policy was partly underwritten by the defendant, who was a member of Lloyd's.

The insurance brokers and the underwriter had a running account which they were in the habit of periodically settling, the underwriter setting off premiums due to him against losses due by him to the brokers on policies effected by the brokers.

During the currency of the policy the tea was totally lost by perils insured against.

The brokers settled their account with the defendant, and in that account the loss was credited to the brokers. The brokers failed to pay the sum so due to the plaintiffs and became bankrupt, whereupon the plaintiffs sued the underwriter.

The defendant set up a custom of Lloyd's whereby insurance brokers and underwriters mutually settled losses in respect of policies and premiums due upon policies effected by the insurance brokers with the underwriters, and alleged that the plaintiffs had knowledge of the custom. He further contended that even if the plaintiffs did not know of the custom, they were bound by it, for the employment of the broker to effect a policy at Lloyd's was sufficient to bind the assured by its custom. The defendant also contended that the case of Sweeting v. Pearce, 9 W. R. 343, was no longer law since the decision of Robinson v. Mollett, L. R. 7 H. L. 802, 24 W. R. Dig. 222.

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs admitted that such a custom existed, but denied that they knew of its existence.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Lochnis, for the plaintiffs.

Scrutton, K.C., and Mackinnon, for the defendant.

KENNEDY, J.—I find as a fact that the plaintiffs did not know of the custom, and I hold that it lies on the defendant to prove that the plaintiffs knew of its existence. In my opinion Sweeting v. Pearce is not affected by Robinson v. Mollett.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Walton, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

Solicitors for the defendant, Thomas Cooper & Co.

---

K. B. Div. (Wright, J.) — Jan. 22, 23.

COLUMBUS CO. (LIMITED) v. CLOWES. (a.)

Contract — Damages — Negligence — Plans negligently drawn by architect.

The plaintiffs, lessees of a piece of land, intending to erect a factory thereon, employed the defendant, an architect, to prepare plans for the building. The architect, acting on unauthorized and incorrect information as to the dimensions of the building site, drew up his plans accordingly, and neglected to measure the site himself. The plaintiffs paid the defendant for the plans, believing them to be correct, but owing to financial difficulties were unable to proceed with the building operations, and eventually sold their interest in the site, when it was discovered that the plans were incorrect. The plaintiffs thereupon sued the defendant, claiming the return of the money paid as having been paid upon a consideration which had wholly failed, or, in the alternative, damages for negligence.

Held, that the consideration had not wholly failed, but that the plaintiffs were entitled to nominal damages in respect of the defendant's negligence.

Action tried by Wright, J., without a jury.

The plaintiffs, the lessees of a piece of land, employed the defendant, an architect, to prepare plans and specifications for certain buildings to be erected on such land, and to engage a quantity surveyor to take out the quantities from those plans.

The defendant, acting on information given him by some unauthorized person as to the dimensions of the piece of land, which information was incorrect, as it represented the dimensions to be somewhat less than was actually the case, did not measure the site himself, but prepared plans and specifications in accordance with such information, and employed a quantity surveyor to take out the quantities from these plans.

The plaintiffs thereupon, in the belief that the plans and quantities were correct, paid both the defendant and the quantity surveyor £200 each for the work respectively done by them.

Owing to financial difficulties the plaintiffs were unable to erect the intended buildings. They subsequently sold their lease, when it was discovered that the plans and quantities were not correct, as they did not cover the whole of the building site. Thereupon the plaintiffs brought the present action against the defendant for the return of the money paid as having been paid upon a consideration which had wholly failed, or, in the alternative, for damages for negligence.

At the trial evidence was given that the defendant had made borings on the land in question in order to ascertain how deep it would be necessary to put the foundations in; and the quantity surveyor proved that the difference in the quantities which he had taken out from the original plans and the quantities which would be necessary in the case of plans covering the whole of the piece of land would be represented by about £40.

Bray, K.C. (F. P. M. Schiller with him), for the plaintiffs.—There was a total failure of the consideration, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the money they paid for the plans in ignorance of the fact that they were incorrect: Milnes v. Duncan, 6 B. & C. 671. In Monneypenny v. Hartland and Others, 1 C. & P. 352, it was laid down that if a surveyor makes an estimate which turns out to be incorrect to a considerable amount through his omitting to examine the ground for the foundation of the work, he is not entitled to recover anything for his plans, specifications, or estimates made for that work. In the alternative the plaintiffs are entitled to recover damages in respect of the money they have paid for the plans which are now useless.

Gore-Browne, K.C. (A. G. McIntyre with him), for the defendant.—There has been no total failure of consideration. The defendant is entitled to be paid for the work he has actually done. The plans could have been altered so as to make them apply to the actual dimensions of the building site, and therefore they are not worthless. Even if it is assumed that the defendant acted negligently in not himself measuring the site, yet it has not been shown that the plaintiffs have suffered any real damage, for even if the plans had been accurate, they have never been in a position to make use of them.

Bray, K.C., in reply.—The plaintiffs are entitled to the amount they paid for the plans as if they had been correct. The fact that they never used the plans is immaterial.

He cited Jones v. Just, 16 W. R. 643, L. R. 3 Q. B. 197.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 23.—WRIGHT, J.—This is a singular case and is not, as far as I can ascertain, covered by any authority. The plaintiffs employed the defendant, an architect, to prepare plans for a factory and offices to be erected on a piece of land of which they, the plaintiffs, were lessees. The defendant was incorrectly informed by some person who had no authority from the plaintiffs to give any information to the defendant that the site on which the buildings were to be erected was of certain dimensions. The defendant, assuming this information to be correct, drew his plans on that assumption, and neither measured nor surveyed the site himself. It has not been contended on behalf of the defendant that he was right in so acting, and it was admitted that it was his duty to measure and survey the site before drawing up his plans. The consequence of this mistake was that the plaintiffs paid the defendant for plans which were in fact incorrect; and they contend that they are entitled to recover the money which they have paid for the plans because the plans are worthless, and that there has therefore been a total failure of consideration. Alternatively they contend that they are entitled to the damages which they have sustained owing to the negligence of the defendant.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I have come to the conclusion that there was not a complete failure of consideration. In my opinion the design of the plans is to some extent available for a site of the real size, for I think upon the evidence in this case that a small addition to the quantities which have been taken out in accordance with the plans is all that is necessary in case of a building of the proper size. A good deal has been done which is really of much the same value as if the plans had been correct. I think, however, it is clear that the plaintiffs are entitled to some damages, for it has been proved that the defendant did act negligently. In order to arrive at what those damages should be it is necessary to divide the case. As regards the borings and other work carried out by the defendant the plaintiffs got, I think, full value. As regards the plans there is no evidence before me that, whether correct or not, they have any value in themselves. It seems, therefore, to me, that the most that the plaintiffs can get is the reasonable cost of making the plans good. But then there arises this difficulty. The defendant, if he had made them good, would have been bound to do so without charging anything. If, however, the plaintiffs had called in another architect he would in all probability have insisted on making entirely new plans and have refused to make any use of the original plans. Now would that have been reasonable? I think not. A plaintiff who has suffered damages must act reasonably and not incur unnecessary expenses. That is one of the first principles of the law as to damages. To me it seems perfectly clear that the plaintiffs have not suffered any real damage, as owing to their financial position they were never able to make use of the plans. Therefore I think they are only entitled to nominal damages.

Then we come to the other part of the case—namely, the question as to quantities. That question rests on a different basis. Quantities were necessary in order to enable the plaintiffs to obtain tenders for the carrying out of the work, and I therefore think the plaintiffs are entitled to the cost of adapting them to the plans which would be necessary in the case of a building to cover the larger site. It has been shown in evidence that the cost of so doing would amount to about £40.

I therefore give judgment for the plaintiffs for £40 in respect of the quantities, and forty shillings in respect of the plans.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Jacobs & Joseph.

Solicitors for defendant, Loughborough, Gedge, Nisbet, & Drew.

---

Privy Council.

(From the Supreme Court of Victoria.)

July 9.

BANK OF NEW SOUTH WALES v. GOULBURN VALLEY BUTTER FACTORY CO (a.)

Banker — Customer — Transfer from one account to another—Trust—Notice—Inquiry—Suspicion.

In the absence of circumstances which disclose a trust a banker is entitled to set off what is due to a customer on one account against what is due from him on another account, although the moneys due to him may in fact belong to other persons.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A managing director of a company who was the holder of all the shares of the company carried on a similar business to that of the company on his own account, and the bankers were the same. It was known that his intention was to work the two businesses together. On three occasions he transferred large sums by cheque from the company's account to his own, and this was done in breach of his duty as a director.

Held, that, as under the circumstances there was no notice to the bank of any irregularity, or anything which should lead to an investigation or inquiry, the bank were not liable to refund to the company the sums transferred.

The whole circumstances are given in their lordships judgment.

Haldane, K.C., E. F. Mitchell (of the Colonial bar) and J. K. Young for the appellants.

Cohen, K.C., and Montague Lush, K.C., for the respondents.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords MACNAGHTEN, DAVEY, ROBERTSON, LINDLEY, Sir FORD NORTH, and Sir ARTHUR WILSON), was delivered by Lord DAVEY.—This is an appeal from an order of the full court of the Supreme Court of the State of Victoria, dated the 11th of October, 1900, reversing the judgment of the primary judge, Hodges, J., of the previous 4th of June, in an action in which the respondent company was plaintiff, and the appellant, the Bank of New South Wales, was defendant. The object of the action (so far as material) was to recover from the bank three sums of £1,022, £668, and £619 2s. 10d., which it was alleged had been improperly transferred from the respondent company's account at the bank to the account of one Alexander Lindsay Ballantyne, and so lost to the company.

The company was incorporated in October, 1895, under the Companies Act, 1890, of the State of Victoria with a capital of £1,200 divided into forty-eight shares. The principal object of the company was to carry on the business of a creamery and butter factory and deal in butter and other similar products, and it was empowered by its memorandum of association to carry on its business either singly or in connection with any other corporation, companies, firms, or persons. The articles provided for the appointment of a managing director, and the directors were empowered to delegate to the managing director for the time being such of their powers and authorities as the directors should think fit.

In and for some years prior to June, 1898, Alexander Lindsay Ballantyne was carrying on business in Melbourne as a dairy farm produce merchant, and kept his banking account at the Flinders-street branch of the appellant bank. He was apparently in good credit and had been allowed to overdraw his account from time to time to the extent of about £4,000 against the security of bills for collection and boxes of butter.

In the month of May, 1898, Ballantyne arranged for the purchase of all the shares in the company with a view to the amalgamation of his own and the company's businesses. This arrangement was effected by two documents both dated the 3rd of June, 1898, and pursuant thereto all the shares were transferred to Ballantyne or his nominees, and Ballantyne and two of his nominees were elected directors. Ballantyne was elected chairman of the board, and on the 6th of June, 1898, he was appointed managing director of the company.

Ballantyne informed Mr. Earle, the manager of the Flinders-street branch of the bank, of his purchase of the shares. And on some day between the 31st of May and the 9th of June he called on Earle. What then took place is the stated by Earle, whom the courts below treated as an honest and credible witness: "He asked me if I had any objection to his bringing the account of the Goulburn Valley Butter Co. from the Royal Bank to my bank. I said that I had no objection, and asked him if he was going to close up his own account. He said that he was not going to close it up, and I asked him why he did not keep one account for the whole business. He said that he wished to keep his old connection together, and thought that some of his old customers would deal with A. L. Ballantyne, but would not deal with the Goulburn Valley Butter Co., and for that reason he would buy produce from his old customers in the name of A. L. Ballantyne and pay them with A. L. Ballantyne's cheque, but that the goods so bought would go into the Goulburn Valley Butter Co.'s works to be made up by them, sold by the company, and the proceeds of the sale paid into the company's account, and therefore the two accounts would require to be adjusted, and for that purpose he said that he would leave me two cheques signed in blank—one by the Goulburn Valley Butter Co., and one by himself, and I was to use these cheques as I thought fit for adjustment purposes."

Ballantyne's account of the interview was as follows:

"Q. Anything else done the same day?—A. I said to Mr. Earle that as I had undertaken to pay the company's debts—about £900, roughly speaking, within a fortnight my account might be overdrawn, and that I would give him the company's cheque to hold in blank and one of my own cheques to adjust from time to time as occasion might arise. The company had not any assets and were not able to pay the liabilities as they became due.

"Q. Was anything said about goods?—A. I said I would be supplying the company with goods myself during the whole of June, and that would be a reason for my account being bigger.

"Q. Did you explain to him what goods?—A. I told him I was going to amalgamate the two businesses together, and that with the idea of holding the goodwill of both my own business and the company's business I would draw cheques on both accounts—eventually I purposed trading under the name of the Goulburn Co. altogether, so as to retain all the business I could."

On the 9th of June an account was opened in the name of the company at the Flinders-street branch of the bank, and two cheques, one signed by Ballantyne personally and one signed by him as managing director for the company, but both undated and blank in amount, were handed to Earle. At this date Ballantyne's account was overdrawn to the extent of £667 15s. against security. Some point was made of this in the court below, but their lordships do not attach any importance to it because it is clear that, applying the principle of Clayton's case, 1 Mer. 572, the balance to his debit had run off before the 5th of September. Between the 9th of June and the 5th of September both accounts were operated on by payment in of sums to credit and the drawing of cheques upon them.

On the 5th of September, 1898, Ballantyne's account was overdrawn to the extent of £1,354 15s. 10d. against security amounting to £335 showing a net debit of £1,019 15s. 10d., while the company's account was in credit to the extent of £430 1s. 7d., and security was held by the bank amounting to £652, showing a net credit of £1,082 1s. 7d. On that date Ballantyne called at the bank and Earle mentioned to him the state of the accounts. Ballantyne then suggested that the accounts should be adjusted by making a transfer from the company's account, and by his direction the company's blank cheque was filled up with the sum of £1,022, and dated the 5th of September, 1898, and it was initialled by Ballantyne. The amount of the cheque was on the same day debited to the company and credited to Ballantyne's account. This is the first sum claimed in the action.

On the 30th of September, 1898, a similar transaction took place. Another blank cheque of the company which had been given to Earle in place of the previous one was filled up by Ballantyne's directions with the sum of £668 and initialled by him. The amount was credited to Ballantyne's account, which was then overdrawn to the amount of £667 4s. 1d. This is the second amount in question.

On the 5th of November, 1898, a cheque of that date of the company for £619 2s. 10d. was paid over the counter to the credit of Ballantyne's account in the ordinary way. At that date Ballantyne's account was overdrawn to the extent of £619 2s. 10d. against security amounting to £228. This is the third and last sum claimed.

To complete the story, it appears that on the 25th of November, 1898, Ballantyne's account was in credit and the company's account was overdrawn. Earle, without any communication with Ballantyne, filled up his blank cheque in favour of the company with the amount of £231 2s. 8d., and placed it to the credit of the company's account. This has not been objected to.

On the 18th of January, 1899, the company went into liquidation, and in the following March Ballantyne's estate was placed under sequestration. Earle stated in his evidence that he had no suspicion of Ballantyne's financial difficulties until December, 1898, and no attempt was made to fix him with earlier notice.

It should be mentioned as the court below attached some importance to it that in July, 1898, Ballantyne sold four of the company's shares to a Mr. Stone, and another share to a Mr. Shingler, who continued to hold them until the liquidation. In the view which their lordships take of the transactions this circumstance does not, however, appear to them material.

The respondent's case as originally pleaded was in effect that the above-mentioned sums were paid to the appellant bank in breach of Ballantyne's duty as managing director for the purpose of discharging his private indebtedness to the bank, and that the bank had notice thereof, but in the course of the trial the respondent obtained leave to amend and set up the case that the transactions in question were ultra vires of the company. The primary judge found that the bank had acted in good faith and without notice of any irregularity and breach of trust on the part of Ballantyne, and that the transactions were not ultra vires of the company. The full court held that the transaction entered into, if carried out, would have been ultra vires, and that it was ultra vires as carried out, whatever agreement was entered into.

It is a little difficult to see what it exactly was that is said to have been ultra vires of the company. Ballantyne's proposal to work his own business in connection with that of the company as disclosed by him to Earle was certainly not ultra vires. Nor was the giving of blank cheques for the purpose of adjusting the two banking accounts in itself ultra vires. It is not a prudent or very businesslike act of a manager of a company or anybody else to entrust another with a blank cheque, but no liability is incurred until the cheque is made use of and the fact and extent of liability will then depend on the circumstances of the case. If Earle had taken upon himself to fill up a blank cheque on the company's account he would very likely have imposed upon the bank the obligation of showing that the company was at that date indebted to Ballantyne in the amount. But he did not do this. Both on the 5th of September and the 30th of September the cheque was filled up under Ballantyne's direction and with an amount authorized by him on behalf of the company. The transaction therefore was precisely the same as if the company's cheque for the amount in favour of Ballantyne had been handed to the bank with directions to place the amount to Ballantyne's account. This was in fact the form of the third transaction in question.

The learned counsel for the respondent admitted that if the company was indebted to Ballantyne at the respective dates of the three cheques in the amounts for which they were drawn no question could be raised. The question therefore is narrowed to this: whether there was any duty on the part of the bank or its manager to inquire into the state of the account between Ballantyne and the company. There is no evidence that Earle knew that the company was not indebted to Ballantyne or that the latter was not justified in filling up the cheques for the amounts they bear, and Earle states in his evidence that his belief was that any transfer Ballantyne made was simply transferring money that the company was owing to him. The course of business as described to Earle would necessarily result in cross accounts between Ballantyne and the company, and probably in the latter becoming indebted to Ballantyne, and indeed there would be no objection in the company making advances to Ballantyne to enable him to meet his engagements for butter on their account. The law is well settled that in the absence of notice of fraud or irregularity a banker is bound to honour his customer's cheque: Gray v. Johnstone, 16 W. R. 842, L. R. 3 H. L. 1; Thomson v. Clydesdale Bank, [1893] A. C. 282, 41 W. R. Dig. 9; and is entitled to set off what is due to a customer on one account against what is due from him on another account, although the moneys due to him may in fact belong to other persons: The Union Bank of Australia v. Murray-Aynsley, [1898] A. C. 693, 47 W. R. Dig. 9. On the other hand, a banker is not justified of his own motion in transferring a balance from what he knows to be a trust account of his customer to the same customer's private account: Ex parte Kingston, In re Gross, 19 W. R. 910, L. R. 6 Ch App. 632. Their lordships are of opinion that Earle was not bound to inquire into the state of the account between the parties. He had no materials to enable him to do so, and it is difficult to suggest anyone of whom he could have made inquiry other than Ballantyne himself. Their lordships therefore hold that the bank is not affected with notice of any irregularity on Ballantyne's part.

The learned Chief Justice seems to have thought that there was some agreement and intention on the part of Earle and Ballantyne to discharge the latter's previous indebtedness to the bank out of the company's money. Questions were also put to Earle in his cross-examination as to his view of the propriety of the transactions in other circumstances. It is possible that Earle was imperfectly acquainted with the law relating to joint stock companies, and that he placed some and perhaps undue reliance on the fact of Ballantyne being sole owner of the shares. But the bank is bound only by Earle's acts and knowledge, and not by his opinions on legal questions. In their lordships' judgment the evidence does not warrant the inference of an agreement between Earle and Ballantyne to discharge the latter's private debts out of the company's money, and the cheques were not in fact applied (as assumed by the Chief Justice) in discharge of Ballantyne's indebtedness existing on the 9th of June.

Their lordships will humbly advise his Majesty that the order of the full court of the 11th of October, 1900, should be discharged, and there should be substituted for it an order dismissing the respondent's appeal to the full court with costs. The respondent will also pay the costs of this appeal.

Solicitors, Walleson & Malleson; Flegg & Son.

---

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) — March 4.

ANDERSON v. RAYNER. (a.)

Ship—Seaman—Injury in service of ship—Medical expenses after being brought back to home port—Liability of shipowner—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 207, sub-section 1.

By section 207, sub-section 1, of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, "If the master of, or a seaman or apprentice belonging to, a ship receives any hurt or injury in the service of the ship, the expense of providing the necessary surgical and medical advice and attendance and medicine, and also the expenses of the maintenance of the master, seaman, or apprentice until he is cured, or dies, or is brought back, if shipped in the United Kingdom, to a port of the United Kingdom, or if shipped in a British possession to a port of that possession, and of his conveyance to the port, and in case of death the expense (if any) of his burial, shall be defrayed by the owner of the ship, without any deduction on that account from his wages."

Held, that the words "until he is cured, or dies, or is brought back," qualify the liability of the shipowner to pay the expense of providing the necessary surgical and medical advice and attendance and medicine for the injured seaman as well as the expenses of his maintenance, and that therefore the shipowner's liability in respect of both ceases upon the injured seaman being brought back to a home port.

Appeal from the judgment of Wills, J.

The plaintiff was the master of a ship belonging to the defendant, which traded between Liverpool and Falmouth. While on a voyage from Liverpool to Falmouth the plaintiff was injured by an accident in the service of the ship, and the ship was brought back to Liverpool, where the plaintiff was landed. In consequence of the accident he incurred, when on shore, expenses for medical attendance and medicine to the amount of £28, and he brought this action under section 207, sub-section 1,* of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, to recover that amount from the defendant. It was not alleged that the accident was caused by any negligence on the part of the defendant.

Wills, J., held that the words, "until he is cured, or dies, or is brought back" to port, applied only the obligation of the shipowner to pay for the expenses of maintenance, and did not qualify the obligation to pay for the necessary surgical and medical attendance and medicine; and that therefore this latter obligation was an absolute one, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

The defendant appealed.

---

* The sub-section is set out in the head-note.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-Law.

Horridge, K.C., and Dawson Miller, for the defendant.—The ordinary grammatical construction of section 207, sub-section 1, is to read the words, "until he is cured, or dies, or is brought back" as qualifying the obligation to pay both for medical expenses and for expenses of maintenance. The section, which is substantially a re-enactment of section 228 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), has imposed a new obligation upon the shipowner—namely, to pay for medical and maintenance expenses if a seaman is injured in the service of the ship. There is no reason why the obligation of the shipowner to pay for the expenses of maintenance should cease upon the injured seaman being brought back to a home port, and the obligation to pay for medical expenses should continue. The scope of the section is to make the shipowner liable for these expenses while the seaman is away from home, but not after he has been brought back. Again, the onus lies upon the plaintiff of showing that the section imposes the liability he contends for, and if the words of the section are doubtful he has not made out his case.

W. F. Taylor, K.C., and Keogh, for the plaintiff.—Section 207, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1894 differs somewhat from section 228 of the Act of 1854. By this latter section the shipowner is made liable to pay for "the expense of providing the necessary surgical and medical advice, with attendance and medicines, and of his subsistence until he is cured, or dies, or is brought back." In section 208 of the Act of 1894 the phraseology is altered, and the section is divided into two heads, the first relating to the medical expenses, and the second, beginning with the words "and also," relating to the expenses of maintenance. The first head is cut off from the second, and the qualifying words, "until he is cured, or dies, or is brought back," refer solely to the second head. It is clear from the section that the shipowner may have to pay for some expenses after the ship has come back to a home port, because he is liable in case of the death of the seaman to pay his funeral expenses. If the section does not apply to this case it will be futile as regards coasting ships and many other ships, because they do not carry a medical man (see section 209), and therefore there can be no medical expenses until the return to port. This is a section passed in favour of seamen, and the court should lean towards a construction that will extend its benefits and not curtail them.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I cannot adopt the suggestion that we should give this section a construction favourable to the plaintiff because it has been passed in favour of seamen. I venture to think that the old canon of construction still prevails—namely, that if it is contended that a statute has imposed a liability beyond that which the common law imposes, the statute must do so in plain terms and must not leave the matter in doubt. In the present case I apply that principle, and say that it is by no means clear from the words of section 207, sub-section 1, that the statute intended to impose upon the shipowner any liability either for medical expenses or for the expenses of maintenance after the injured seaman has been brought back to a home port. It seems to me, when I look at the various provisions of the section, that the general intention of the section, notwithstanding the provision as to funeral expenses, is merely to impose the liability on the shipowner, both for medical and maintenance expenses, until the injured seaman is cured, or dies, or is brought back to a home port. The defendant therefore is not liable for these expenses, and the appeal must be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot construe the section as imposing any liability on the shipowner for the expenses of providing medical advice and medicines to the injured seaman after the latter has been brought back to a home port. The scope of the section covers the time when the seaman is away from a home port. It is not denied that the liability for the expenses of maintenance ceases upon the seaman being brought back to a home port, and in my opinion the same holds good of medical expenses.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Section 207 is practically a re-enactment of section 228 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. During the period since that Act came into operation, nearly fifty years ago, it never seems to have occurred to anyone to place the construction now contended for upon the section. That tacit acquiescence in a particular view seems to me to be a strong indication as to what is the true construction of the section. The section constitutes one of the great safeguards of the seaman, because it imposes a liability upon the shipowner to look after the seaman while on board the ship and to bring him back to a home port.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Pritchard, Englefield, & Co., for Simpson, North, Harley, & Birkett, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the defendant, H. Forshaw & Hawkins, Liverpool.

---

From Registrar in Bankruptcy. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Feb. 27.

In re A DEBTOR.
Ex parte THE DEBTOR. (a.)

Money-lender—Harsh and unconscionable transaction—Re-opening—Money-lenders Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 51), s. 1, sub-section 1.

A transaction may be "harsh and unconscionable" within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 1, of the Money-lenders Act, 1900, by reason of excessive interest merely, and the standard to be applied is not the same as that applied by a court of Equity before the Act.

Wilton & Co. v. Osborn, [1901] 2 K. B. 110, 49 W. R. Dig. 124, overruled.

This was an appeal from a receiving order made by Mr. Registrar Hope.

The question turned on the construction of section 1 of the Money-lenders Act, 1900.

The petitioning creditor was a money-lender from whom the debtor had borrowed small sums of money at rates of interest amounting in one case to 80 per cent. per annum, in another case to so much as 200 per cent. The total amount lent was £50. The creditor had recovered final judgment under order 14, and had served the usual bankruptcy notice.

At the hearing of the petition the debtor claimed relief under the Money-lenders Act, 1900, on the ground that the interest charged was excessive.

The registrar had felt himself debarred from reopening the transaction by reason of the decision of Ridley, J., in Wilton v. Osborn, [1901] 2 K. B. 110, 49 W. R. Dig. 124, which had since been followed by Channell, J., in Barnett v. Coronna (reported in the Times of 16th June, 1902). Both learned judges had held that excessive interest was not of itself sufficient ground for affording relief under the said Act.

(a.) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The debtor appealed.

Section 1, sub-section 1, of the Act is as follows: "Where proceedings are taken in any court by a money-lender for the recovery of any money lent after the commencement of this Act, in respect of money lent either before or after the commencement of this Act, and there is evidence which satisfies the court that the interest charged in respect of the sum actually lent is excessive, or that the amounts charged for expenses, inquiries, fines, bonus, renewals, or any other charges are excessive, and that, in either case, the transaction is harsh and unconscionable, or is otherwise such that a court of equity would give relief, the court may reopen the transaction, and take an account between the money-lender and the person sued, and may, notwithstanding any statement or settlement of account or any agreement purporting to close previous dealings and create a new obligation, re-open any account already taken between them, and relieve the person sued from payment of any sum in excess of the sum adjudged by the court to be fairly due in respect of such principal, interest, and charges as the court, having regard to the risk and all the circumstances, may adjudge to be reasonable; and if any such excess has been paid, or allowed in account, by the debtor, may order the creditor to repay it; and may set aside, either wholly or in part, or revise or alter, any security given or agreement made in respect of money lent by the money-lender, and, if the money-lender has parted with the security, may order him to indemnify the borrower or other person sued."

Germaine, K.C., and Cooper Willis, for the debtor.—The creditor is getting over 90 per cent. for a total loan of £50. This is a fair case for the registrar to reopen the bargain. The intention of the Legislature in passing the Act was to give additional relief to the borrower. It is possible to construe the words "or otherwise" as words of extension, no less than as words of definition. If the decision of Ridley, J., in Wilton v. Osborn is upheld, then the Act of Parliament is rendered nugatory. The debtor is a bank clerk, and if the receiving order is confirmed he will lose his sole asset—viz., his salary: In re Otway, [1895] 1 Q. B. 812, 43 W. R. Dig. 17.

Scarlett, for the petitioning creditor.

COLLINS, M.R.—This case comes in a peculiar way from the learned registrar. On the hearing of the case the registrar deemed himself bound by the decision of Ridley, J., in Wilton v. Osborn, but he granted an adjournment for the purpose of the parties raising here the question whether the judgment of Ridley, J., in that case was right. The learned judge held that the only standard to be applied in money-lending transactions was that which was adopted by a court of equity before the Act. If that decision is not right, it will be necessary for the transaction to be discussed before the registrar again. Now, is this money-lending Act a statutory enactment that the standard to be applied in money-lending transactions is that laid down by the courts of equity and no other? To begin with, it is extraordinary that in an Act "for amending the law with respect to persons carrying on business as money-lenders" the Legislature should go through all these formalities for the purpose of leaving the law precisely as it stood before the Act. The whole purpose of the Act is to make some changes beneficial to the borrower. [Here his lordship read the section.]

Now, it has been held by Ridley, J., that, having regard to these words, the Legislature must be taken to have enacted that this statute provides for relief only on the grounds where equity formerly granted relief. It appears to me that the relief given by this enactment is not thus limited. Whatever was the law, it seems to me that this particular enactment does not bind the court to say that they are bound to conform to the standard of the court of equity. This effect was not intended by the statutory enactment, nor does it follow from the natural grammatical construction of the words. The courts of equity gave relief in certain conditions only—namely, when there was a fiduciary relation, when there was fraud, undue pressure and so on. They did not regard excessive interest alone as a ground for such relief unless the parties were under full age, or there was some particular relation between them. It seems to me that there is nothing to prevent the court from construing that a bargain is harsh and unconscionable on the ground of excessive interest alone, even as regards a borrower of full age and standing in no special relation to the lender. The words, as I have said, do not grammatically admit of the interpretation accorded to them by Ridley, J. To leave out the words "or otherwise" from the section, which in effect was done by the learned judge, is not a fair way of construing the Act. There are two classes of transaction mentioned in the section—one the harsh and unconscionable transaction, the other the transaction where the court of equity would grant relief. To make the standard that of the court of equity alone would, as I have said, be to defeat the general purpose of the Act. The learned registrar, by reason of the decision of Ridley, J., felt himself debarred from inquiring further into the facts, and therefore, that bar being now removed, the case must go back to him in order that he may consider afresh the whole question as to whether relief ought to be granted.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the section of the Act is not free from difficulty. But, in my opinion, it was intended to extend the right to relief of the borrower, as against the money-lender, beyond that which existed before the Act in a court of equity. The phrase "harsh and unconscionable" stands by itself; it is an isolated phrase and not bound up with the phrase which follows so as to limit the words "harsh and unconscionable" to cases where the courts of equity prior to the Act would have given relief. The words "or otherwise" are equivalent to "in other respects," or some such words. I think that in this section the words "harsh and unconscionable" ought not to receive an artificial meaning by saying that they must have reference to the rules of equity before the passing of the Act. A transaction may be harsh and unconscionable without necessarily being one in respect of which relief would have been given by a court of equity before the Act.

I disagree with the decision of Wilton v. Osborn in so far as it purported to limit the operation of the section. This appeal ought to succeed, and the registrar should have an opportunity of going into the question whether the transaction was harsh and unconscionable.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—Was this Act intended to alter the law or leave the law exactly as it stood before the Act, and by law I mean law and equity? The strictly grammatical construction of the words is against the decision of Ridley, J.

I should be sorry to lay down any rule which would debar the court from considering the question except under the circumstances which formerly prevailed in equity.

I should be sorry to have to say that the interest may not be so excessive as to justify the court in saying that a transaction is harsh and unconscionable.

In considering the question the court must have regard, not only to the rate of interest, but to the risk and all other circumstances. The learned registrar must now consider what he was not at liberty to consider before.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, H. W. Chatterton; Alfred Slater.

---

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Feb 21.

MASKELYNE AND COOKE v. SMITH. (a.) PALMER, Claimant.

Fraudulent conveyance—Assignment to trustee for creditors—Deed of arrangement—Registration—Affidavit—List of creditors—Omission—Intentional exclusion of particular creditor—Delaying creditors—Bona fides—13 Eliz. c 5—Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict c. 57), ss. 5, 6.

A deed of arrangement is not necessarily void under section 5 of the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887, because in the affidavit by the debtor filed on registration, under section 6 sub-section 1, the name of a particular creditor is omitted.

A deed of assignment to a trustee for creditors is not necessarily void under 13 Eliz. c. 5, because the debtor intentionally excluded a particular creditor from the benefits of the deed.

Where a deed of assignment to a trustee for creditors is impeached as being void under 13 Eliz. c. 5, the test is whether the deed was really a bonâ fide deed for the benefit of creditors or whether its object was to benefit the debtor at the expense of the creditors.

Decision of the Divisional Court ([1902] 2 K. B. 158, 50 W. R. Dig 62) affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Darling and Channell, JJ.) on the hearing of an appeal from the Westminster County Court (reported [1902] 2 K. B. 158, 50 W. R. Dig. 62).

In February, 1900, the plaintiffs, Messrs. Maskelyne and Cooke, who were public entertainers, gave an entertainment for the benefit of a hospital, and the defendant Smith, who was a market gardener, gave them a guarantee to secure the payment of the fees which they charged for the entertainment.

In May, 1900, the defendant, being in debt, executed a deed assigning all his real and personal estate to the claimant Palmer as trustee for his creditors to secure a composition of 20s. in the pound, payable by instalments of £10 a month. The deed provided that until default by the debtor in payment of the instalments he should be allowed to use and deal with the estate for the purposes of his business or such other purposes as the trustee might think proper, but subject to the control and supervision of the trustee. It also provided that the trustee should not be bound to interfere with the debtor in the conduct of the business further than he should think necessary. The defendant did not consider that Maskelyne and Cooke were business creditors, and accordingly he did not include their names in the list of creditors which he gave to the trustee. The deed did not contain a schedule of creditors, and on the registration of the deed under the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887, the schedule to the affidavit by the debtor, filed as required by section 6, sub-section 1, did not contain the names of Maskelyne and Cooke.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In April, 1901, the plaintiffs sued the defendant for payment of what was due under the guarantee, and, having obtained judgment, they levied execution on goods found on the defendant's premises.

The trustee having claimed the goods under the deed of assignment, the sheriff interpleaded, and an interpleader issue was directed to be tried between the execution creditors and the claimant.

On the hearing of the issue the county court judge found that the defendant had acted honestly in executing the deed, but that he had intended that Maskelyne and Cooke should not stand on the same footing as other creditors, and he held that on this ground the deed was void under 13 Eliz. c. 5. He also held that the deed was void on the ground that the names of Maskelyne and Cook were not in the list of creditors in the schedule to the affidavit filed on the registration of the deed.

The Divisional Court reversed the decision of the county court judge, and gave judgment for the claimant. They held, first, that a deed of arrangement was not void because the name of a creditor had been bonâ fide intentionally omitted from the affidavit filed on the registration of the deed; and, secondly, that a deed of assignment to a trustee for creditors was not void under 13 Eliz. c. 5, merely because the debtor did not intend to include a particular creditor in the benefits of the deed.

The execution creditors appealed.

Mackaskie, K.C., and Thorn Drury, for the execution creditors.—The deed is void on the face of it under 13 Eliz. c. 5. The net effect of the deed is that the debtor not only keeps present possession of his property, but may dispose of it either for the purposes of his business or for any other purposes that the trustee may assent to. It is a deed made for the benefit of the debtor and not of his creditors. The case is governed by Spencer v. Slater, 27 W. R. 134, 4 Q. B. D. 13. The cases of Boldero v. London and Westminster Loan and Discount Co., 28 W. R. 154, 5 Ex. D. 47, and Alton v. Harrison, 17 W. R 1034, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 622, are distinguishable. Secondly, the deed is void under section 5 of the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887, because the names of the execution creditors were not inserted in the list of creditors contained in the schedule to the debtor's affidavit filed on the registration of the deed as required by section 6, sub-section 1, of that Act. The words "his creditors" in that sub-section mean all his creditors: In re Batten, Ex parte Milne, 37 W. R. 499, 22 Q. B. D. 685.

Bray, K.C., and J. S. Pritchett, for the claimant, were not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my opinion the decision of the Divisional Court ought to be affirmed. I will deal with the points raised in the case in the order in which they were dealt with by the Lord Chief Justice. The question is whether this deed of arrangement with creditors is void. The first ground on which it is suggested that it is void is because the names of particular creditors, Maskelyne and Cooke, were omitted from the list of creditors contained in the schedule to the affidavit filed on the registration of the deed. I cannot agree with that contention. It appears that the defendant had given the plaintiffs a guarantee signed by himself and two other persons in respect of an entertainment which the plaintiffs gave for a charitable object. I think it is quite possible that this debt was omitted from the schedule because the debtor thought it was a contingent debt. But, however that may be, I entirely agree with the Lord Chief Justice that there is nothing in the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887, which makes the registration bad if there has been an honest omission of the name of a particular creditor. When I look at the Act to see what appears to be the purpose of the registration which is required, it seems to me to be plain that the Act does not make it a condition precedent to the validity of a deed that the affidavit or the schedule should contain the names of all the creditors. This Act requires the debtor to make the affidavit before registration, not for the information of creditors, but for the purpose of satisfying the officer who has to register the deed with proper evidence that the statute has been complied with. I am of opinion that the mere omission of a name does not render the deed void.

The other point which is taken is that the deed is void under the statute of Elizabeth. I am far from saying that a deed of assignment on trust for creditors cannot be void under the statute. The deed must be looked at in each particular case, and where the deed considered as a whole appears to be made not really for the benefit of creditors, but to enable the debtor to retain his property or part of his property for his own benefit, then it is not the less within the statute because it is drawn in the form of a deed for the benefit of creditors. But I see no reason for inferring that this deed is anything but in truth a deed for the benefit of creditors. [His lordship referred to the provisions of the deed.] It seems to me to be quite plain that this is an honest deed intended for the benefit of creditors, and is not intended to delay or defeat creditors by giving a benefit to the debtor. In my opinion the cases of Spencer v. Slater, Boldero v. London and Westminster Discount Co., and Alton v. Harrison are all consistent with the same principle—viz., that the proper test is whether the deed is really a bonâ fide deed for the benefit of creditors, or whether its object is to benefit the debtor at the expense of the creditors. I therefore think the appeal should be dismissed.

STIRLING and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the execution creditors, Seal & Edgelow.

Solicitors for the claimant, Wood & Sons.

---

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Feb. 20.

SMITH v THE GOLD COAST AND ASHANTI EXPLORERS (LIMITED). (a.)

Frauds, Statute of—Agreement for service—Engagement for one year to commence on the day following that on which the contract was made—No memorandum—Action to recover damages for breach of agreement—29 Car. 2 c. 3, s. 4.

A contract for service for one year, the performance of which was to commence from the day following that on which the contract was made,

Held, not a contract that was "not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof" within the meaning of those words in section 4 of 29 Car. 2, c. 3.

Dictum of Willes, J., in Cawthorne v. Cordrey, 13 C. B. N. S. 406, 11 W. R. C. L. Dig. 164, and of Brett, L.J., in Britain v. Rossiter, 27 W. R. 482, 11 Q. B. D. 123, at p. 125, approved.

Appeal by the defendant company from a judgment of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.), who had reversed a decision of the Common Serjeant of the City of London.

The action was brought in the Mayor's Court by the plaintiff, a solicitor, claiming damages for breach of contract to employ him as solicitor to the company abroad.

The company pleaded that the action would not lie, because the contract was one not to be performed within a year, and therefore, as it was not in writing, could not be sued upon.

The facts, so far as material, were these:

The plaintiff, in answer to an advertisement, applied to be appointed solicitor to the defendant company on the Gold Coast. He attended a meeting of the board, held at the London offices of the company, on the 6th of December, 1901, and he alleged that all the terms were arranged at this meeting, and that he was then engaged for one year certain from the morning of the 7th of December if he could produce a certain document signed by the agent-general of West Australia showing that he had practised as a solicitor in that colony.

On the following day, the 7th of December, the plaintiff called with the document referred to, but subsequently the board gave him notice that his services would not be required, and the plaintiff then commenced these proceedings.

The Common Serjeant directed the jury to find for the defendants, as he ruled that the contract for a year's service, being one that did not begin until the day following that on which it was made, was one that could not be sued on in the absence of some memorandum or note thereof in writing signed by or on behalf of the defendants, by reason of section 4 of 29 Car. 2, c. 3.

The plaintiff appealed.

The Divisional Court on the 15th of January, 1903, allowed the appeal.

Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., in the course of his judgment, said the cases show that if a contract of service for a year begins on a day later than the day next after that on which the contract was made, it is within the statute. What, then, is to be done if the agreement of service is made on one day, as here, on the 6th of December, and the service is for a year to commence on the following day (the 7th of December), and would terminate therefore on the 6th of December in the following year? It might be said in popular language that such an agreement was one not to be performed within a year. But the matter had been discussed obiter in Cawthorne v. Cordrey, 13 C. B. N. S. 406, 11 W. R. C. L. Dig. 164, where there was an expression of opinion in favour of the statute not applying. That dictum was approved by Brett, L.J., in Britain v. Rossiter, 27 W. R. 482, 11 Q. B. D. 123, at p. 125. That seems to me sufficient authority for saying that a contract of service for one year to commence on the next day is not necessarily one that falls within the Statute of Frauds. For these reasons I think the learned Common Serjeant ought to have left the case to go to the jury, and we must therefore direct a new trial.

Wills and Channell, JJ., concurred.

The defendant company entered an appeal in the interlocutory list to have the preliminary question decided whether the provisions of the statute applied or not to this contract, and the appeal now came on for argument.

A. T. Lawrance, K.C. and C. Herbert Smith, for the defendants.—We submit, first, that the judges of the Divisional Court misconceived the evidence as to the day on which the contract was to commence. We contend that the contract of employment was from the 6th of December, to commence on the 8th,

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—That is a question of fact and was found against you by the Common Serjeant.] Assuming that two days intervened from the making of the contract and commencement of service, then on the authority of Cawthorne v. Cordrey, approved in Britain v. Rossiter, the action clearly, by reason of the contract sued on not being in writing, cannot be maintained. Even if your lordships hold against us on that point, the dictum of Willes, J. (which seems to be supported by the opinion of Byles, J.) in Cawthorne v. Cordrey is not binding on this court, and ought not to be supported. The dictum was referred to by Brett, L.J. in Britain v. Rossiter, 11 Q. B. D., at p. 125, in these words: "If a contract is made on a day, say Monday for a service for a year, to commence on the following day, say a Tuesday, the service is to be performed within 365 days from the making of the contract, but inasmuch as the law takes no notice of part of a day, and the contract was made in the middle of the Monday, the service to be performed within 365 days after that, the law did not count that half day of Monday, and therefore the contract was to be performed within 365 days after it was made, that was, within a year." That was the contention of the plaintiff in this case, and if your lordships are against our submission, that in fact the contract of service was not to commence until the 8th, and hold that the dictum is sound where a day or part of a day intervenes only between the making of a contract and the commencement of service, we cannot carry the case farther. We submit, however, that the words of the statute "not to be performed within the space of one year" are too clear for the dictum in Cawthorne v. Cordrey to override their simple and obvious meaning, and that here the defendants are entitled to judgment whether the services were to begin on the 7th or the 8th.

The plaintiff, who appeared in person, was not called on.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. — In this case the defendants appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court directing a new trial. It is sufficient for me to say that I think there is evidence upon which it could rightly be held that the contract of service made on the 6th of December was in this case to commence on the following day. That being so, the Common Serjeant was wrong in adopting the course he did, and there must be a new trial to decide whether there has been such a breach of contract by the defendants as renders them liable in damages to the plaintiff.

STIRLING and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

Order for new trial affirmed.

Solicitors for the defendants, Parker & Richardson.

---

From K. B. Div.
(Earl of Halsbury, L.C., Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Sir F. Jeune, P.) Feb. 16.

KIRKWOOD v. CARROLL AND CUTLER. (a.)

Promissory note—Payment by instalments—Clause giving time—Condition as to rights of holder—Stamp duty—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 3, sub-sectio s 1, 3; s. 9, sub-section 1; s. 16; s. 83, sub-sections 1, 3; s. 97, sub-section 2—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), ss. 4, 10, 33.

The plaintiff sued as holder for value of a document in the form of a joint and several promissory note, which provided for payment of certain money by instalments, and that in case default was made in payment of any one of the instalments the whole amount remaining unpaid should become due and payable forthwith. The document also contained, at the end of it, the following clause: "No time given to or security taken from or composition or arrangement entered into with either party hereto shall prejudice the rights of the holder to proceed against any other party."

Held that the document was a good promissory note within the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and was not invalidated by reason of the clause at the end of it.

Yates v. Evans, 61 L. J. Q. B. 446, 40 W. R. Dig. 219, approved.

Kirkwood v. Smith, 44 W. R. 480, [1896] 1 Q. B. 582, overruled.

Appeal from Wright, J., on a special case for the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff in the action claimed £125 as the amount due from the defendants as makers jointly and severally of a promissory note for £125 dated the 24th of January, 1901, and payable by instalments of £5 per week.

The promissory note was as follows: "Croydon, 24th day of January, 1901.—£125.—We jointly and severally promise to pay Mr. John Kirkwood (carrying on business in the name or style of the Provincial Union Bank), or order, the sum of one hundred and twenty-five pounds for value received by instalments in manner following—that is to say, the sum of £5 on Thursday, the 31st day of January inst. (1901), and the sum of £5 on the Thursday in every succeeding week until the whole of the said one hundred and twenty-five pounds shall be fully paid, and in case default is made in payment of any of the said instalments the whole amount remaining unpaid shall become due and payable forthwith. No time given to or security taken from or composition or arrangement entered into with either party hereto shall prejudice the rights of the holder to proceed against any other party."

This document was signed by the defendants and witnessed, and was stamped with a two-shilling bill or note stamp.

The plaintiff was the holder for value of the said document.

The defendants having made default in the payment of the instalment due on Thursday, the 31st of January, 1901, the plaintiff sued them on the document.

The defendants contended that said instrument was not duly stamped and could not be given in evidence or be available for any purpose whatsoever, and they submitted that the instrument was not and could not be sued on as a promissory note owing to the last clause contained therein.

The questions submitted for the decision of the court were (1) whether the said instrument was a promissory note; (2) whether the instrument was duly stamped.

Wright, J., held, following Kirkwood v. Smith, 44 W. R. 480, [1896] 1 Q. B. 582, that the instrument was not a good promissory note within the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, but that it was duly stamped as a promissory note within section 33 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

Cross-appeals were entered against this decision.

The plaintiff now appealed from the learned judge's decision that the instrument was not a promissory note within the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and the defendants appealed from the decision that the instrument was duly stamped.

J. E. C. Adams, for the defendants.—The instrument is not a promissory note, but only an agreement, and should be stamped as such; the bill or note stamp impressed on it is not the proper stamp. Section 10 of the Stamp Act, 1891, provides that "a stamp which by any word or words on the face of it is appropriated to any particular description of instrument is not to be used, or, if used, is not to be available, for an instrument of any other description"; and further, that "an instrument falling under the particular description to which any stamp is so appropriated as aforesaid is not to be deemed duly stamped unless it is stamped with the stamp so appropriated." In Ashling v. Boon, 39 W. R. 298, [1891] 1 Ch. 568, it was held that a promissory note bearing only a penny receipt stamp could not, as it was insufficiently stamped, be admitted in evidence to prove the receipt of the money for which the note was given. By section 4 of the same Act it is provided that "an instrument containing or relating to several distinct matters is to be separately and distinctly charged as if it were a separate instrument with duty in respect of each of the matters." Even if this instrument is a promissory note it is nevertheless also an agreement, and so, in accordance with the above section, requires two stamps, one as a promissory note and one as an agreement, therefore it is not duly stamped.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

W. E. Vernon for the plaintiff.—[The court did not call upon him to argue the point as to whether the instrument was duly stamped.] The instrument is a good promissory note within the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. Yates v. Evans, 61 L. J. Q. B. 446, 40 W. R. Dig. 219, is an authority in favour of that contention. In that case there was in the instrument a clause giving time to the makers, and it was there held that the instrument, which was in the form of a joint or several promissory note, was not by reason of such a clause an agreement requiring to be stamped as an agreement, but was a good promissory note. In the case of Kirkwood v. Smith, by which case the learned judge in the court below felt he was bound, the case of Yates v. Evans was not cited. Lord Russell of Killowen, L.C.J., in Kirkwood v. Smith held that if the document contains something more than is referred to in section 83, sub-section 3—namely, "a pledge of collateral security with authority to sell or dispose thereof," it is not valid as a promissory note. That decision is wrong in law and ought not to be followed, for by section 97, sub-section 2, which was not referred to in that case, it is provided that "the rules of common law, including the law merchant, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of this Act, shall continue to apply to bills of exchange, promissory notes, and cheques." Section 3, sub-section 3, and sections 9 and 16 all show that additions may be made to a bill of exchange or a promissory note without affecting its character as such. Section 3, sub-section 1, which speaks of a bill of exchange as being an "unconditional" order to pay a "sum certain," provides by sub-section 3 that "an unqualified order to pay, coupled with (a) an indication of a particular fund out of which the drawee is to reimburse himself or a particular account to be debited with the amount, or (b) a statement of the transaction which gives rise to the bill, is unconditional." Section 9 provides that the sum payable by a bill is "a sum certain" within the meaning of the Act (section 3) although it is required to be paid "(a) with interest, (b) by instalments, (c) by stated instalments, with a provision that upon default of payment of any instalment the whole shall become due." And section 16 provides that "the drawer of a bill, and any indorser, may insert therein an express stipulation (1) negativing or limiting his own liability to the holder, (2) waiving as regards himself some or all of the holder's duties." It is clear, therefore, that the addition of the time clause at the end of this instrument does not affect it as a good promissory note within the Act.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I think this instrument is a promissory note within the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. The clause as to giving time which was added at the end of it does not in my opinion, deprive it of its character as a promissory note. Certainly making the sum payable by instalments or making the whole amount due if default be made in payment of any instalment does not affect its position as a promissory note. I think Yates v. Evans was rightly decided. Kirkwood v. Smith was decided without considering the sections of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, to which we have been referred in the present case, and cannot any longer be regarded as an authority.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., and Sir F. JEUNE, P., concurred.

Plaintiff's appeal allowed; defendants' appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for both parties, J. G. Lincoln.

---

From Chan. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) } Feb. 11.

FINCHLEY ELECTRIC LIGHT CO. v. FINCHLEY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Street—Fee simple of road—Vesting in local authority—Electric light company—Overhead wires—Area of user—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 149—General Turnpike Act, 1822 (3 Geo. 4, c. 126), s. 84.

The effect of section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875, is to vest in the local authority so much of the actual soil of a street as is necessary for the control, protection, and maintenance of the street as a highway for the public. The section in no way considers the title of the original owner of the soil, and the rights of the local authority under the section are neither increased nor diminished according to the extent of such original ownership. Nor are the rights of the local authority increased by the fact that it is impossible to point to any actual owner. Thus where the ownership in fee simple in the soil of a road was originally acquired by turnpike trustees under 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, and the road subsequently became vested in an urban authority,

Held, that all that vested in the urban authority was so much as was necessary for the purposes of the user of the road by the public as a highway.

Decision of Farwell, J. (50 W. R. 470, [1902] 1 Ch. 866), reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Farwell, J. (reported 50 W. R. 470, [1902] 1 Ch. 866).

The plaintiffs were a limited company incorporated in August, 1900, having as one of the objects of its formation the supply at Finchley and elsewhere of electricity for lighting and other purposes. Since the incorporation of the company the plaintiffs had begun to develop their business in the district of Finchley.

The defendants in the action, the Urban District Council of Finchley, had obtained in 1899 a provisional order from the Board of Trade empowering them to undertake the necessary works for supplying electricity to the inhabitants of their district.

On the 19th of April, 1901, a compromise was effected in an action commenced by the defendants, and an order was taken by consent whereby the present plaintiffs undertook that they would not without the council's license open or break up any road vested in the council until fourteen days after application had been made to the council for liberty to open the road in question.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 28th of September, 1901, the plaintiffs carried their wires across the Regent's Park-road, at a height of more than thirty feet above the ground.

On the 1st of October the defendants caused the wires to be cut.

The plaintiffs then brought the present action, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from breaking, cutting, severing, or otherwise interfering with the electric cable of the plaintiffs over or across the Regent's Park-road, or from hindering and obstructing the plaintiffs in the erection of electric lines over or across roads or streets within the urban district of Finchley.

The Regent's Park-road was constructed by certain turnpike trustees under the provisions of a special Act of Parliament (7 Geo. 4, c. xc.). The site of one side of the road where the plaintiffs' wires crossed formed part of land acquired by the turnpike trustees under an indenture dated the 7th of November, 1828. The said site was duly conveyed to and vested in the turnpike trustees, their heirs and successors, in fee simple, free from any reservations in favour of the owners of the adjoining lands or other reservations. This conveyance was made under the powers of the Turnpike Roads Act, 1822, s. 84.

In 1872 the turnpikes were removed from the Regent's Park-road, and from 1878 (on the constitution of the Finchley Local Board) and onwards the road was maintained by the defendants.

By section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875, "all streets being or which may at any time become highways repairable by the inhabitants at large within any urban district, and the pavements, stones, and other materials thereof, and all buildings, implements, and other things provided for the purposes thereof, shall vest in and be under the control of the urban authority."

Farwell, J., held that in the circumstances the fee simple which was vested in the turnpike trustees vested in the urban authority. He therefore dismissed the action.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Buckmaster, K.C., and W. Mackenzie, for the appellants.—It is established that section 149 of the Public Health Act was never intended to give the local authority anything more than so much as is necessary to enable them to perform their duties: Mayor, &c., of Tunbridge Wells v. Baird, [1896] A. C. 434, 45 W. R. Dig. 92; Wandsworth Board of Works v. United Telephone Co., 32 W. R. 776, 13 Q. B. D. 904.

Chubb (Upjohn K.C., with him), for the respondents.—Under the Turnpike Roads Act, 1822 (3 Geo. 4, c. 126), this land was conveyed to the turnpike trustees in fee. They became trustees of the fee for the public, and the decisions on section 149 of the Public Health Act show that there is now under that section vested in the local authority all the property and rights formerly vested in the public: Coverdale v. Charlton, 27 W. R. 257, 4 Q. B. D. 104; Rolls v. Vestry of St. George, 28 W. R. 867, 14 Ch. D. 785; Wandsworth Board of Works v. United Telephone Co.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of Farwell, J., who has held in the case of a street called Regent-road, that, owing to the peculiar circumstances by which the land forming a part of that street was originally acquired, the local authority have, under the 149th section of the Public Health Act, acquired a right to a much larger interest in the land than they would have done had it been an ordinary street, part of a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

Now the basis of Farwell, J.'s, decision, as I understand it, is this: Regent-road is made up of what I may call one strip of ordinary street, which has become a street in the ordinary way. The other strip was originally part of a turnpike road. It had been acquired by the trustees of the turnpike road for the purpose of their road, and they had acquired the fee simple. It ceased afterwards to be a turnpike road, and became a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large; but the fact was that the trustees who acquired it had acquired the fee simple, and, being no longer required by them for the purpose of a turnpike road, the question where the beneficial ownership of the soil is may be doubtful. The trustees still remained, and, as far as I know, do still remain the legal owners of what they bought. That is the position of that part of this street. Then the local authority comes in under the 149th section of the Public Health Act, 1875, and by that section this is enacted: [His lordship read the section, and continued:] There is no doubt in this case, and it is not disputed by anyone, that this street had become a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, and therefore the right given by the 149th section to the local authority no doubt existed. That right is that these streets, pavement stones, and the material thereof, &c., shall vest in and be under the control of the urban authority. That was the whole of the right they acquired in the street.

It has been decided in a long series of cases that "vest" means that the local authority do actually become the owners of the street to this extent; they become the owners of all that air above and all that stratum below which is necessary for the ordinary user of the street as a street; but they are not entitled to anything in the air above or stratum below beyond that which is necessary for the ordinary user of the street as a street; for instance, they do not take that part of the subsoil which has to be used for the purpose of laying sewers. That point was clearly decided, in fact, most emphatically decided, in the case of Mayor and Corporation of Tunbridge Wells v. Baird, where the question was whether the local authority, by virtue of the vesting of the street, were entitled to make underground lavatories and conveniences of that kind. They asserted that that was a sort of use that a public authority might properly make of a street; but it was held by the House of Lords that that was going beyond the ordinary use of a street qua street—that the use of the street qua street did not involve the right to make excavations for the purpose of making lavatories and conveniences. They arrived at that decision following a line of cases beginning with Coverdale v. Charlton and the principle laid down there, that where you are construing an Act of Parliament which confers a right upon a public authority for which it does not pay, then you give the best effect to the intention of the Legislature by limiting the power which they get without paying for it to the area which is necessary to enable them to perform the duties imposed upon them in respect of the street as a street. There was a great deal of controversy as to what area was embraced under that definition, and in the case of Wandsworth Board of Works v. United Telephone Co., in the Court of Appeal, the Lords Justices gave very elaborate descriptions of that which in their judgment was covered by the words in the section. The result appears to me to be this, that that which is vested in the local authority is what is called the area of user. Instances were put of how far you might reasonably consider that the column of air above the surface of the street came within the area of user—for instance, fire escapes, being probably the highest things which could be reasonably brought within the area of user. The result, it seems to me, is clearly this: that all the stratum of air above the road which in any reasonable sense could be required for the user of the street as a street, and all the stratum below the surface which would be required for the purposes of the street as a street vest in and belong to the local authority.

Now, that being the law, which is now settled beyond all controversy by the numerous decisions culminating in Mayor and Corporation of Tunbridge Wells v. Baird in the House of Lords, it has been said in this particular case that the local authority get something more than that; that they have got not only the surface necessary for the purposes of the street and the column of air necessary for the purpose of the street, but also the soil usque ad inferos and the column of air above usque ad cœlum. The learned judge has adopted that conclusion, and I am sorry to say that, great respect as I have for the opinion of the learned judge, and great as the diffidence is with which I venture to differ from him, I am unable to follow him in this instance in his reasoning. His reasoning is this: He said the turnpike trustees, for the purpose of their road, acquired the absolute fee simple in the soil, and that therefore it must be taken that that is, as it were, a parliamentary declaration that the whole of the soil, the fee simple, was necessary for the purposes of the road, and the fee simple being necessary for the purposes of the road or street, then the local authority come in, and though having their rights only under the 149th section, which vests in them the street, the effect must be, that that which is vested in them is all that was acquired by the turnpike trustees for the purposes of their road; and because it must be assumed that the trustees acquired the soil usque ad inferos, for the purposes of the road, therefore the section of the Public Health Act vests the same, neither more nor less, in the local authority, notwithstanding the decisions which determines how much the local authority do get because they get it compulsorily without paying for it under the Act of Parliament. It seems to me that the standard which determines this question is, not how much below the owner has to give, but how much the local authority under the Public Health Act have the right to take. It does not seem to me that their right to take, or that which is given to them by virtue of their position, is any larger or any smaller by reference to the ownership of the soil below. It may be in one owner or it may be in twenty, but they take what they want and they take no more; and inasmuch as somebody must own the soil below they take their quantum from somebody, whether the somebody be one or more persons. To say that the soil is owned by a person who cannot point to the particular people for whom he is a trustee or who are beneficially interested in it, and that therefore the public authority under this particular section got more than they would get in the case where they could point to the owner beneficially interested, would not be capable of any logical justification. I hope I am not doing injustice to the learned judge's view, but as far as I understand it, that is the principle upon which he went. He says this: "It appears to me that the Act of Parliament when it says that the streets or roads shall vest in the local authority has said that so much of the land as is required for the purposes of the road shall vest in them, and that when another Act of Parliament has authorized trustees to acquire land in fee simple for the purposes of the road it is impossible for any court to say that the whole fee simple was not so acquired and required. Consequently in this particular case I have referred to the circumstances of the case, as did all the courts in the cases that have come before them heretofore; they have seen what was required for the purposes of the road. I have got something more than the actual physical requirements, because I have got the Act of Parliament authorizing the acquisition for the purposes of the road, and that being so, it appears to me I am bound to say that this land was acquired and required for the purposes of the road." Therefore he makes the standard here—for what purpose did the original owners require it, and how much did they get when they did acquire it; and then he holds that it all comes to the local authority under the operation of the 149th section of the Public Health Act. For the reasons which I have given I cannot agree with that view.

The particular point here is that the plaintiffs are an electric lighting company without any statutory powers, and they put up their wires at a point which it is admitted is outside what I have called the area of the user of the street. If the defendants were obliged to rely upon the decision in Coverdale v. Charlton, and to measure their rights by the standard laid down in that and the succeeding cases, they admit that these wires do not encroach upon that area. They rest their case on the ground, as I have said, that owing to the peculiar circumstances under which the soil of this road was held before they got it, they have got something more than they could have got under the ordinary law. Therefore we are dealing with a case where the wires in question are clearly outside the area of user, and the right to interfere with them must be justified by ownership in fee.

For the reasons I have given I think that that is not a reasonable contention, and the appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendants can only claim that the road in question here, the Regent's Park-road, became vested in the urban authority in the full sense in which they seek to maintain that it has been vested by relying on section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875. Now that section has received by this time an authoritative definition by many cases which have shown what its true effect is. It was not by that section intended to vest in the public authority, or the urban authority, what I may call the full rights in fee of a street, as if that street was owned by an ordinary owner in fee having the fullest rights both as to the soil below and as to the air above. It is settled that the section in question was only intended to vest in the urban authority so much of the actual soil of the street as might be necessary for the control, protection, and maintenance of the street as a highway for public use. It would be sufficient for me to show that that is so by referring to what was said by the Lord Chancellor in the case of the Mayor and Corporation of Tunbridge Wells v. Baird, and also by Lord Herschell in the same case. Therefore section 149 was only intended to vest in the urban authority certain physical property, a certain limited physical part of the street, and what that physical part is is what I have already stated. That section has nothing to do with title; it is not considering a question of title. No matter what the title is of the person who owns the street, the section only considers how much of that street shall vest in the urban authority, and accordingly it does not matter whether the owner of this street at the time of vesting was a private owner or a trustee for a private owner, or a trustee for a charity, or a trustee for a turnpike trust, or any other trustee. Questions of title in reference to section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875, are wholly irrelevant. The section is intended to vest, as I have said, a physical property in the urban authority, and has nothing to do with the question of title.

Now that really concludes this case. But I will add a few words with respect to the view which appears to have been taken by my brother Farwell in regard to the case as showing how he arrived at the conclusion he has done. If I rightly understand him, he says, in the first place, that inasmuch as you find the turnpike trustees got their portion of the road in question here on which the whole case turns, in trust for making the turnpike road or for throwing it into the turnpike road—got the full fee, if I may use that expression—therefore you must conclude that the whole fee is necessarily to be vested in the urban authority: but, if I may say so with great respect to him, I do not think that is a right deduction. It might well be that under the Turnpike Road Act in question, if you look at its provisions, it was necessary for the turnpike trustees to acquire the full fee, possibly because the owners would not part with any less than the full fee; but, beyond that, the reason why the turnpike trustees had to get this portion of the road was, to follow the words of the Act, "for the purpose of widening, diverting, altering, and improving" the road. Those purposes are not the purposes for which streets are to vest in the urban authority under the 149th section of the Public Health Act. As I have pointed out, you only want to vest a portion of the street in them for the purpose of control, protection, and maintenance of the street as a highway for public use. This street or this portion of the street physically does not differ from any other street; there is nothing peculiar about this portion of the street which requires more of it to vest for the control, protection, and maintenance of the street than any other street. That being so, I respectfully think my brother Farwell has not come to a sound conclusion in basing his judgment on the point which he has.

As I gather he has also taken another point, which is this: He has pointed out if there is a legal estate outstanding, which there must be in the representatives of the old turnpike trustees, it is difficult to say who the holder of that estate is a trustee for, and therefore he seems to suggest that the legal estate may be or ought to be held in trust for the local authority. But it appears to me that if the local authority want to make out that the legal estate is held in trust for them the onus is upon them to do so, and they certainly have not discharged it; nor can the legal estate be said to be outstanding in trust for the public, as has been suggested on behalf of the respondents, whatever that may mean. If the legal estate were outstanding in somebody in trust for the public, all I can say is I cannot see how the local authority can be identified in that relationship with the public. The local authority want nothing but what they got under section 149, and have got nothing in them beyond what is conferred by section 149, and how that is limited I have already shown. Nor can it be said finally that the local authority is in possession of anything more than what is vested in them under section 149; really the local authority is only in possession of exactly that which was vested in them by virtue of section 149, and nothing more nor less.

It appears, therefore, to me that the judgment of the court below is not correct, and that the appeal must be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree with the views which have been expressed, and I have very few words to add.

It seems to me the judgment under appeal can only be supported on the ground that everything acquired by the turnpike trustees under the deed of 1828 has vested in the defendants. I look in vain to discover any section having that operation and effect. The only section relied on is section 149. That section fixes the subject-matter, which is vested by reference to what is required for the ordinary user of a street as a street. It is wholly irrespective of the title to the stratum of the subsoil below or to the air above. I think it has been decided by all the courts that that is the meaning of section 149.

I therefore think the appeal should be allowed.

Solicitors, Benham & Meyer; A. M. M Forbes.

---

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. } Feb. 9.

In re INNES & CO. (IN LIQUIDATION). (a.)

Company—Contributory—Issue of fully-paid shares without consideration—Liability of allottee—Ultra vires.

Two vendors arranged to sell their business and patent rights to a company to be formed for £6,000, payable as to £3,000 in cash and as to £3,000 in fully paid shares. By a subsequent agreement, duly filed, the vendors purported to sell the said assets to the company for £25,000, payable as to £3,000 in cash and as to £22 000 in fully-paid shares, to be allotted to the vendors "or their nominees." After satisfying the £6,000 payable to the vendors under the earlier arrangement, the remaining shares were allotted as fully paid-up shares without consideration amongst six persons, three of whom were directors of the company. No prospectus was ever issued, and there was admittedly no intention of placing any shares upon the public market.

Held, upon a claim by the liquidator of the company against the three director allottees, that they were liable as contributories who had paid nothing in respect of the shares allotted to them.

This was a summons taken out by the liquidator of the above-named company against four respondents for a declaration that they were severally liable as contributories in respect of certain shares in the said company allotted to them as fully paid up, or in the alternative that the respondents were jointly and severally liable to make good the loss sustained by the company through the issue without consideration of the shares in question.

The material facts were as follows:

Prior to the formation of the company, Robert Innes and John Hepburn Innes carried on business as paint manufacturers, and they also owned a patent for a method of preventing corrosion in steam boilers.

In 1899 they entered into an arrangement with Messrs. Cockerline, Samman, and Hagerup, three of the respondents to this summons, and with three other persons, whereby the property was to be sold for £6,000 to a company to be formed. The £6,000 was to be paid as to £3,000 in cash and as to £3,000 in shares.

On the 7th of December, 1899, the company was duly incorporated and was launched as a private company, with a capital of £25,000 in 2,500 shares of £10 each.

(a.) Reported by ALAN C. NESBITT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The only shareholders were the two Messrs. Innes, the Messrs. Cockerline, Samman, and Hagerup, and the three other persons, and the directors were the respondents—viz., Robert Innes and Messrs. Cockerline, Samman, and Hagerup. The shares were allotted in manner following: Messrs. Cockerline, Samman, and Hagerup, and the other three persons first took 50 shares each, for which they paid in cash. This answered for £3,000. The Messrs. Innes jointly took 300 shares as part of the purchase-money. That answered for another £3,000. Of the remaining 1,900 shares, representing the remaining £19,000, each of the six above-mentioned persons took 300 for his own benefit, while the outstanding 100 shares were held in suspense in joint names for purposes of making bonus payments to persons introducing business to the company. No prospectus was issued, and there was no intention to go to the public with shares.

In pursuance of the above-mentioned arrangement an agreement dated the 23rd of March, 1900, was entered into between the Messrs. Innes, as vendors, of the one part, and the company of the other part, whereby Messrs. Innes purported to sell their business and patent rights to the company for £25,000, as to £3,000 in cash, and as to £22,000 by the allotment to the vendors or their nominees of 2,200 fully-paid shares in the company, and this agreement was duly registered on the 28th of March, and the shares were duly allotted in the manner above stated. In November, 1901, the company went into voluntary liquidation, and in January, 1902, the liquidation was ordered to be continued under the supervision of the court. The liquidator sought to make each of the respondents liable as a contributory for the amount of the fully-paid shares which he received without payment therefor. He also claimed in the alternative on the ground of misfeasance. No fraud was imputed to the respondents, and it was agreed that the claim for liability as contributories should be disposed of before the alternative claim was opened.

Gore Browne, K.C., and Cozens-Hardy, for the liquidator.—The consideration stated in the agreement was merely illusory, and we can therefore go behind it whether it is filed or not: In re Theatrical Trust (Limited), Chapman's case, 43 W. R. 553, [1895] 1 Ch. 771. We are not bound to impeach the contract itself. The whole transaction was ultra vires under the Companies Act, for the shares were allotted for nothing, and in addition these persons were in a fiduciary relation to the company: In re Almada and Tirito Co., 36 W. R. 593, 38 Ch. D. 415.

They also cited In re Wragg (Limited), 45 W. R. 557, [1897] 1 Ch. 796; In re Newman & Co., 43 W. R. 483, [1895] 1 Ch. 674; In re Carriage Co-operative Association, 33 W. R. 411, 27 Ch. D. 322; and In re Morvah Consols Tin Mining Co., 24 W. R. 49, 2 Ch. D. 1.

Upjohn, K.C., and Jessel, for the respondents.—It is untrue to say that all that the company acquired was that which came from Messrs. Innes; it also acquired the capital, influence, and experience of the gentlemen who identified themselves with it; that was a reason for the consideration stated in the agreement being more than that agreed to be paid for the assets of Messrs. Innes. The court will not go behind the agreement on the mere question of sufficiency of consideration, and no mala fides is suggested; moreover, no one was damnified, because everyone was a party to the agreement; it was a private company, and the public were not deceived. That point was exactly covered by In re Ambrose Lake Tin and Copper Co, 28 W. R. 783, 14 Ch. D 390.

They also referred to In re Western of Canada Oil &c., Co., 24 W. R. 165 1 Ch. D. 115; In re Cærphilly Colliery, 25 W. R. 618 5 Ch. D. 336; and Salomon v. Salomon & Co, 45 W. R. 193, [1897] A. C. 22.

KEKEWICH, J., stated the facts and continued: The point is a novel one, and although several cases point to the conclusion I have reached, they are only indications and not actual decisions. Now, these persons (i.e., the vendors) made an arrangement (I avoid calling it an agreement) with the persons who afterwards controlled the company that the property should be sold for £6,000, £3,000 payable in cash and £3,000 in shares; the vendors fixed their own price as being the maximum reasonable price. Having done that, they entered into the agreement of the 23rd of March, 1900, and, as I take the evidence, it was thought fair and convenient that the company should be made to pay much more than £6,000—viz., £25,000—for what it acquired, and that no harm would be done if the extra shares were allotted to the promoters for their own benefit. Now this is not a case of moral fraud; that is not even suggested, but none the less it may be a case of "legal fraud" or "legal dishonesty." What happened was this: I take the case of Mr. Cockerline as a typical case. He had 300 shares allotted to him for which he paid, and was meant to pay, nothing. Can he now say, although he has paid nothing, that he can still hold them? The point which really impresses me is that the whole agreement was a sham; everybody knew that perfectly well, and that the property was worth only £6,000, and that the vendors could not have got one penny more for it. Yet for the purposes of the formal agreement which was put upon the file, the £6,000 was raised to £25,000, the object being to put all the extra shares in the directors' control for their own benefit. The value had been fixed at £6,000, and beyond that there was no value. The directors therefore knowingly paid a larger sum in shares for absolutely nothing. In my opinion they could no more do that than allot to anyone at 80 or 90 per cent. If they cannot do that, you are only reducing the proposition to its extreme limit in saying they cannot allot at nothing.

Two or three arguments put forward on behalf of the respondents deserve notice. First, it is said the court will not interfere with the estimate of the vendors of property as to its value; if people choose to be foolish enough to pay too much for what they buy still the court will not go behind the agreement which fixes the price. The answer to that is that in the present case there never was any estimate of value except the £6,000 figure, and it is absurd to treat the agreement as fixing the price when in fact it did nothing of the sort. Further, it is said that everybody concurred in and was a party to the agreement, and knowingly took shares upon the footing of the agreement, and it was never intended to put the shares on the public market. Now that is quite true; no one can now deny it, and everybody is bound by it. But in the cases to which I have been referred the acts in question have all been acts intra vires the company, but, if my view is right, this allotment was wholly ultra vires the company, and not possible in law. Then there was the argument based upon In re Western of Canada Oil, &c., Co., where Mellish, L.J., says 1 Ch. D., at p. 128: "The shares in question were not allotted in pursuance of any contract made between the directors and the particular director to whom the allotment was made, but Walker being entitled to have paid-up shares allotted either to himself or his nominees, desired that they should be allotted to particular directors as his nominees, and they were accordingly so allotted." But that upon the facts was not at all the case I have to deal with; here they were allotted to the directors on the nomination of the vendors, who were not really themselves entitled to them. Upon the whole, therefore, although there may be in words some difficulty in going behind the formal agreement (which is not sought to be set aside), yet I think, having regard to the evidence, that I ought to say that what was done was done in pursuance of the arrangement, and not of the agreement, which was merely a colourable agreement, and that I am bound to make these three gentlemen (only three are before me, for the respondent Robert Innes cannot be made liable) liable as contributories who have paid nothing upon their shares for the full amount remaining unpaid thereon. Declaration accordingly.

Solicitors, Burn & Berridge; F. W. Hill.

---

Chan. Div. }
Byrne, J. } Nov. 29.

In re The Lord Mayor of Sheffield and the Trustees of St. William's Roman Catholic Chapel and Schools, Sheffield. (a.)

Charity—Roman Catholic school—Sale with the consent of "bishop for the time being"—Persons "absolutely entitled"—Charity Commissioners—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 69—Charitable Trusts Act, 1853.

Trustees of buildings used as a Roman Catholic school who have power, with the consent of the Roman Catholic bishop of the diocese for the time being to sell the premises and give receipt for purchase-money, are persons "absolutely entitled" under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 69, to receive payment out of the purchase-money for such premises paid into court under the said Act; and the consent of the Charity Commissioners to such payment out is not required.

Petition.

This was a petition by the trustees of St. William's Roman Catholic Chapel and School, Sheffield, for the payment out to them as persons "absolutely entitled" under section 69 of the Land Clauses Act, 1845, of the sum of £1,500, being the purchase price of certain leasehold premises consisting of a schoolhouse and premises conveyed by an indenture dated the 8th of October, 1902, to the Corporation of Sheffield, and of which the said purchase-money had been paid into court by the said corporation on the 3rd of October, 1902.

The petition was only served on the Sheffield Corporation.

The facts of the case were as follows: By an indenture bearing date the 16th of April, 1863, the said leasehold premises were conveyed to the said trustees to hold for the residue of a term of 800 years created in 1720 upon trust to permit the schoolhouse to be used as a residence for a schoolmaster or schoolmistress, or both, and to be further used as a week-day school for Roman Catholic children as therein mentioned, with power with the consent of the Roman Catholic bishop of the diocese in which the district was situate for the time being, to sell the said premises or any part thereof, and to give a full discharge for the purchase-money.

The Corporation of the City of Sheffield, acting as the urban district council of the said city, under the powers conferred on them by the Working Classes Act, 1890, the Local Government Board Provisional Orders Confirmation (Housing of the Working Classes) Acts, 1894 and (No. 2) 1898, and the Land Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, had agreed to purchase the premises for the sum above mentioned, such sum to include all claims for compensation, for loss, injury, or damage, and the sum had been duly assessed under the Land Clauses Consolidation Act.

Kenyon Parker, for the trustees.—The trustees are persons "absolutely entitled" to the money within the meaning of the Land Clauses Consolidation Act, and are therefore entitled to receive the money, which they require for the purpose of their trusts. No consent of the Charity Commissioners is probably necessary under the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853: In re Spurstowe's Charity, 22 W. R. 566, L. R. 18 Eq. 279; In re Hobson's Trusts, 26 W. R. 470, 7 Ch. D. 708. A doubt, however, exists on the matter because of the decision in In re Smith, 37 W. R. 199, 40 Ch. D. 386.

R. J. Parker, for the corporation.

Tudor on Charitable Trusts (3rd ed.), pp. 281-282, was also referred to in the argument, and Byrne, J., referred to Bourchier-Chilcott's Administration of Charities (2nd ed.), p. 26.

Byrne, J.—In his decision of In re Morgan, 48 W. R. 670, [1900] 2 Ch. 474, Stirling, J., pointed out that In re Hobson's Trusts has not been overruled. It is therefore a binding authority. It follows that the petitioners are absolutely entitled, and the consent of the Charity Commissioners is not required under the Charitable Trusts Act. I will make the order.

Solicitors, Geare & Pease, for Wake & Sons, Sheffield; Richard F. & C. L. Smith, for the Town Clerk of Sheffield.

---

Chan. Div. }
Farwell, J. } Jan. 15.

Leeds Forge Co. (Limited) v. Deighton's Patent Flue and Tube Co. (Limited). (a.)

Practice—Costs—Court of Appeal—Witness not called—Taxing-master's discretion—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 58, r. 4; ord. 65, r. 27 (29).

Where special leave to adduce certain evidence before the Court of Appeal had not been obtained, and a witness who was present to give this evidence was not called upon, the taxing-master held that he had discretion under R. S. C., 1883, ord. 65, r. 27 (29), to allow the costs of this witness.

Held, that there was nothing on which the taxing-master could exercise his discretion, and that the costs of the witness should be disallowed.

Summons.

This was an application on behalf of the plaintiffs in the action to vary the taxing-master's certificate. The action originally came on before Cozens-Hardy, J., and was decided in favour of the plaintiffs, but this decision was afterwards reversed in the Court of Appeal, and the plaintiffs were ordered to pay the defendant's costs in the court below as well as in the Court of Appeal.

The plaintiffs objected to pay certain items on taxation, but the master on consideration overruled their objections and made his certificate.

(a.) Reported by J. Arthur Price, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by J. H. Davies, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The present summons to review the taxation was then taken out by the plaintiffs, who objected to two items only—viz., the sum allowed for the counsel's view of the defendant's works, and the allowance to Mr. J. C., a witness who had attended the Court of Appeal to give evidence, but who was not called.

As to the counsel's view, the taxing-master stated, applying the amended sub-rule 29, ord. 65, r. 27, that the expense was properly incurred.

As to the second item it appeared that the defendants had obtained leave to adduce in evidence two sections of flues made by J. Brown & Co. (Limited) but they did not apply for leave to adduce in evidence a section of flue made by Messrs. C. D. Holmes & Co., and no evidence was given on that point. Mr. J. C. was the witness defendants had intended to call on the latter flue.

The taxing-master held that the allowance was reasonable and proper, and on the authority of Oliver v. Robins, 43 W. R. 137, considered that the court would not in a matter of this kind interfere with his discretion.

A. J. Walter, for the plaintiff.

T. Terrell, K.C., and J. C. Graham, for defendants.

FARWELL, J., held that the first item allowed, although undoubtedly unusual, was still a matter for the taxing-master's discretion. The second item raised a rather novel point. This was not a case in a court of first instance, where the taxing-master held that the litigant was justified in bringing a witness to court although he was not called. This was a case of further evidence in the Court of Appeal. No special leave had been obtained by the defendants under ord. 58, r. 4, to adduce the evidence of J. C., and the witness was not called. There was nothing on which the taxing-master could exercise his judgment. He must disallow the costs of that particular witness.

The result was that the application succeeded as to the latter point but failed as to the first item.

Solicitors for plaintiff, Vincent & Vincent, for Day & Yewdale, Leeds.

Solicitors for defendants, Harrison & Davies, for Carter, Rumsden, & Carter, Leeds.

---

Chan. Div. (Buckley, J.) Dec. 11, 16.

TOLLER v. SPIERS & POND. (a.)

Factory—Two separate factories in one building—Common owner—Works required for protection from fire of both factories—Right of entry of owner to execute works — Validity of notice — "Tenement factory"—"Power supplied"—Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (1 Ed. 7, c. 22), ss. 14 (2) (7); 149 (1).

Separate factories within the same building do not together constitute a tenement factory within section 149 (1) of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, unless the mechanical power which is supplied to them is supplied from a common source.

Where two separate factories in the same building which do not together constitute a tenement factory have a common owner, the owner has no right under section 14 of that Act, as against the occupier of one factory, to enter on that factory to do works which are reasonably required for the protection from fire of the other factory, by reason of the fact that works are also reasonably required for the protection of the factory on which he proposes to enter, even though such works are the same (or nearly the same) for both factories.

A building contained two separate factories, each supplying its own mechanical power. The local authority, purporting to act under section 14 (2) of the Act, served on the owner of the building a notice requiring him to construct certain works for the protection from fire of the two factories jointly

Held, that the notices was invalid, because (1) the two factories did not constitute a tenement factory, and were not, therefore, one factory within section 14 (2); and (2) it did not specify what works were required for the protection of both factories considered separately.

Held, consequently, that the owner had no power, as against the occupier of one factory, to enter his premises to execute works required for the protection of the other factory.

Action with witnesses.

In this action the plaintiff was the owner, within the meaning of the Factory Acts, of a large building situate in Upper Thames-street, of which the lower part—that is to say, from the basement to the fourth floor (with the exception of the second floor), was in the occupation of the defendants and constituted one factory (hereinafter called factory A), while the fifth to the seventh floors constituted another factory (hereinafter called factory B), and were in the occupation of Messrs. Farwig. Each factory supplied its own mechanical power. The only staircases in the building were at the northern end.

The London County Council, as the authority empowered by the Factory Acts to deal with such cases, were advised that if a fire broke out in the middle of the building the southern end might be cut off from means of escape. The council had no power to interfere with the second floor, because it was not a factory. The scheme, therefore, which they adopted was the construction of a staircase at the southern end, commencing at the third floor, going up to the top floor, and communicating with the intermediate floors.

On the 13th of December, 1900, they served a certain notice under the Act which was then in force. This was now immaterial, except so far as it was incorporated into a later notice. An arbitration took place between the council and the plaintiff, which resulted in an award of the 4th of March, 1902.

In the interval the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, had been passed, and the award was made under that Act, which is the Act now in force. In substance the award found that the building as a whole was not provided with such means of escape in case of fire as could reasonably be required; that the building contained two factories (A and B), and that the second floor was not a factory. It then found that certain staircases which had been proposed could not be reasonably required, because the occupiers of the second floor did not consent, and further awarded that the notice which the council had served should be amended so as to include the construction of the staircase above described.

Consequent upon that the council on the 10th of July, 1902, served an amended notice reciting the award, showing that it referred to the building as a whole, and requiring the construction of that staircase. Upon the question whether the staircase in question was reasonably required for the protection of factories A and B, or one and which of them, the relevant words of the award were these: "I find that a suitable staircase (describing it) communicating with each floor of the building intermediate between the third and seventh would materially diminish the risk of injury or loss of life in case of a fire breaking out in any of the upper floors of the building, and would be reasonably required."

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question to be determined in the action was whether the plaintiff was entitled to compel the defendants to allow him to enter upon their demised premises for the purpose of executing the works described in the notice of the 10th of July, 1902.

Astbury, K.C., and R. J. Parker for the plaintiff.—The owner has power to enter on the premises demised to the defendants: Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, s. 14 (2). All the provisions of that section have been complied with. The two factories together constitute a tenement factory within section 149 (1), and a tenement factory is one factory: section 14 (7). The notice, therefore, relating to the building as a whole, which has been served on the owner, is a good notice. The definition of a factory contained in section 149 (1) is sufficiently wide to include a separate building and a floor in a larger building. Some meaning must be given to the word "separate" in the definition of a tenement factory, and a separate factory is a factory which is in a building where there are other factories. A tenement factory is, therefore, a building in which there are two or more separate factories. Provided that mechanical power is "used," it is immaterial from what source it is "supplied." [BUCKLEY, J.—The words "where mechanical power is supplied" in the definition of a tenement factory are redundant, unless they mean "supplied in a particular manner"; and that manner can only be "from a common source"] Even if the two factories do not together constitute a tenement factory, the award finds, and if it does not, we are in a position to prove that the staircase is reasonably necessary for the protection of both factories; the notice to the plaintiff is therefore good on that ground, and he has power to enter on both factories to construct it. They called evidence to show that the staircase was reasonably necessary for the protection of both factories.

Buckmaster, K.C., and A. C. Clauson, for the defendants.—The plaintiff has no right, apart from section 14, to trespass on our factory to carry out works. The two factories are not a tenement factory. The notice served by the London County Council is therefore bad. They ought to have considered what steps were necessary for the protection of each factory separately, and served a notice on the owner in respect of each. All the subsequent proceedings, being based on a bad notice, are ineffective. It is not sufficient to prove now that the council considers that the work is reasonably necessary for the protection of each factory considered separately.

Astbury, K.C., in reply.—The Act does not require a separate notice to be served on the owner in respect of each factory. Provided that the staircase is required for the protection of both factories, it is immaterial that it is more necessary for the one than for the other. With regard to what is reasonably necessary, the only persons who have a locus standi are the local authority and the owner. The owner is compellable to carry out the award, notwithstanding any agreement with the occupier. The plaintiff, as the owner of the whole building, is entitled to waive any informality in the notice.

London County Council v. Lewis, 69 L. J. Q. B. 277, 48 W. R. Dig. 64, and London County Council v. Brass, 17 Times L. R. 504, were referred to.

BUCKLEY, J., in giving judgment, said: The defendants say that the plaintiff has not the right adversely to them to enter upon their demised premises to execute that work. The plaintiff asserts that he has. This is the question to be determined. It is clear that the plaintiff has no such right unless the statute gives it to him. Thus the question is whether the statute gives it him. Upon this the first material inquiry is whether the two factories (factory A and factory B) constitute what the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, calls a "tenement factory" so as to be deemed one factory. By section 14 (7) of that Act it is provided that for the purposes of that section the whole of a tenement factory shall be deemed to be one factory. Section 149 defines a tenement factory. I do not read the definition at length. To ascertain whether factories A and B are a tenement factory or not, I must first see whether they are in one building. The answer is in the affirmative. Then is each of them in law a separate factory? I think it is. A factory, textile or non-textile, is defined in the earlier part of the same section, and means premises wherein mechanical power is used for some purpose as there defined. But is this a factory where mechanical power is "supplied to different parts of the same building occupied by different persons"? I think plainly it is not. Those words obviously do not mean simply a factory where mechanical power is used. That is already involved in the word "factory." They point not to the user, but to the "supply" of mechanical power to different parts of the same building—a supply, for instance, by the occupier of the one factory to the occupier of the other factory, or a supply to both from some external source by a third person, including and perhaps meaning the person of whom the tenement is held. The owner of a tenement factory, whether he is an occupier or not, is responsible for many matters relating to the factory instead of the occupier, including matters relating to machinery: see section 87. Every factory is one which uses mechanical power, and the words "where mechanical power is supplied," &c., cannot mean to repeat something which is already imported by the use of the word "factory." Moreover, the verb is not "used," but "supplied," meaning, I think, "taken by the factory occupier from a source of supply external to himself." The factories A and B in the present case are, so to speak, self-contained factories. Each factory occupier produces his own mechanical power by arrangements within his own factory. Factories A and B are, in my judgment, for all purposes of the Act separate factories, and do not constitute a tenement factory. It results that the council here have to do with two separate factories.

I look next to see what powers the statute gives to the owner of factory A, as against the occupier of factory A, to require the latter to allow the former to enter upon his premises to do works. The only right is under section 14 (2) of the Act of 1901. Let me take four cases, assuming that in each case there is a common owner of A and B. First suppose that A is not a factory at all, but that B, the factory above, is in danger of fire, and that the council think it reasonably necessary to make a staircase through A for the protection of B. It is plain that the owner has no power to do anything of the kind as against the occupier of A. In that case A is not within the Act at all. This has, in fact, been decided in London County Council v. Lewis. It is exactly what has occurred here with reference to the second floor of this building. Secondly, suppose that A is a factory but is effectually provided, so far as it is concerned, with means of escape in case of fire, but that B is not so provided. Is there anything in the Act to enable the owner of factory A to enter, as against the occupier of factory A, to do works for the benefit of factory B? In my judgment there is not. This seems to be involved in London County Council v. Brass, although the report is not very clear. The effect of section 14 (2) is, in my judgment, that the owner of the factory which is in danger can be required to carry out works for the protection of the factory which is in danger, and that the owner of that factory has power to execute works so reasonably required "notwithstanding any agreement with the occupier" of that factory. The statute gives him, as against his tenant, the right to enter and do works required in respect of the property included in the demise, but it gives him no other rights. Whether the works are "reasonably required" or not, is to be determined in manner directed by the statute. I may pause here to say that a point was raised that the occupier was not present when the award was made, and is not, therefore, bound by the award. This, I think, is a false point. The machinery of the Act is to provide statutory means for determining what are the means of escape reasonably required. That machinery includes an arbitration between the council and the owner. When the machinery of the Act has been honestly used, and the means of escape reasonably required has been ascertained, the statute gives the owner, as against the occupier, the right to enter and do those works. But, thirdly, suppose both factories are unsafe, has the owner of both, as against the occupier of one of them—e g., factory A—any right to enter and execute works for the protection of factory B by reason of the fact, which is here assumed, that works are also reasonably required for factory A? I think not. The only right, as against the occupier of factory A, is to enter and do works for the protection of factory A. The existence of that right does not carry with it the further right at the same time to do further or other or any works for the benefit of factory B. Lastly, suppose that works which are (or to a large extent are) the same for both are reasonably required for the benefit of both A and B, is the owner entitled to enter on the occupier of A so execute a work which will be available for both by opening an escape for persons in A through B and for persons in B through A. I think not. The only operation of the statute is that it is no trespass for the owner of A to enter against the occupier of A to do works for the benefit of A. It gives no power to open through A an exit for persons in B. Those persons in passing through A would be trespassers. The statute does not render this not a trespass.

With these observations upon the scope of the Act I pass to that which the London County Council have done. [His lordship then stated the facts as to the award and notices, and continued:] It seems to me that in the acts thus done the council can only have proceeded legally under the Act if the fact were (as in my judgment it is not) that the building in question is a tenement factory, and is therefore to be deemed one factory. They have never taken upon themselves to ascertain and have never given any notice based upon any conclusion as to what is necessary for the protection of factory A as a separate factory. Treating A and B together they arrive at certain conclusions with regard to a work which will benefit both, and will do so by opening to each a means of escape through the premises of the other. What conclusion they would have arrived at if they had considered A alone, and [or] upon the footing that they could not give each a right of escape through the premises of the other I find myself quite unable to say. They might, for instance, have recommended simply as regards factory A that the skids or floor openings between the third and fourth floors should be closed, and a staircase constructed at the southern end giving communication between the third and fourth floors. In the case of a fire in either of those two floors there would then have been the means to reach the staircase at the northern end by going up or down, as the case might be, to the other of them and passing to the northern end of the building I only give this as an illustration. The point is that the works reasonably required for factory A, if that factory alone had to be considered, have not been taken into consideration by the council, and they have not given any notice to do works other than works for the benefit of factories A and B considered jointly, and the works specified are works which would give to each a means of escape through the premises of the other. Under section 14 (2) of the Act of 1901 it was the duty of the council, I think, to serve on the owner of factory A a notice in writing specifying the measure necessary for providing means of escape reasonably required for persons in factory A. The owner, as against the occupier of factory A, would have been entitled to enter and do those works. But, as it seems to me, the proceedings which have been taken in respect of the two factories jointly have been wrongly taken and are ineffectual, and the works required are, for the reasons I have stated, inadmissible. To support this action it is necessary to find in the Act a provision that two factories which have a common owner shall for the purposes of section 14 be deemed to be one factory. There is no such provision in the Act. I have thus decided simply the question of law (an important one, no doubt) which arises upon the construction of this statute. What has been the particular cause of friction between the plaintiff and defendants I do not know. It is not material to anything which I have to decide. I think that the plaintiff is wrong in contending that he has against the defendants a legal right to enter and do these works. This is the whole question involved in the action. On this question the plaintiff, in my judgment, is wrong. I dismiss the action, with costs.

Solicitors, Peake, Bird, Collins, & Co.; Linklater, Addison, Brown, & Jones.

---

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). Nov. 14.

BEDDINGTON AND ANOTHER v. BAUMANN AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Power—Appointment—Settled land—Lease by appointor after exercise of power by will—Lease with premium—"Capital money"—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), ss. 24, 27—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 22 sub-section 5 —Settled Land Act, 1884 47 & 48 Vict. c. 18), s. 4.

Real estate was settled for A. H. B. for his life, and after his death for his children as he should by will appoint, and in default of appointment for his children generally as therein provided. A. H. B. appointed part of the estate to one son and part to another, and afterwards granted leases under the Settled Land Act, 1882, of parts of the appointed property and received large premiums, which were paid to trustees of the settlement and invested.

Held, that the appointments did not include the premiums, for the will of A. H. B. showed no intention of dealing with them, and therefore they went as in default of appointment under the settlement.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (sub. nom. Beddington v Beddington, In re Moses, [1902] 1 Ch. 100, 50 W. R Dig. 131) affirmed.

Gale v. Gale, 4 W. R. 277, 21 Beav. 349, approved.

---

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Henry Moses, by his will made in March, 1873, devised to trustees his freehold estate upon trust for his son, A. H. Beddington, for his life, and after his death for all and every the child and children of A. H Beddington, or for any one or more exclusively of the others of them, and for such estates, interests, and in such shares and proportions, manner and form, as A. H. Beddington should by his will appoint, and in default of such appointment, and so far as the same should not extend, for all his children, who being sons should attain twenty-one, or being daughters should attain that age or marry, as tenants in common in certain shares as therein provided.

H. Moses died in 1875, and A. H. Beddington made a will in 1892 by which he appointed part of the estate to one of his sons, and part to another.

In 1895 A. H. Beddington granted leases under the Settled Land Act, 1882, of parts of the appointed property and received large premiums which were paid to the trustees of the will of H. Moses and invested by them.

A. H. Beddington died in June, 1900.

It was held by the Court of Appeal that the appointments did not include the premiums, that the will of A. H. Beddington showed no intention of dealing with them, and consequently they passed as in default of appointment under the settlement made by H. Moses's will: In re Moses, Beddington v. Beddington, [1902] 1 Ch. 100, 50 W. R. Dig. 131.

By the Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict c. 38): Section 22 (5).—"Capital money arising under this Act while remaining uninvested or unapplied, and securities on which an investment of any such capital money is made, shall for all purposes of disposition, transmission, and devolution be considered as land, and the same shall be held for and go to the same persons successively in the same manner, and for and on the same estates, interests, and trusts, as the land wherefrom the money arises would, if not disposed of, have been held and have gone under the settlement."

By the Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26): Section 24.—"Every will shall be construed with reference to the real estate and personal estate comprised in it to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will."

Haldane, K.C., Norton, K.C., and J. G. Fawcus, for the appellants, cited Gale v. Gale, 4 W. R 277, 21 Beav. 349, which was criticized by Lord St. Leonards in his work on Powers, c. 7, s. 7 (8th ed.), p. 308; and in In re Johnstone's Settlement, 28 W. R. 593, 14 Ch. D. 162.

Blake v. Blake, 28 W. R. 647, 15 Ch. D. 481, and In re Dowsett, 49 W. R 268, [1901] 1 Ch. 398, were also referred to.

Levett, K.C., Upjohn, K.C., Wace, and Leverson, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—When the facts which raise this question come to be understood, and the only questions which are subjects for deliberation sufficiently appear, the matter is really reduced to a very narrow compass. I confess for myself that I am so very well satisfied with the judgments which have been already delivered by the Court of Appeal that I should be content simply to say that I affirm those judgments and have nothing to add; but simply for the sake of clearness, to show what points are, in my opinion, established as matters of law, I propose to state very shortly what appears to me to follow from the judgments so delivered, in the reasoning of which I entirely concur. In the first place, the question is simply what is the effect and meaning of the will which, under the circumstances of this case, is supposed to be under construction—I say supposed to be under construction, because it is not a fact that there is anything ambiguous in the language of the will itself. The question is whether, in the language of Cozens-Hardy, L.J., the general principle is applicable to the determination of this case that, where you are dealing with a will which is an ambulatory document, you have no right to refer to the circumstances under which it was made, or the date at which it was made, or the property that existed at the time when it was made; you are remitted by virtue of section 24 of the Wills Act to the moment of death to show what it is that is being disposed of. In passing, I may say that the effort which has been made to fix upon the word "property" some such signification as to evade the proper application of that provision appears to me to be disposed of by the interpretation which the Wills Act itself in its interpretation clause gives to the word "property." Practically, therefore, it comes to this, whether, apart from any special direction or language in the instrument—whether it was a disposition of the man's own property, or whether it was an appointment, seems to me to be for this purpose perfectly immaterial—you can find in the instrument that the person who made that testamentary instrument has made a disposition, if it was property, or executed a power of appointment, if it was a power of appointment, in such words and under such circumstances as to show that he was not devising the particular property alone, but that he was intending that something which should represent that property, if it had undergone a change between the two periods—the time of the death and the time of the making of the instrument—should nevertheless pass to the person whom he had made his devisee or appointee. Of course, the broad proposition which Cozens-Hardy, L.J., lays down cannot be doubted. When you are dealing with a will you are dealing with an ambulatory instrument, and it operates nothing, and can operate nothing till it becomes consummated by the death of the testator—it must wait till then. That is a principle which I think no one has controverted or can controvert—that it must speak from the date of the death of the testator, as section 24 of the Wills Act says, in relation to the property of the testator, whether it is real or personal, or, what comes within section 24 by virtue of the interpretation clause, a power of appointment which may be in him at the time of his death.

Now, the facts here are very simple. At the time of the making of the will the property in question did not exist; the property has emerged by the money being raised by way of fine on the making of a lease. But that is not the property dealt with, and the result appears to me to follow necessarily. I confess for myself that I have some little difficulty in understanding the distinction which it has been sought to raise between a special power of appointment and a general power of appointment. I have endeavoured in the course of the argument to see by what set of principles one is to draw any distinction between the two. I confess for myself that I have failed to do it. I do not follow it. I entirely concur in the judgment of Farwell, J., in In re Dowsett, that there is no distinction, and I have failed, I confess, to follow in what way a distinction is suggested. The result appears to me to be that this case is covered by authority, because I regard the case of Gale v. Gale as a very important and serious authority under the circumstances. It has now lasted for a very long time, with the commentaries made upon it. And notwithstanding the commentary made upon it by Lord St. Leonards, it appears to me that the effect of that case is conclusive.

I think that we could not decide this case in favour of these appellants without overruling that case. Under these circumstances, it appears to me that this judgment ought to be affirmed. I only wish to add one word to express my hearty concurrence with what Cozens-Hardy, L.J., says in that part of his judgment in which he says: "In each case it is a question of intention to be gathered from the words used and not from speculation as to what the testator would probably have desired. If the language used is such that a devise of his own property would have failed by reason of some subsequent act, an appointment under a special power in the same language must equally fail." It appears to me that those words are conclusive of this case, and I move accordingly.

Lord SHAND.—The judgment of Byrne, J., in this case was unanimously affirmed by the Court of Appeal, and again the judgment of their lordships in that court is now to be affirmed unanimously by your lordships. Under these circumstances, I feel that very little need now be said on my part in support of the judgment which is now to be given. It is not disputed that after the date of the appointment contained in the will of Mr. Beddington, in consideration of premiums of £1,500 in one case and £14,500 in the other, the property which was the subject of the appointment was deteriorated or burdened and changed, I might say; there was practically a conversion of the heritable estate, or a large part of it, into money. The money was no doubt invested in another way in the shape of Consols or otherwise, but still the estate was entirely changed in that respect. On the other hand, the appointment in its terms relates to the property only; it does not affect or refer to the money which has been realised from part of the property having been sold; it does not in its terms in any way deal with the proceeds that have been received from that sale. It appears to me that under those circumstances the general principle ought to receive effect that where a subject which has been given by the terms of the appointment is gone in part or in whole, the appointment cannot take effect upon the money which has been received as a substitute. The appointment does not profess to include or to refer to money which might be received if the property should be sold or converted in any way in future; and there is no deed subsequent to the appointment after the change had taken place, declaring that the moneys which the trustees had received were to go in the same way as the property appointed. In the absence of anything of this kind I cannot proceed on a conjectural view as to what may have been intended, but certainly not expressed in the terms used. I do not think that the testator can be held to have made an appointment which relates to that money. I would only say, further, that in my opinion the cases of Gale v Gale and Blake v. Blake have not only been well decided, but that the observations of the learned judges in support of those cases—namely, Lord Romilly, M.R., in the one, and Sir George Jessel, M.R., in the other—are sound in themselves. I entirely concur in those observations. The language of Sir George Jessel, M.R., in the case of Blake v. Blake expresses the view which I hold when he says: "The character of the thing given is changed by the act of the testator, and he has thereby revoked his will by destroying or preventing the continued existence of the subject-matter of the gift. . . . I do not feel myself at liberty to read this will in the manner suggested, as meaning that it gives whatever is comprised in the settlement in whatever shape it may exist." With the Lord Chancellor, I am in the position that I have been unable to follow, as I have desired to do as closely as I could, the distinction which it was attempted to draw between a general and special appointment, and I entirely concur in the observations made in In re Dowsett by Farwell, J., on that matter. On the whole matter, quite concurring with what the Lord Chancellor has said, I am of opinion that this appeal fails, and that we should adhere to the unanimous judgment of the court below.

Lord DAVEY.—I agree that this is a case which does not present any extraordinary difficulty, and it is satisfactory to find that the judgment which we are about to pronounce is in accordance with the views which have been expressed by all the learned judges before whom the case has been argued before it reached this House. It strikes me that the case is capable of being put upon an extremely simple and short ground, and that is the ground upon which I should prefer to put it. A gentlemen, having a power of appointment amongst his children under his father's will of certain estates in the City of London and the neighbourhood, makes his will and makes an appointment of certain of those properties. Afterwards he grants building leases for long terms of years in consideration of the payment of large sums of money by way of fine or premium. By the joint operation of section 4 of the Settled Land Act of 1884 and section 22, sub-section 5, of the Settled Land Act of 1882, those moneys received for fines and premiums became capital moneys within the meaning of the Act, and were held upon the same trusts and to go to the same persons as the lands from which they proceeded would have gone under the settlement, or, in other words, they became subject to the trusts of the settlement. I ask myself, therefore, what was the settlement to which they became subject? And the answer can only be: The settlement made by the will of the original testator, Mr. Moses. In my opinion, it cannot be suggested for one moment that the will of Mr. Beddington, who made the appointment, was part of that settlement. The will was an ambulatory document having no force or effect whatever until the death of the gentleman who made the will; and therefore, in my opinion, it cannot be said with the slightest plausibility that Mr. Beddington's will was part of the settlement upon the trusts of which these moneys were held. That being so, it appears to me that there is an end of the case, because the effect is this, that they became subject to a power of appointment by Mr. Beddington, and in default of appointment by him went in the specified and prescribed manner; and the only question which can possibly be raised is this: Is Mr. Beddington's will expressed in such language and in such large terms as to carry not only the property as it then existed, but also this property which has arisen from the particular dealings with it. Now, if I look at the will, I can find no words whatever which point to, or purport to deal in any manner whatever, with anything else than the property itself. I will take the Westminster Bridge-road property, for instance. He might have said: "And also all other capital moneys which shall at any time hereafter, by virtue of dealings with the property or otherwise, be held on the same trusts"; but there is nothing whatever in the will from which you can infer any such intention. So far as the property itself is concerned, the Westminster Bridge-road property still existed at the date of his death. I do not know whether or not at the date of the will it was under lease or in possession, but it existed at the date of his death in the shape of a freehold reversion upon a long lease, and that is what passed by the appointment made in the will, and in my opinion nothing else passed. I will only say, with regard to the cases which have been so much controverted in the courts below and have been discussed at the bar —I mean Gale v. Gale and Blake v. Blake—that in my opinion this is not a case of ademption at all, because the property is not ademed. The property is there, only it exists in a slightly different form from that in which it existed at the date of the testator's death. This is a capital accretion from the property which is held on the same trusts, but is not the property itself. Therefore, in my opinion, those cases have really nothing to do with it; but so much has been said about them that I should like to say this, that I entirely agree in the expression of opinion by Sir George Jessel, M.R., if my individual opinion be of any value, that Gale v. Gale was rightly decided. I think the judgment of Lord Romilly, M.R., conclusive. You cannot construe a will which purports to appoint or devise a particular property as appointing or devising property which had no existence at the date when the will was made. I will only add this further observation, that I also am quite satisfied and agree in every word which was read to us from the judgment recently delivered by Farwell, J., in the case of In re Dowsett. I concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I agree. The able argument on behalf of the appellants has been answered in advance by the learned Lords Justices on every point, and their judgments seem to me to furnish sound and conclusive grounds of decision.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Montagu, Mileham, & Montagu.

Solicitors for the respondents, Upton, Atkey, & Co.

---

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) } Feb. 20, 21, 24.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL AND WARWICKSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL v. OXFORD CANAL NAVIGATION. (a.)

Highway—Bridge over canal—Raised approaches to bridge—Liability to repair fences—10 Geo. 4, c. 48.

A canal company liable to repair bridges and the "wing walls, ramparts, and side banks thereof," but not liable to repair "roads approaching bridges" beyond the extremity of the wing walls thereof, is not liable to repair the fences on the raised approaches to bridges.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (71 L. J. Ch. 660, 50 W. R. Dig. 64), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J., dated the 4th of June, 1902, and reported in 71 L. J. Ch. 660, 50 W. R. Dig. 64.

The question to be determined was whether the liability for the repair of fences on raised approaches to a bridge carrying a highway over a canal rested upon the canal company.

The relators were the statutory authority charged with the construction, maintenance, and repair of the high roads in the county of Warwick. The defendants were the proprietors of the Oxford Canal Navigation.

(a.) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Under various Acts of George III. the defendants had cut through a certain highway for the purpose of making a canal, and had erected a bridge over the canal in substitution for the highway. The Acts of George III. were repealed by an Act of 10 Geo. 4, c. 48.

Section 4 of the repealing Act vests all bridges, embankments, and other works, and the ground and soil thereof, in the canal company.

Section 5 authorizes the company to collect and receive tolls for the user of the canal.

Section 9 authorizes the company to maintain and support all bridges and other works.

Section 24 provides that a good and sufficient fence be made on each side of a bridge carrying a carriage-road over the canal.

Section 26 is as follows: The canal company "shall not be liable to repair or amend any part of the road approaching to any bridge or bridges made or to be made over the said canal . . . after such roads shall have been first made and used for one year, and then put into good and sufficient repair by the said company of promoters, beyond or further than the extremity of the wing walls of any such bridge; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to exonerate the said company from the future repair of all such bridges, and of the wing walls, ramparts, and side banks thereof."

The road which crossed the canal was vested in the Warwickshire County Council, and the latter brought the present action asking for a declaration that the defendants were liable to repair the fences by the side of the approaches to the bridge, and for a mandatory injunction to compel the defendants to repair the same and abate the nuisance.

Kekewich, J., held that the defendants were not liable to repair the fences.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Cripps, K.C., Macmorran, K.C., and P. Bagnall Evans, for the relators.—Kekewich, J., expressed an opinion that if the old Acts had been in force the defendants would have been liable, for bridge includes the approaches to the bridge: Nottingham County Council v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway, 71 L. T. Rep. 430. When a highway has been raised by a statutory company and the local authority takes over the liability as to that highway, it does not take over any liability as to fencing the highway. When a road has been altered so as to become dangerous, the person who has made the alteration has to supply a proper fencing. By the Highway Rate Assessment and Expenditure Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 27), s. 6, the road authority is, for the first time, given an authority over fences, but the authority is permissive only. Persons responsible for a nuisance are by common law under an obligation to abate the nuisance: Manley v. St. Helen's Canal and Railway Co, 2 W. R. 297, 2 H. & N. 840. A local authority has only a discretionary power to place and keep in repair fences, and is not under an absolute duty to do so: Wilson v. Mayor and Corporation of Halifax, 16 W. R. 707, L. R. 3 Ex. 114. In Whyler v. Bingham Rural District Council, [1901] 1 K. B. 45, 49 W. R. Dig. 70, the defendants were held liable on the ground of misfeasance. If a public company are authorized to interfere with a public highway they are bound not only to substitute something instead, but to keep that something in repair: Reg. v. Inhabitants of Isle of Ely, 15 Q. B. 827. There is an implied right of access on the part of a person who has made a road dangerous to come and repair it: Mayor of Birkenhead v. London and North-Western Railway, 15 Q. B. D. 572, 34 W. R. Dig. 100. The relief given to the canal company by the Act of George IV. was a limited relief.

Warrington, K.C., J. H. Etherington Smith, and Bittleston, for the defendants.—The Act of George IV., distinguishes the bridge and the approaches to the bridge, and the bridge alone was vested in the canal company. Assuming that the company were originally liable to fence, it does not follow that they continued liable to keep the fence in repair. If the highway authority had built something in lieu of a fence and more troublesome to keep in repair, they could not have imposed on the canal company a liability to repair that. The case of Manley v. St. Helen's Canal and Railway Co. does not apply, for there the canal company had possession of the bridge; here neither road nor fence is in the possession of the defendants. Wherever a wall is on a highway, it is part of the highway for purposes of repair: Reg. v. Inhabitants of Isle of Ely. Where you can show that a fence is on a highway, no question arises whether it is part of a highway or not, any more than in the case of a curb-stone. In the great majority of cases where the local authority are not liable to keep fences in repair, the fences are on the land of the adjoining proprietors. It is said that a nuisance has been created by the canal company. But they are following the express and minute provisions of an Act of Parliament, and now the road has passed from their control.

Cripps, K.C., in reply.—The liability to fence was in the first place on the company. It has not been taken away. The company have sufficient proprietary right to make the repairs. They have created a nuisance and are responsible for providing against it.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an action between the Warwickshire County Council and the Oxford Canal Navigation. The Warwickshire County Council, in the name of the Attorney-General, claim that the canal company are bound to keep in repair a fence on the side of a causeway leading up to a bridge which passes over the canal. The question is really determined by the construction of one or perhaps two sections of the Act of Parliament which defines the rights and liabilities of the canal company.

The canal was originally constructed under certain Acts of George III., but these Acts have been repealed, and the rights and liabilities of the canal company are now finally ascertained by the Act of 10 Geo. 4, c. 48, of which section 26 is the governing section in the present case. As is usual in the making of bridges over canals, the persons cutting through the highway were fixed with the obligation of making an equally safe and convenient mode of passage in substitution for the highway.

Now, where the construction of a bridge over a canal involves the raising of the highway on either side of the bridge, an approach to the bridge from the old highway has to be provided by means of a causeway, and it sometimes happens that, when a question has arisen as to keeping the approach in repair, the approach has been treated as standing on the same footing as the bridge itself.

We are relieved from any question of that sort, because this Act of 10 Geo. 4 treats the bridge and the approaches to the bridge as two distinct things. The words of the 26th section are these: [His lordship read the section, and proceeded:] We have in this section, to begin with, a direct limitation of the obligation on the canal proprietors with regard to the repair of any part of the roads approaching the bridge. This is an exemption in favour of the canal company, and to make that clear the section after defining the exemption goes on to define that which was not exempted: "Nothing herein contained shall be construed to exonerate the said company from the future repairs of all such bridges, and of the wing walls, ramparts, and side banks thereof." If the Legislature had intended to include and not exempt the causeways, we should have found in the latter part of the section the word "causeways" as as well as the words "wing walls, ramparts, and side banks."

It is impossible to assert that the intention of the Legislature was to treat the causeway as part of the bridge. They treat it as part of the highway, and this primâ facie is the meaning, because the approaches were made, not on land which belonged to the canal company, but on land which was vested in the highway authority. The canal company had to acquire the land upon which the bridge was built, but not any part of the highway itself. In my opinion, the Legislature intended in this section to deal with two separate and distinct obligations—one as to the repair of the approaches to the bridge, the other as to the repair of the bridge itself. After the approaches had been made and used for one year, and then put into good repair by the canal company, they went back as part of the highway to the persons whose duty it is to deal with the highway.

We have listened to an interesting and ingenious argument from Mr. Cripps and Mr. Macmorran, and perhaps, if we were not bound by the express terms of the Act, there would be a great deal worthy of consideration in their argument. It is clear that if a body clothed with statutory powers interferes with a highway, it is bound impliedly to substitute an equally convenient mode of passage. It cannot be said to have discharged that obligation by substituting a public nuisance for a safe highway. It must prevent the substitute from being a nuisance. But I think that the cases they cited do not affect the question before us, because that question is regulated by the 26th section of the Act, the one point being whether an obligation to repair the fence remains in the canal company notwithstanding that section. We are not called upon to decide whether or no such obligation rests on the county council, but I think they would be well advised not to incur any risk, not to leave the road without a proper fence and so commit a public nuisance. For these reasons I think the learned judge was right, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the Act of 10 Geo 4 finally settles the rights and liabilities of the canal company in respect of the bridge and the approach to the bridge. It is not necessary to consider the previous history of the canal company, or to consider what would have been their liability if the Act of 10 Geo 4 had not been passed. Having regard to the provisions of that Act, especially sections 4, 24, and 26, I think the Legislature has drawn a clear distinction between what I may call the bridge proper and the approaches to the bridge. With regard to the bridge proper, that is vested in the canal company by section 4 Being in possession of the bridge, the company is liable to repair it; they are freed from any liability in respect of approaches not vested in them. It is said that this interpretation will result in a hardship on the local authority. The first answer to that is that the Legislature has thought fit to impose the liability on them, and must have considered that liability not to be unfair as against them. I am of opinion that there is no such hardship as should induce us to give the statute any other than its simple meaning. What the canal company did they did for the benefit of the country at large, in that they facilitated communication between different parts of the country, and decreased the wear and tear of roads by diminishing the traffic upon them. As to the fencing in question, it lies almost in the centre of the highway, and the person liable to repair the highway would have to repair the fence if necessary. The approach must be taken to include the whole of the approach with its sides and fences.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., read the following judgment: I agree that the decision of Kekewich, J., ought to be affirmed. It seems to me that, on the construction of the particular statute by which the rights and liabilities are defined, a clear distinction is drawn between the ascent to a bridge on the road approaching a bridge and the bridge itself. The bridge is vested in the canal company, and the ascent or approach is not. The liability to repair the bridge, as defined by section 26 of the Act of George IV., is thrown upon the company. They are expressly exempted from liability to repair the approach. The fences in question are on the highway. They divide one part of the highway from another part of the highway. I cannot follow the argument of the appellants that a portion only of the original liability of the canal company has been transferred to the road authority—viz., the repair of the road itself, as distinguished from its fences and supports. In my opinion no such liability existed on the expiration of one year from the time when the approach was made and put into good and sufficient repair by the canal company.

COLLINS, M.R.—I had intended to refer to Reg. v. The Inhabitants of Lardsmere, 15 Q. B. 689, as an authority that the approach is part of the highway.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Algernon S. Reid, Leamington; Stockton & Sons, Banbury.

---

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Feb. 19.

BRITISH OIL AND CAKE MILLS (LIMITED) v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Mortgage—Collateral, auxiliary, or additional security—Trust deed for securing debentures—Subsequent conveyance of property to trustees—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 86, Schedule I., "Mortgage."

By a trust deed for securing debentures in a limited company, the company acknowledged that it was indebted to the trustees in the sum of £750,000, and agreed to convey to the trustees certain freehold hereditaments, which were described in the deed as "the specifically mortgaged premises." At the date of the execution of the trust deed the hereditaments had not been conveyed to the company. After their conveyance to the company the latter conveyed them to the trustees to hold them upon the trusts contained in the trust deed. The conveyance contained no obligation by the company to pay the moneys secured by the trust deed or any part thereof. The trust deed was stamped at the rate of 2s. 6d. per £100 of the amount secured, as a primary security under the heading "Mortgage, bond, debenture, covenant" in Schedule I., clause 1, in the Stamp Act, 1891.

Held, that the conveyance was "a collateral or auxiliary, or additional security, or by way of further assurance" within clause 2 of the heading "Mortgage," &c., and was therefore liable to stamp duty at the rate of 6d. per £100 of the amount secured by the trust deed.

Appeal by the British Oil and Cake Mills (Limited) from the judgment of Phillimore, J., upon a case stated under section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 25th of November, 1899, an instrument was presented on behalf of the appellants by their solicitors to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 12 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for the opinion of the Commissioners as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable.

The following was a copy of the instrument: "This indenture made the 21st of November, 1899, between the British Oil and Cake Mills (Limited), a company having its registered office at 29, Great St. Helen's, in the City of London (hereinafter called 'the company'), of the one part, and the Right Honourable Robert James Baron Wantage, V.C., K.C.B., of 2, Carlton-gardens, in the county of London, and Reginald Abel Smith, of 1, Lombard-street, in the City of London, banker (hereinafter called 'the present trustees'), of the other part; whereas these presents are supplemental to an indenture dated the 3rd day of October, 1899, and made between the company of the one part and the present trustees of the other part, being a trust deed to secure £750,000 debenture stock and interest, and hereinafter referred to as the trust deed; and whereas the freehold hereditaments thirdly specified or referred to in the first part of the second schedule to the trust deed have been conveyed to the company by an indenture particulars whereof are contained in the schedule hereto: now this indenture witnesseth that in pursuance of the provision in this behalf contained in the trust deed the company as beneficial owner hereby conveys unto the present trustees and their heirs all and singular the freehold hereditaments thirdly specified or referred to in the first part of the second schedule to the trust deed, and all other (if any) the freehold hereditaments comprised in the indenture particulars whereof are contained in the schedule hereto, to hold the same unto and to the use of the present trustees, their heirs and assigns, for ever, upon and for the trusts and purposes and subject to the provisions of the trust deed, nevertheless if and so far as in the first part of the second schedule to the trust deed or in the said indenture the same premises are mentioned to be subject to any covenants, exceptions, or other matters then subject thereto."

THE SCHEDULE.

| Reference to hereditaments specified or referred to in Part I. of the second schedule to the Trust Deed. | Date of Indenture. | Parties. |
|---|---|---|
| Hereditaments thirdly specified or referred to. | Nov. 20, 1899. | Edwin Robson, of the first part, John Richard Bartlett and Chadwick & Co. (Limited) of the second part, the British Oil and Cake Mills (Limited) of the third part. |

This instrument was executed in pursuance of the provisions of a mortgage dated the 3rd of October, 1899 (called the trust deed), and made between the appellants of the one part and the present trustees of the other part. The deed of the 3rd of October, 1899, was a trust deed for securing £750,000 debenture stock issued or to be issued by the company. By clause 2 of this deed the company thereby acknowledged that it was indebted to the trustees in the sum of £750,000 carrying interest at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum. The debenture stock to be issued was limited in the first instance to £550,000, but the company was to be at liberty to issue further stock not exceeding £200,000 ranking pari passu with the first issue. The premises referred to in the trust deed as "the specifically mortgaged premises" were the premises of the various firms and companies which were amalgamated in the British Oil and Cake Mills (Limited); and were defined in the trust deed as meaning the freehold, leasehold, and copyhold hereditaments, and Scotch properties by clauses 8, 9, 10, and 11 thereof covenanted to be assured respectively, and all other property thereby made a specific security for the payment of the moneys for the time being owing and intended to be secured thereunder. By clause 8, the company as beneficial owner agreed with all convenient speed to grant unto the trustees all the freehold hereditaments respectively specified or referred to in Part I. of the second schedule thereto to hold the same unto and to the use of the trustees, their heirs and assigns; by clause 9, to demise to the trustees the leasehold hereditaments therein specified for the residues of the respective terms less one day, and to stand possessed of the nominal reversions in trust for the trustees; by clause 10, to surrender the copyholds therein specified to the trustees; and by clause 11, forthwith to vest in the trustees the Scotch hereditaments therein specified; by clause 12, any mortgage or other assurance whereby any property should be vested in the trustees under the provisions of clauses 6, 22, and 42 thereof or any of them (which provided for the vesting in the trustees of further property upon the issue of any of the unissued debenture stock; for the trustees at any time before the security became enforceable doing or concurring with the company in doing certain specified things in respect of the specifically mortgaged premises; and for the company with the permission of the trustees to withdraw from trusts of the deed any of the specifically mortgaged premises upon substituting other property for the same) might provide that the property therein comprised should be a security only for the amount therein specified. By clause 13, the company charged in favour of the trustees its other assets, both present and future, except its uncalled capital, with the payment of all moneys for the time being owing on the security of the trust deed, such charge to rank as a floating charge and in no way to hinder or prevent the company from selling, alienating, mortgaging, charging leasing, paying dividends out of profits, or otherwise disposing of or dealing with such assets in the ordinary course of its business, and for the purpose of carrying on the same, provided that the principal moneys for the time being charged on the general assets and ranking in priority to or equally with the floating charge thereby created should not at any one and the same time exceed £200,000. By clause 14 the trustees were to permit the company to hold the mortgaged premises and to carry on therein the business until the security should become enforceable, when the trustees might in their discretion enter upon the mortgaged premises and sell the same. Clause 15 stated the events in which the security was to become enforceable. By clause 22, at any time before the security thereby constituted became enforceable, the trustees might upon the application and at the expense of the company, but only if in their opinion the interests of the shareholders would not be prejudiced thereby, do or concur in doing all or any of such specified things in respect of the specifically mortgaged premises (inter alia), (10) to call in and enforce payment by foreclosure or otherwise of the securities forming part of the specifically mortgaged premises. By clause 25, the trustees, after having entered into possession, and until the sale of the mortgaged premises, might carry on the business of the company, and might also in their discretion exercise all the powers vested in them by clause 22 as if the word "specifically" were omitted throughout that clause. By clause 28, the trustees might appoint a receiver of the mortgaged premises; and by clause 48, upon proof that the holders of all the stock had been paid off the trustees should reconvey to the company the mortgaged premises.

The instrument of the 21st of November, 1899, was one of several instruments executed in pursuance of the provisions of the above-mentioned clause 8. The mortgage of the 3rd of October, 1899, had been presented to the commissioners under section 12 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and had been adjudged by them liable to the duty of 2s. 6d. per cent. on the sum of £750,000, by reference to the heading "Mortgage" in the first schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, and this duty was paid, and no objection made against the assessment.

The commissioners, being of opinion that the instrument of the 21st of November, 1899, was liable to the duty of 6d. per cent. on £750,000, by reference to the heading "Mortgage" in the first schedule to the Act, sub-heading 2, so assessed it, and this duty—viz., £187 10s.—was paid. The questions for the opinion of the court were whether the instrument was chargeable with this duty, and if not, with what duty.

Phillimore, J., upon the authority of Gartsides (Brookside Brewery) (Limited) v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 82 L.T. Rep. 686, 48 W. R. Dig. 78, affirmed the decision of the commissioners.

The company appealed.

Danckwerts, K.C., and H. Erle Richards, for the appellants.

Sir Edward Carson, S.G., and S. A. T. Rowlatt, for the respondents, were not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L J.—The question is whether the duty of 6d. per cent. is payable on the deed of the 21st of November, 1899. The ground upon which it is said that the duty is payable is that the conveyance falls within the heading "Mortgage, bond, debenture, covenant," clause 2, in Schedule I. to the Stamp Act, 1891. The words of that clause are: "Being a collateral, or auxiliary, or additional, or substituted security (other than an equitable mortgage), or by way of further assurance for the above-mentioned purpose where the principal or primary security is duly stamped—for every £100, and also for any fractional part of £100, of the amount secured, 6d." It is said that this conveyance does not come within those words, because the conveyance itself contains or creates no obligation to pay or repay the money, and that there is no primary security to which the conveyance can be collateral, or auxiliary, or substituted security, or by way of further assurance. That being the argument—namely, that this conveyance is not a primary security, because it does not create any such obligation, nor a collateral, or auxiliary, or substituted security or by way of further assurance, one has to see what the original trust deed of the 3rd of October, 1899, is. It is said that the deed is not a mortgage within the definition in section 86, sub-section 1, which provides that "for the purposes of this Act the expression 'mortgage' means a security by way of mortgage for the payment of any definite and certain sum of money advanced or lent at the time, or previously due and owing, or forborne to be paid, being payable, or for the repayment of money to be thereafter lent, advanced, or paid, or which may become due upon an account current, together with any sum already advanced or due, or without, as the case may be." In my judgment the trust deed of the 3rd of October constitutes a "mortgage" within that definition. If I am asked what words I bring it under, I answer that it is a security by way of mortgage for the payment of a definite and certain sum of money advanced and a certain sum previously due and owing. The money is "previously due and owing," because by clause 2 of the deed the company thereby acknowledged that it was indebted to the trustees in the sum of £750,000. The trust deed therefore, being a mortgage within section 86, sub-section 1, constitutes a primary security within the heading "Mortgage," &c., clause 1, in the schedule. That being so, we have only to consider whether or not, there being this primary security, the deed of the 21st of November constitutes a "collateral, or auxiliary, or substituted security, or by way of further assurance" within clause 2.

In this particular case it seems to me, having regard to the facts, that there is no real difficulty. At the date when the trust deed was executed the company had not acquired this property, and as appears from the schedule to the deed of the 21st of November, 1899, it was conveyed to them by a deed of the 20th of November. That is more than a month later than the trust deed. On the next day the property was by the deed of the 21st of November conveyed by the company to the trustees. In these circumstances it seems to me to be impossible to say that the conveyance of the 21st of November does not come within the words of clause 2. The effect of it was to give the trustees an improved security and to place them in a new and very much better position, because they were placed in a position which made it easy for them to deal with the property comprised in the mortgage of the 3rd of October. The deed of the 21st of November is therefore either an auxiliary security or by way of further assurance. I am not disposed to go further than that. Whether, where there is an agreement which covers certain property and which involves the execution of a conveyance of that property, in every such case the duty of 6d. per cent. is payable on the conveyance, I do not say. It may be so; but I have not the materials before me for drawing the line. It is sufficient to say that in the present case the 6d. duty is payable. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think it is necessary in this case to say under what specific provision the trust deed of the 3rd of October was stamped with ad valorem duty in accordance with the duties imposed by the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, under the head "Mortgage, bond, debenture, covenant, and warrant of attorney." It has been stamped as a primary security for the payment of money under that heading in the schedule. For myself, if it were necessary, I should come to the conclusion that it was properly stamped as a mortgage, for the reasons which have been given by Vaughan Williams, L.J. What was contemplated apparently by the parties to that deed was that it should be an instrument which would convey to the trustees the rights of mortgagees as they are ordinarily understood, because I find that by clause 22, par. 10, it is provided that the trustees may call in and enforce payment by foreclosure or otherwise of the securities forming part of the specifically mortgaged premises. It was therefore contemplated that the trust deed was one which would entitle the trustees, amongst other things, to the ordinary remedies of mortgagees by foreclosure. However this may be, it is admitted that the deed of the 3rd of October, 1899, has been properly stamped as a security in the way I have mentioned.

The only question before us relates to the document of the 21st of November, 1899, which has since been executed in accordance with the stipulation contained in clause 8 of the trust deed of the 3rd of October. It is contended on behalf of the Crown that the deed of the 21st of November is "a collateral or auxiliary security," or at all events a security "by way of further assurance for the above-mentioned purpose, where the principal or primary security is duly stamped" within the meaning of clause 2 under the heading "Mortgage," &c., in the schedule. Certainly this seems to be a security by way of further assurance for the purpose mentioned; but the main contention which has been urged before us is that this is not so, because "security," as found in the schedule to the Act, has a peculiar meaning given to it by previous decisions. I think that the inference which is sought to be drawn from those decisions, particularly the decisions in Jones v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 43 W. R. 318, [1895] 1 Q. B. 484, and National Telephone Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 47 W. R. 247, [1899] 1 Q. B. 250, goes too far. It certainly has been decided in those cases that the word "security" includes the instrument by which the obligation to pay is originally created. I have used the very words of A. L. Smith, L.J., in the latter case, but I do not think that it has been decided or was intended to be decided by those cases that in every place in which the word "security" occurs in the Act it is limited to that meaning. That is a totally different thing from saying that it includes such instruments. It seems to me that where the context warrants it, it is used as referring to that sort of instrument which the present Master of the Rolls described in Jones v. Inland Revenue Commissioners as being something in its nature collateral, or, in other words, something that secured a right already acquired under some other instrument or document. If that be the nature of a collateral security it seems to me that this document which we have before us falls within the definition, and certainly, as I have already said, it is an instrument by way of further assurance.

The only remaining question is whether there is sufficient context in the present case to justify us in saying that it is used in that meaning. It seems to me that there is ample context for expressing that opinion. The first clause under "Mortgage," &c., deals with instruments which are described as "only or principal or primary security." The second clause deals with another set of instruments described as "collateral, or auxiliary, or additional, or substituted security, or by way of further assurance." I cannot think that the Legislature meant in this latter case to exclude from taxation those instruments which—in the words of the Master of the Rolls—secure a right already acquired, unless they contain a further obligation of some sort on the part of the borrower to pay the money to the trustees. I think also that the provisions of section 87 show that this was the view taken by the Legislature, because a very common form of security is where a mortgage is made of property which consists partly of freeholds and partly of copyholds. The common form of such a mortgage deed is to convey the freeholds in the ordinary way to the mortgagee, subject to a proviso for redemption, and to insert a covenant for the surrender of the copyholds to the mortgagee; and then, inasmuch as the legal title could not pass in copyholds to the mortgagee, to execute contemporaneously a formal conditional surrender to the mortgagee by way of additional or further security to him. Now upon the meaning which I have attached to clause 2 of the heading "Mortgages," &c., such an instrument would have to pay the ad valorem duty at the rate of 6d. on every £100. The Legislature has thought fit to say in section 87, sub-section 5, that where any copyholds are mortgaged together with other property for securing the same money "the ad valorem duty is to be charged on the instrument relating to the other property, and the surrender or grant, or the memorandum thereof, or the copy of court roll of the surrender or grant, as the case may be, is not to be charged with any higher duty than 10s." I read that as meaning that it is to be charged with an ad valorem duty at the rate of 6d. in the £100 where the sum falls short of 10s., but where the sum would exceed 10s. then 10s. only is to be charged. That is a provision inserted to meet a case which very commonly occurs, and it seems to me that the attempt which is now being made is substantially to obtain the same relief without any special clause like the above. For these reasons I think that the appeal fails.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The deed of the 3rd of October is unquestionably a security for the payment of money. It is said that that is not enough, and that it must be a mortgage, and that this deed is not a mortgage within the meaning of section 86. When I turn to that section it appears to me that it is perfectly clear that the deed comes within the description of mortgage as "a security by way of mortgage for the payment of any definite and certain sum of money advanced or lent at the time, or previously due and owing." Upon turning to this deed itself, clause 2 states that the company acknowledges that it is indebted to the trustees in the sum of £750,000. This deed is clearly a mortgage within the language of section 86; it is a security upon property to which the company could only, at the time of its execution, obtain an equitable title. The deed accordingly contains provisions dealing with that state of things, and clause 8 in the deed contains a covenant by the company to convey the specifically mortgaged freehold premises; and under that clause the conveyance was executed by the deed of the 21st of November, 1899. In the words of clause 2 of the heading "Mortgage," &c., is that an "auxiliary security" or "by way of further assurance"? There can be no doubt about it. The original deed did not place the trustees in a position to be able conveniently to deal with the different kinds of property. It was provided that they should, by a collateral or auxiliary deed, be placed in that position. This later deed is therefore a collateral or auxiliary or additional security, or by way of further assurance, and the modified duty of 6d. is payable.

I do not think it necessary to add anything to what has been said as to the argument upon the word "security." It is, to my mind, far-fetched and unreasonable. The original document is a mortgage; the subsequent document is a security. The appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Stow, Preston, & Lyttelton.

Solicitor for the respondents, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

---

From K. B. Div.
(Earl of Halsbury, L.C., Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Sir F. Jeune, P.) } Feb. 4.

RANDT GOLD MINING CO (LIMITED) v. NEW BALKIS ERSTELING CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Shares—Forfeiture for non-payment of calls—Re-sale by company—Liability for future calls—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), Table A, arts. 20 and 22.

A company forfeited shares for non-payment of calls and re-sold them on the terms that the purchasers should be held discharged from any calls then due.

Held, that the purchasers were liable to pay the amount unpaid on the shares, and that they were not discharged by there having been a previous call which remained unpaid.

Semble, that any contract which purported to release a shareholder from paying the full nominal value of the share would be ultra vires.

Appeal from Bucknill, J.

This was an action to recover the sum of £2,581 5s. and £24 for interest, being a call made on 41,300 shares in the plaintiff company held by the defendant company.

From the admitted facts it appeared that the shares in question had formerly been the property of the African Gold Properties (Limited). Calls were made upon that company to the extent of 1s. 8d. per share, which would have made them fully paid, they being of the nominal value of 5s. per share, and having the sum of 3s. 4d. per share paid thereon.

In consequence of the non-payment of calls by the African Gold Properties (Limited) the plaintiff company, under the powers given to the directors by arts. 13 and 15 of the articles of association, forfeited the shares. That forfeiture was cancelled on the 21st of November, 1899, under the powers of another article of the articles of association. But on the 18th of April, 1900, the shares in question were re-forfeited under the articles of association, and remained forfeited as far as the African Gold Properties are concerned.

On the 17th of May, 1900, the shares in question were sold to the defendant company, and on the 17th of May, 1900, a certificate in the following terms was issued to the defendants in respect of a block of forty thousand shares, and similar certificates in respect of the remaining one thousand three hundred shares.

The terms of the certificate are as follows: "This is to certify that the New Balkis Ersteling, Co., of 2, Winchester House, Old Broad-street, London, E.C., is the holder of forty thousand shares of 5s. each [here follow the numbers] on which the sum of 3s. 4d. per share has been paid. The remaining 1s. 8d. per share has been called up, and is payable by the African Gold Properties (Limited), who were the holders of the shares prior to the same being forfeited, and the said New Balkis Ersteling Co. (Limited) is to be deemed the holder of the said shares discharged from all calls due prior to the date hereof."

Bucknill, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff company for the amount claimed.

The defendant company appealed.

A. T. Lawrance, K.C. (W. Scott with him), for the appellant company.—Our contention here is that the company's power to make calls was exhausted, and therefore they had no power to make a fresh call. When the call has been made the liability is changed from an amount due on the shares to a debt. If that be so we are protected by the language of our certificate from any call due previous to the forfeiture.

Sir R. Reid, K.C., and Clauson, for the respondent company.—The terms of this certificate are taken from Table A, article 22, and so no question of a contract can arise here. By the terms of the Companies Act, on every share the full nominal value of each share is liable to be called: Ooregum Gold Co. v. Roper, 41 W. R. 90, [1892] A. C.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

125; Walton v. Saffery, 45 W. R. 508, [1897] A. C. 299. The object of the certificate here was to give the purchaser of the forfeited shares a good title, and to free him in respect of forfeiture from liability in respect of past calls and in respect of interests and not to relieve the purchasers from liability to future calls. If such a contract were made it would be ultra vires, and contrary to the intention of the Companies Act.

A. T. Lawrance replied.

Earl of Halsbury, L.C.—In this case I without any doubt am of opinion that the judgment of my brother Bucknill was quite right. Now, in order rightly to appreciate the question which is raised in this case one must consider the whole purview of the limited liability system introduced by the Legislature and look at the sections of the statutes dealing with that particular question in the light of what that scheme was intended to establish. It was to be a scheme of limited liability. It is a sort of partnership in which each member of the partnership is to be entitled to join a trading concern limiting his liability to the extent of an ascertained amount—an amount ascertained by what has been called the "face value" of the share. I think some confusion has arisen in some of the cases by not sufficiently observing what is imported by what we call "the share," and by the sale of the share, treating it as a mere chattel involving in it no other responsibility than the possession of the chattel, and not sufficiently recognising the fact that it makes the holder of the share a member of a trading partnership, and as such liable in respect of the trading partnership which he has joined to all those liabilities together with possessing all those privileges which the Legislature has conferred on it by what I may call the statutory deed of partnership. The statutory deed of partnership has this operation, that you cannot go outside it. The amount subscribed which is to make the shareholder a partner in the concern must be paid, and, as the Legislature has said, must be paid in cash. I will not stop to inquire whether all the decisions have been absolutely in consonance with what the expressed intention of the Legislature was in respect of that provision that the money must be paid in cash. It does not arise here, nor is it material for me to consider it; but what is material is to observe that the capital of the company constituted by the subscribed portion of the capital which is to be raised on shares shall be paid, and no expedient—no indirect arrangement—can get out of the necessity of the company, that is the trading partnership as I have described it, preserving the capital which the Legislature has enjoined shall be the capital on which it is to trade. It has provided means by which the capital shall be subscribed, and the partners compelled to subscribe what they, by taking the shares, have agreed to subscribe. It has also provided that the governing body shall be at liberty either to call up the whole of the agreed sum, or portions of the agreed sum, at such times and in such ways as they think proper by their rules to determine. It gives specimen rules of the way they may do it, but it does not bind the company to adopt these rules. Among the things they can do is this. They may say, "If you do not pay at such a time the money which you have agreed by taking the shares to subscribe, your rights in this company shall go, and you shall be charged with interest if you do not pay; and further than that, not only shall your rights go as a member of the company, but you shall cease to be a member, and your shares shall be forfeited, but you shall nevertheless be liable to pay what you have been called on to pay." When that is done the Legislature further provides that the shares in the partnership which belonged to the forfeiting shareholder shall be capable of being sold to another person, but though that other person is relieved from any liability for calls made previously to his becoming an holder of the shares, there is nothing whatever which suggests that he should be relieved from paying the balance of what still remained due on the shares. That the new holder of the shares which have been forfeited should be relieved from liabilities for calls which had been made before he became a member seems to me to be intelligible enough, but that he should be relieved from responsibility for future calls seems to me to be against the scheme and intention of the statutes. If that view is correct, this case is, as it seems to me, answered by the statement of fact I have made, and when article 22 of Table A is read by the light of these observations, then it is clear that it was intended, and apparently, upon the face of it, manifestly intended, to preserve the new shareholder, as I will call him, who has bought in the market from any liability created by the fact of previous calls, but by no means to relieve him from the necessity of paying what is still due on the share. If, therefore, what is still due on the share is called up in due course, it does not matter whether there has been a previous call or not, unless it has been paid. If it has been, the liability of the share, so to speak, is gone, and if it has been paid in full there is no further liability, and that is the whole meaning of "limited liability." But if it is only that there has been a call which has not been paid, in what way has the capital of the company been preserved in the manner which, as I have said, the Legislature has determined that the capital of the company shall be preserved and shall be subscribed by the persons responsible to subscribe to it?

Now let us see what it is that the 22nd article, upon which so much reliance has been placed, involves, and what it is intended to do. But for the article see what might happen. The new shareholder who has bought, who knows nothing about previous calls, and has nothing to do with the previous call, has a share given to him. He might be vexed by a claim by the former shareholder, who might say that the call was irregular, and therefore that the purchaser was really not the new shareholder; whereupon the 22nd article gives a whole code, so to speak, of what shall be the mode by which the title shall be absolutely assured to the new shareholder, and at the conclusion of it, after describing the code and what is to be done, it proceeds to say: "And thereupon he shall be deemed the holder of such share, discharged from all calls prior to such purchase, and he shall not be bound to see to the application of the purchase-money, nor shall his title to such share be affected by any irregularity in the proceedings in reference to such sale." To my mind it is absolutely impossible to consider that that has any relation except to what it purports to have relation to—viz., title to the share of the new shareholder when he has become a new shareholder by reason of the sale to him of the forfeited share. It seems to me, therefore, that that is the whole point here. The question of the payment of the share is another thing.

I do not wish to say anything beyond the necessities of this case. There may be contracts which may have operation between the immediate parties to the sale. I doubt myself whether any contract made by the directors of the company, which should affect what I have described as the absolute necessities imposed by the statutes upon the preservation of the statutable rights, could have any operation. I do not proceed to deal with that question now, because here no contract was made. All that was done in this case was that the certificate given has followed the language of—has written out, in fact, the 22nd article, and having done that the directors have, I think, protected the new shareholder within the language of the 22nd article, so far as he can be protected; but for the reasons I have given, have not protected him from paying that which, by becoming a shareholder, he has become liable to pay, any call for money not paid up on the share, and which still remains therefore due to the company of which he has become a shareholder. For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I entirely agree with the judgment of the Lord Chancellor for the reasons which he has given and I do not think I can usefully add anything.

JEUNE, P.—I agree with the Lord Chancellor and have nothing to add, except that I should like to express my obligation to Sir Robert Reid for his argument. I thought it singularly clear and quite conclusive.

Solicitors for the appellants, Dale, Newman, & Hood.

Solicitors for the defendants, Sanderson, Adkins, & Lee.

---

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Feb. 4.

McIVER & CO. v. TATE STEAMERS (LIMITED). (a.)

Ship—Charter-party—Seaworthiness—Insufficiency of coal—Charterers to provide coal.

A charter-party for a round voyage was made subject to conditions, one of which was that the charterers should provide and pay for all coal. The vessel started on one of the stages of the voyage with an insufficient quantity of coal on board, whereby she was rendered unseaworthy. The insufficiency resulted not from any failure on the part of the charterers to supply coal required by the captain, but from failure on the part of the chief engineer to estimate correctly the quantity of coal in the ship's bunkers when she started. In an action by the charterers against the shipowners to recover damages for breach of warranty of seaworthiness,

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, because the above condition did not relieve the shipowners from their obligation to take care that the vessel had sufficient coal on board by placing the question of the supply of coal in the discretion of the charterers; and, secondly, because, even if the charterers had any discretion in the matter, they were prevented from exercising it properly by the default of the defendants' servants.

Appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Kennedy, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover damages for an alleged breach of a contract contained in a charter-party, made between the defendants as shipowners and the plaintiffs as charterers, whereby the defendants agreed to let and the plaintiffs agreed to hire the steamship Patapsco for a round voyage from Liverpool to the River Plate and back to the United Kingdom.

The plaintiffs' claim was based on the ground that they incurred unnecessary expense by reason of an excessive consumption of coal on the homeward voyage, between the River Plate and St. Vincent, owing to the ship's having had to put into Pernambuco to get a fresh supply of coal, which, the plaintiffs alleged, was rendered necessary by the master's negligently leaving the River Plate with a supply of coal insufficient to enable the ship to get to St. Vincent.

The alleged cause of action was that by reason of such negligence the ship was unseaworthy for the voyage from the River Plate to St. Vincent.

The following were the material clauses in the charter-party: "Steamer to be placed at the disposal of the charterers at Liverpool in such dock, or at such wharf or place (where she may always safely lie afloat at all times of tide) as the charterers may direct, and being on her delivery ready to receive cargo, and tight, staunch, strong, and in every way fitted for the service . . . having steam winches and donkey-boiler with capacity to run all the steam winches at once and at the same time, or main boiler to be used (and with full complement of officers, seamen, engineers, and firemen for a vessel of her tonnage) and to be so maintained during the continuance of this charter-party; to be employed in carrying lawful merchandize . . . as the charterers or their agents shall direct on the following conditions—namely: (1) That the owners shall provide and pay for all provisions, wages, and consular shipping and discharging fees of the captain, officers, engineers, firemen, and crew, and shall pay for the insurance of the vessel, and also for all the cabin, deck, engine-room, and other necessary stores, and maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for and during the service. (2) That the charterers shall provide and pay for all the coal, port charges, pilotages, agencies, commissions, consular charges (except those pertaining to the captain, officers, or crew), and all other charges whatsoever except those before stated. (3) That the charterers shall accept and pay for all coal in the steamer's bunkers on delivery, and the owners shall, on the expiration of this charter-party pay for all coal left in the bunkers. . . . (8) That the whole reach of the vessel's holds, decks, and usual places of loading and accommodation of the ship (not more than she can reasonably stow and carry) shall be at the charterers' disposal, reserving only proper and sufficient space for ship's officers, crew, tackle, apparel, furniture, provisions, stores, and fuel, including cattle and/or coal and/or cargo on deck at shipper's risk. (9) That the captain shall prosecute his voyage with the utmost despatch, and shall render all customary assistance with the ship's crew, tackle, and boats, and that, though appointed by the owners, he shall be under the orders and direction of the charterers as regards employment, agency, or other arrangements, and the charterers hereby agree to indemnify the owners from all consequences or liabilities that may arise from the captain's signing bills of lading or otherwise complying with the same. (10) That if the charterers shall have reason to be dissatisfied with the conduct of the captain, officers, or engineers, the owners shall, on receiving particulars of the complaint, investigate the same, and, if necessary, make a change in the appointments. . . . (12) That the master shall be furnished from time to time with all requisite instructions and sailing directions, and shall keep a full and correct log of the voyage or voyages, which are to be patent to the charterers or their agents, and furnish to the charterers, their agent or supercargo, when required, a true daily copy of the log, showing the course of the steamer and distance run and the consumption of coal. . . . (17) The act of God, enemies, fire, restraint of princes, rulers, and people, and all dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, machinery, boilers, and steam navigation, and errors of navigation, throughout this charter-party, always mutually excepted."

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The evidence was to the effect that, when the ship started on her return from the River Plate, there was not a sufficient quantity of coal on board for the purpose of the voyage to St. Vincent, and that the insufficiency resulted not from any failure on the part of the charterers to supply coal required by the captain, but from failure on the part of the chief engineer to estimate correctly the quantity of coal in the ship's bunkers when she started.

Kennedy, J., found that the vessel left the River Plate with an insufficient quantity of coal for the voyage to St. Vincent, and that she was thereby rendered unseaworthy; and he was of opinion that the provisions of the charter-party did not release the owners from the responsibility of seeing that the vessel was in a seaworthy condition at the commencement of that stage of the voyage. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Bailhache, for the defendants.

Pickford, K.C., and Bateson, for the plaintiffs.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my opinion the judgment of Kennedy, J., was right. The argument on behalf of the defendants really comes to this—that if the provisions of the charter-party are looked at, it will be found that the shipowners were relieved from the obligation to see that the ship was seaworthy when she started on each of the stages of the voyage. The part of the charter-party chiefly relied on is clause 2, which says that the charterers shall provide and pay for all the coal. The suggestion is that the contract, by the use of the word "provide" as well as the words "pay for," intended that the question how much coal was required before each stage of the voyage should be a matter within the discretion of the charterers and to be determined by them, to the relief of the shipowners from their obligation to see that the ship was seaworthy in the sense of having enough coal on board for the purpose of prosecuting the particular stage of the voyage. It is said that the plaintiffs cannot recover damages in this case, because they agreed to provide the coal necessary for the voyage and it was their own default which resulted in the insufficiency of coal. I do not think that there is anything in that argument. In my opinion there is nothing in the charter-party to relieve the shipowners from their obligation with regard to the supply of coal. But even if the charterers had any discretion in determining the quantity of coal to be provided, of which I see no evidence, I think they were placed in a position in which it was impossible for them to judge rightly in the matter owing to the default of the defendants' servants. I am therefore of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed.

STIRLING and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Charles Russell & Co., for Lightbound, Owen, & Co., Liverpool.

Solicitors for the defendants, Downing & Bolam, for Bolam & Co., Sunderland.

---

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — Jan. 20.

SCOTT v. COULSON. (a.)

Contract—Setting aside on ground of common mistake—Date to which common mistake should be referred—No delay in seeking the aid of the court.

Although the court is, in some cases, averse to setting aside a contract after completion upon the ground of common mistake, even where there is a suggestion of fraud, yet the court will set aside such a contract after completion if the plaintiff seeks the aid of the court with promptitude, and if the parties can without difficulty be restored to the position in which they were before the contract.

This was an action to set aside an agreement whereby the plaintiffs had agreed to sell and assign to the defendants a policy of assurance on the life of a third party upon the ground of common mistake.

The plaintiffs were the executrices of the will of James William Prior, and the policy in question formed part of his personal estate.

By an agreement dated the 19th of March, 1902, the plaintiffs, in consideration of a sum of £460, agreed to sell to the defendants a policy of assurance on the life of Alfred Death, effected with the Scottish Widows' Fund and Life Assurance Society for the sum of £500 and bonuses.

The sale was completed and the assignment executed on the 19th of April, 1902.

It subsequently appeared, however, that Mr. Death had in fact died on or about the 23rd of December, 1899, and that thereupon there became due on the policy the sum of £777 10*s.* 4*d.*

The evidence showed that although at the date of the contract neither the plaintiffs nor the defendants were aware of the assured's death, yet that in the interval between the date of the contract and the date of the assignment the defendants received information which led them to believe that Mr. Death was dead at the date of the contract, and that the defendants had not disclosed this information to the plaintiffs, notwithstanding they had undertaken to communicate to them any information they might receive as to the existence of the assured.

The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action to have the contract and assignment set aside.

Warrington, K.C., and H. Dobb, for the plaintiffs.—This is clearly a case of common mistake, and we are entitled so have the contract set aside: Smith v. Hughes, 19 W. R. 1059, L. R. 6 Q. B. 597; Colyer v. Clay, 7 Beav. 188; Cochrane v. Willis, 14 W. R. 19, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 58.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and St. John Clerk, for the defendants.—The contract cannot be set aside upon the ground of common mistake. Whether we were aware of the death of assured or not at the date of the assignment is immaterial, provided, as the fact is, we were not aware of the death at the date of the agreement; nor were we under any obligation to disclose the fact of such death to the plaintiffs after the date of the agreement. No cases have been cited where a contract entered into on the ground of a common mistake has been set aside after completion.

KEKEWICH, J., said that the case raised an interesting point of law. It was common ground that at the date of the contract for sale of the policy both parties to the contract supposed the assured to be alive, the result being that the plaintiffs were willing to accept as the best price they could get for the policy a sum which was slightly in advance of the surrender value to be obtained from the office and very much below the sum due on the death of the assured. As a matter of fact the assured was dead. It followed, therefore, that the parties contracted under a common mistake. In Smith v. Hughes Hannen, J., defined in language which at first sight looked somewhat confused, but was not really so at all, what was the common mistake which would justify one party to a contract in refusing to perform it. In that case the plaintiff had sold oats to the defendant by sample, and the defendant refused to fulfil his bargain, on the ground that he thought he was buying old oats, whereas in fact the oats were new. Hannen, J., in that case, said that in order to relieve the defendant it was necessary that the jury should find, not merely that the plaintiff believed the defendant to believe he was buying old oats, but that he believed the defendant to believe that he, the plaintiff, was contracting to sell old oats. Applying that principle to the present case, the plaintiffs here believed the defendants to believe that they were buying a policy on a life then in being, and they further believed that the defendants believed the plaintiffs to be selling a policy on a life in being. To what date should that common mistake be referred? In his lordship's opinion it ought to be referred to the date of the contract. From that date the policy belonged in equity to the purchasers, and as at present advised he did not think that any information obtained by them after that date would in the absence of special agreement affect their conscience or prevent them from accepting the policy moneys if they were otherwise entitled thereto, and he proceeded upon that footing. It did not follow that if the contract was entered into on the ground of a common mistake of fact in a material matter, therefore the completion of the contract stood. On behalf of the defendants it was said that there was no case showing that a contract of that kind could be set aside after completion. The two cases of Colyer v. Clay and Cochrane v. Willis which had been cited to him scarcely went to the length of saying that it was the practice of the court to set aside a contract after completion on that ground. But in the latter case, where an agreement was entered into by a tenant in tail on the assumption that the tenant for life was alive when in fact he was dead, Knight-Bruce, L.J., said that "it would be contrary to all the rules of equity and common law to give effect to such an agreement, or to hold that such a person ought to be bound by it." His lordship did not think that Knight-Bruce, L.J., would have used that language if he had thought that the contract would not have been set aside. No doubt the court was extremely averse, even where there had been something like fraud, to setting aside a contract after completion, but that hesitation did not apply where the plaintiff came promptly and where the parties could without difficulty be restored to the position in which they were before the contract. Both these conditions had been fulfilled in the present case. No one could say that an action to set aside a contract entered into in March, 1902, had been delayed when it was tried in January, 1903, and there was no difficulty in paying back to the defendants the money which they had paid. There was therefore nothing to prevent the court from doing what was manifestly just. His lordship accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

(a) Reported by CUTHBERT CAMM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors, Walker, Son, & Field, for A. A. Walker, Cambridge; Dubois & Williams, for R. C. & S. Burrows, Cambridge.

Chan. Div. Buckley, J. — Feb. 14, 19.

In re WILMER.
MOORE v. WINGFIELD. (a.)

Perpetuity—Remoteness—Devise—Life in being—Person en ventre sa mère—Gestation at beginning of period—Benefit of child.

A testatrix devised real estate on trust to pay the income thereof to A. for life, and after her death, by way of equitable contingent remainders (in the events which happened) for the third son of A., born or to be born, for life, and after his death for his first and other sons successively in order of seniority in tail male. At the death of the testatrix, the third son of A. was en ventre sa mère.

Held, that the third son of A. was a life in being at the death of the testatrix, and, consequently, that the limitations subsequent to his life estate were not obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities.

The principle that an infant en ventre sa mère is a life in being is of general application, and is not restricted to cases where it is to the advantage of, or immaterial to, the infant to apply it.

Doe v. Lancashire, 5 T. R. 49, discussed and applied.

Adjourned summons.

By this summons the plaintiff, Stephen Thomas Moore, claimed a declaration that, on the true construction of the will of Anne Wilmer Wilmer, and in the events which happened, he had, on attaining the age of twenty-one years, become entitled as tenant in tail male in possession to her residuary real estate, and also to certain personal estate which, under the trusts of her will, were directed to be laid out in the purchase of real estate, to be held on the same trusts as her residuary real estate.

By her will, dated the 25th of September, 1876, the testatrix devised her residuary real estate unto and to the use of trustees, their heirs and assigns, upon trust to pay the income to Anna Maria Moore (a daughter of the testatrix) during her life, and after her death, subject to a trust for accumulation during the infancy of any person who would otherwise be entitled to receive the rents and profits, to stand possessed thereof upon trust for the second and every younger son of A. M. Moore, born or to be born, successively during his life, with remainder, after the death of each such son, upon trust for his first and other sons successively in order of seniority in tail male, so that every elder (except the eldest) son of A. M. Moore, born or to be born, and his first and other sons and their issue male respectively, should take before every younger son of A. M. Moore and his first and other sons and their issue male respectively, with remainder in trust for the second and every other son (except the eldest son) of A. M. Moore successively in order of seniority in tail, with certain remainders over. She bequeathed to the trustees certain personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of real estate, to be held by them on the same trusts as were declared concerning her real estate. There was also a provision that if any person other than the eldest son of A. M. Moore should become entitled to a certain other estate, called the Barne estate, the next gift in remainder should take effect.

The testatrix died on the 28th of October, 1880. At that date the defendant, Randall Kingsmill Moore, the second son of A. M. Moore, had become entitled to the Barne estate. Therefore the limitations, so far as they were good, next after the limitation in his favour, took effect.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The third son of A. M. Moore, the plaintiff, was born on the 7th of February, 1881, and was, therefore, en ventre sa mère at the date of the death of the testatrix.

After the death of A. M. Moore, the plaintiff on the 13th of September, 1902, acting on the assumption that the limitations subsequent to his own life estate were void for remoteness, and that, therefore, he took an estate in tail male by the operation of the doctrine of cypres, executed a disentailing assurance and took out the present summons against the trustees of the will. R. K. Moore was joined as a defendant in his capacity of heir-at-law and next-of-kin of the testatrix.

The only question argued was whether the limitation in tail male to the children of the plaintiff was valid.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Sargant, for the plaintiff.—The limitation is bad as infringing the rule against perpetuities. The plaintiff being en ventre sa mère at the date of the testatrix's death, the limitation in tail to the children of the third son of Mrs. Moore might have failed, because it was uncertain whether that which was ultimately born would have been born alive or would have been a son. The question then arises as to how far an infant en ventre sa mère is deemed to be born. The doctrine was introduced into English law from the civil law. By that law it was subject to two limitations; it was applicable only to personal estate, and it was based on the principle that it is to be applied only for the benefit of the unborn child. Those limitations, or at any rate the latter, have been introduced into the English law; Blackburn v. Stables, 2 Ves. & B, 367; Blasson v. Blasson, 13 W. R. 113, 2 De G. J. & S. 665. Having regard to In re Burrows, 43 W. R. 683, [1895] 2 Ch. 497, we must admit that the doctrine has been extended to cover cases where it is indifferent to the person en ventre whether he is treated as born or not, as where he is treated as born for the purpose of defining a class. In Doe v. Lancashire, 5 T. R. 49, the rule was laid down somewhat widely, but Lord Kenyon said (at p. 59) that, the rule being borrowed from the civil law, it was necessary to resort to the civil law to examine its extent. All through the judgments in Thellusson v. Woodford, 4 Ves. 227, 11 Ves. 112, where somewhat similar limitations were held to be valid, the principle is clear that the unborn child is to be treated as born for his benefit. In no case has it been held that an unborn child is to be treated as born where it would be to his detriment. [On this point they referred to Doe v. Clarke, 2 H. Bl. 399, and Long v. Blackall, 7 T. R. 100. They also argued that the rule against limiting an estate to an unborn child of an unborn child applies both to legal and equitable estates, and cited Humberston v. Humberston, 1 P. Wms. 332; Monypenny v. Dering, 2 De G. M. & G. 145; Whitby v. Mitchell, 38 W. R. 337, 44 Ch. D. 85; and In re Bowles, ante, 124, [1902] 2 Ch. 650.]

Austen-Cartmell, for R. K. Moore, did not argue.

Dickinson, for the trustees.—The rule that a person en ventre sa mère is to be deemed born for the purposes of the rule against perpetuities is absolute, and has never been limited by the supposed doctrine of benefit. Long v. Blackall, Thellusson v. Woodford, and In re Burrows are strongly in favour of that view. When the testatrix died it was an event not known, but certain, that the infant was male and would be born alive: Doe v. Lancashire.

Buckmaster, in reply.—The judgments in Thellusson v. Woodford were addressed to cases where there are limitations with restrictions, whereby the estate must vest within the limits imposed by the rule. If, for example, the limitation had been to a child to be born during the lifetime of the testatrix, or within nine months after her death, it might have been good. But that is not this case. A child en ventre sa mère is not for all purposes treated as born: Richards v. Richards, Joh. 754, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 23, 41.

BUCKLEY, J., after stating the facts, continued: Before parting with the will, I will only say that it is quite plain that the limitations are of estates which are not legal but equitable, though that does not make much difference to my decision; and that the estates are limited by way of equitable contingen remainders.

Now as the first proposition, of course, for the purpose of applying the law as to remoteness, I have to look, not at the events which did happen, but at the events which might under any state of circumstances have happened; and if the limitation is such that events might have so turned out as that it would have been beyond the period allowed under the rules as to remoteness, then it would fail, although in the events which did happen, that did not in fact result. Of course, that is beyond dispute. Secondly, of course, it cannot be disputed, and it is not disputed, that the rule of law as to remoteness admits of absolute ownership being suspended for a life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards, and that for the purposes of the rule a child en ventre sa mère is treated as a life in being. That is really not the question which lies at the root of this case. What I have to look at, as it appears to me here, is this: When the testatrix died on the 28th of October, 1880, was the limitation upon trust, after a life estate to the plaintiff, in favour of his first and other sons successively in order of seniority in tail male, one which might have failed by reason of being too remote? Could events have so turned out as that there would not, within the period allowed for vesting of estates, have come into existence a person who would have been entitled to the inheritance? What is put as to that is this. In October, 1880, when Mrs. Wilmer died, it was impossible to say whether the child of which Mrs. Moore was then pregnant was of the male or of the female sex, and it was impossible to say whether that child would ever be born alive; and, therefore, the argument is advanced, and must succeed, as it appears to me, if it is well founded, that if the child had turned out to be a daughter, or if there had been no child born alive at all, the limitations would have been void, because in that case the son who would have taken would have been born beyond the period allowed. I think that is so; but if it be a correct rule of law that in February, 1881, the child was born and turned out to be a boy, and that you are to refer back that state of facts to the earlier date—namely, the 28th of October, 1880, and say retrospectively, that at the date of the testatrix's death events had so turned out as that the rule against perpetuities could not be infringed, because there was a son in existence en ventre sa mère, he was a male, and he was born alive, then, of course, it cannot be contested but that the limitation is perfectly good. It is quite true that the class is "the second and every younger son of Anna Maria Moore born or to be born," but if once it is established that at the testatrix's death there was a son born (in the proper sense of the word) who could take, then of course there is no objection to the limitation; because in that state of things, it could not turn out that there would not be a person entitled to take the estates within the time allowed. To my mind, the point to be decided in this case is, am I entitled, after the 7th of February, 1881, when I know that the child born was a male, and that he was not born dead, but alive, to throw that back and say retrospectively that that was the state of facts in October, 1880, when the testatrix died, although you could not say that it was so at that date, because you did not know what was going to happen. To my mind that is the whole point of the case.

Upon that the dominant authority, as it appears to me, is the case of Doe v. Lancashire. I want to state as plainly as lies in my power what, as I understand it, that case decides. At that date, 1792, marriage did not revoke a will, but marriage and the birth of a child did revoke a will. It was a doctrine founded upon an implied intention of the testator, to whom this was attributed; that at the moment he sat down to make his will, he was presumed to say, "If my circumstances so alter as that I marry and have a child, then I do not intend these dispositions to take effect, because I shall then owe other duties to my widow and my offspring." That was attributed to the date at which he sat down to make his will. If subsequently, having made his will, he married, and then died leaving his wife pregnant, the question discussed in Doe v. Lancashire was, was his will revoked or not revoked at his death. It could not be revoked six to eight months after his death. Something must happen when he dies. The question to be determined was, what happens? The court held that that state of facts revoked the will, and upon this ground, that when the event happened of the child being born alive, a fact which nobody could predicate at the date of his death, that took effect retrospectively, so that you said, at the date that he died, we must take it that there was a child, because it turned out subsequently that there was born alive a child. If so, it appears to me, that governs this case. Now I want to read one or two passages first from Lord Kenyon, C.J., to show what was the law at that date, and to what he was applying it. I read this from the report of Doe v. Lancashire, 5 T R., at p. 58, where he says: "Without going into all those cases, it may now be taken for granted, because it has been solemnly decided, that marriage and the subsequent birth of a child amount to a revocation of a will made before marriage. Perhaps the foundation of that principle is not so much an intention to alter the will, implied from those circumstances happening afterwards, as a tacit condition annexed to the will itself at the time of making it, that the party does not then intend that it should take effect if there should be a total change in the situation of his family. If those cases were referable to the head of a subsequent intention, the principle would be considerably distressed by the argument of Mr. B. Perrot in Christopher v. Christopher, 2 Dickens 445, and by the circumstance of a conception not communicated to the husband, or of a miscarriage, subsequent to his death; the latter of which might have some influence on the intention of the devisor, and yet would not operate as a revocation; and the former would have that effect, though it could not influence the intention." I pause for the purpose of pointing out exactly what Lord Kenyon meant by that. He says the latter—a miscarriage—might have some influence on his intention. Obviously what he means is not a miscarriage which happens after his death, which he could not know anything about, but something subsequently resulting in a miscarriage—that is to say, if the man had known at the date of his death that his wife was pregnant, but that she would subsequently miscarry, it is quite probable that he would intend to alter his dispositions in some respects; but that cannot affect it, he says; that would not operate as a revocation, because if there is a miscarriage, and the child is not born alive, there is no revocation of the will. The other case is this—of conception not communicated to the husband. He says that that would have the effect of revoking, although it could not influence the intention, because he did not know of the conception, and it could not affect his mind at all; but if there was a conception, and there was a subsequent birth, it would revoke the will. In other words, it is quite plain from what Lord Kenyon says, that what revokes the will is not the event as it subsequently turns out as known to the devisor—it is not by the light of subsequent events, but it is by attributing to him an intention, that if something happens hereafter, then that shall not be his will. The point is that the thing that happens thereafter does not happen in his lifetime, but happens some few months after his death. Passing to Buller, J.'s, judgment, he says: "The only question which remains to be discussed is whether a child en ventre sa mère be or be not in the same situation as a child actually born. Though, when I say this, I do not forget the declarations which are stated in this verdict, to which I entirely concur with my lord that no regard is to be paid. If there be any revocation at all of this will, it is so by presumption of law, independently of express declarations." But the point comes out most plainly, and I think absolutely clearly, in what Grose, J., says. At the foot of p. 63 he says this: "The objection which has been made against this is that the will speaks from the devisor's death, and that it must be decided whether or not at that moment it be a valid will. I agree that it does speak from that time, but the instant the child is born, he is considered, by retrospect, as born during the parent's life." Now mark, directly the testator is dead, either the instrument is his will, or it is not. It is not in suspense for six months. It is his will if no child is born alive; it is not his will if a child is born alive—an event which you cannot determine till a subsequent date. The court held that, inasmuch as at the future date the child was born alive, the will ceased to be his will when he died, because it was revoked by the subsequent birth of a son, an event which no human being could predicate at the moment of his death. That case, to my mind, involves absolutely this proposition, that if the child be subsequently born, you must take it that the event must be assumed to have happened, in the sense in which one speaks of a birth as happening before it takes place, at an earlier date. The cardinal point, of course, is that the relevant event has happened at an earlier date, although you do not know that it has happened till the later date. Doe v. Lancashire, I think, decides the present case. I will go on to apply it presently, but before that, I think I ought to say something about the subsequent cases, because they have been cited and are exceedingly interesting.

The next case to which I want to refer is Blackburn v. Stables (it is not quite in order of date). Upon the question of remoteness apart altogether from another question which has been argued, as to whether the case differs according to whether it be for the benefit or disadvantage of the child, I cannot help thinking that Blackburn v. Stables governs the present case. The gift there was to trustees in trust for the son of A. at twenty-four, and if no such son, then to the son of B, and if neither of them have a son, then to the son of C.; and then there were these words: "Nor shall my executors give up their trust till a proper intail be made to the male heir by him"—words whose effect the court held to be, that the gifts so made to the son of A. and so on were gifts of estate tail to those persons. It was argued that the gift was too remote, and I cannot myself see any ground upon which it was suggested that it was too remote, except that it was at twenty-four—it was more than twenty-one. The rule as to remoteness might have been exceeded by reason of that fact. I cannot find anything else in the case to raise it. It was argued that it was too remote. The judgment is as follows: "The Master of the Rolls, on making the decree in the first instance in the plaintiff's favour, observed that it is perfectly settled that a child en ventre sa mère is to be considered as in existence for his benefit; and Thellusson's case went further; there it was held that such a child should be so considered to his disadvantage; those who supported the will, relying upon the distinction that for his advantage he was to be so considered." Now it seems to me that on the question of remoteness Blackburn v. Stables must govern this case. It was a different ground for applying the rule of remoteness; but the question there arose whether, by reason of the child being en ventre sa mère instead of born, which made all the difference in the world, the rule as to remoteness applied. The Court held that, although the child was en ventre sa mère, the rule as to remoteness did not apply, and for the reason that it was to be considered as born.

Following now the chronological order, which I departed from to cite Blackburn v. Stables, the next case is Doe v. Clarke, which is not very close to the present case. It is only an authority for the proposition that under a gift to such children of B. as shall be living at the time of his decease, a posthumous child of B. shares equally with those born in his lifetime; which is merely that the class of persons who are to take will be so considered as to include children en ventre sa mère as being members of the class, because otherwise they would be cut out and would be excluded from the benefit.

The next case in order of date is Long v. Blackall, a case again which is very close to the present. I agree, but distinguishable for reasons which Mr. Buckmaster suggested are grounds for saying that it does not absolutely govern the present case; but Lord Kenyon, in concluding his judgment, says this (7 T. R., at p. 102): "It is an established rule that an executory devise is good if it must necessarily happen within a life or lives in being and twenty-one years, and the fraction of another year, allowing for the time of gestation." Of course that observation covers the present case altogether. If I am right in saying that Doe v. Lancashire throws the event back, then that is covered It must then necessarily happen. As Lawrance, J., says, in Long v. Blackall, it "must take effect, if at all, after a life which must be in being within nine months after the devisor's death." That is the same point again. If I am right in saying that the subsequent birth of a son is referable back to the death of the testatrix, then that sentence altogether applies.

The next case is Thellusson v. Woodford. At 4 Ves. 227, Sir R. P. Arden, M.R., says this, at p. 334: "It remains then to be considered whether a child en ventre sa mère is a life in being. I considered the case of Long v. Blackall a complete decision upon that point." Then a little further on, at p. 335, he says: "It must be admitted that there is one case in which, to a certain extent, a child en ventre sa mère is not considered to all intents and purposes as in existence. That is in the case of a descent at common law. Notwithstanding the statute, and that in every other case such child is considered as born from the time the devise or limitation takes place, in that case the intermediate rents and profits, as in the case of Bassett v. Bassett, are declared to belong to the heir-at-law." Then he goes on, on p. 336—a passage which I need not read—to address himself to the case, which is not the present, no doubt, of an estate tail limited to all the sons of A. living at the death of the testator, for their lives, with remainder over. That only becomes the present case, if I am right in saying that, upon Doe v. Lancashire, this was a male life in being at the testatrix's death, and that the event is to be referred back. In the report of Thellusson v. Woodford, in 11 Ves., at p. 143, Macdonald, C.B., speaking again of Long v. Blackall, says: "The case of Long v. Blackall seems to have decided that an infant in ventre matris is a life in being. The established length of time, during which the vesting may be suspended, is during a life or lives in being, the period of gestation, and the infancy of such posthumous child."

Those are the authorities which, it seems to me, are the ground for deciding the present case. I only want to cite one or two others for the purpose of saying that they seem to me to have very much less bearing. In the first place there is the decision of Lord Westbury in Blasson v. Blasson. Now the expression there to be construed was "born and living at the time of my decease," that expression being used as a definition of a point of time. The gift was "when and so soon as the youngest of 'certain children' who shall have been born and living at the time of my decease . . . shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years," then to divide "among all such children of my nephew and nieces last named as shall be then living," and what Lord Westbury held was that the class to take was to be a class to be ascertained at a period subsequent to the death of the testatrix—a period of division, and that all children living at the period of division, whether born before or after the death of the testatrix, were entitled. So that these words, "born and living," were not relevant for the purpose of determining the persons to take, but only for the purpose of determining the point of time at which they were to take. Upon that latter point, after making various citations from the civil law, Lord Westbury came to the conclusion that, inasmuch as the words were relevant only for the purpose of ascertaining the period of time, and not the description of the persons to take, the words, "born and living at the time of my decease" might properly have and ought to have their strict meaning—that is to say, children actually born at that date to the exclusion of children en ventre sa mère at that date, with the consequence that the date for distribution arrived when the youngest of the children born at that date attained twenty-one, and not at the date when the youngest of the children en ventre sa mère at that date attained twenty-one, which, of course, was a totally different date, and had nothing to do with this matter.

Then the other point which has been argued is this: It is said, and truly said, that in many cases you will find the expression used that this rule of treating a child who is not in fact born, but is only en ventre sa mère, as being born, is a rule which is applied, it is suggested, only when it is for the benefit of the infant to apply it. Now, thus stated, the proposition is not correct. You must extend it to this extent, that if it is wholly immaterial to the child which view you take, whether you apply the rule or not, you still treat the child as being born which is only en ventre sa mère. The decision in In re Burrows, of Chitty, J., is to that effect. It was a gift to B. "in case she has issue living at the death of A." It is no gift to the issue at all. At A.'s death B. was pregnant, and a child was subsequently born, and it was held that she took—that is to say, the child for the purpose of being considered as born, was treated as being born, when the child did not take in either event, but somebody else took. To that you must add this, that the rule is applied when it is for the advantage of the infant, and it is also to be applied when it is immaterial to the infant whether you apply the rule or do not apply the rule. But then it is said that the rule ought not to be applied when it is to the disadvantage of the infant, but no authority is to be found for that proposition, and I am unable to see, looking at Doe v. Lancashire, how it is possible that that can be the true principle. Because, mark you, in the case which arose in Doe v. Lancashire it did not in the least matter what were the contents of the will. The contents of the will might have been in favour of the after-born child, contemplating its possible existence, but they might have been adverse to the child, or they might have been totally immaterial to the child. For the purpose of the doctrine of Doe v. Lancashire it does not matter what the will contained. If there be, after the execution of the will, a marriage and the birth of a child, the will is revoked, utterly irrespective of what the will contains, and it is revoked, as it appears to me from the passages that I have read, not upon any doctrine of its affecting the child, but because it is contemplated that when the man originally sat down to make his will when there was not in existence a marriage and a child, he is to be taken by implication to have intended that, if the circumstances altered, he would make some other will—what other will does not matter at all—and the will would go.

In my judgment, therefore, the doctrine in question, by which a child en ventre sa mère is to be treated as existing for many purposes—for all purposes other than the descent at common law as regards rents during the intermediate period, is one which is applicable, not only where it is to the advantage of the child to apply it, nor merely by way of addition to that where it is immaterial to the child whether you apply it or do not apply it, but also where it is to the disadvantage of the child to apply it. It appears to me that the doctrine is a general one. To apply it to this case, what happened was this. When the testatrix died there was in existence a fœtus, which turned out when the birth resulted to be a male child. That was a living thing when the testatrix died. The limitation is perfectly good if that living thing is to be taken to have been at the date of her death that which it turned out to be. I think Doe v. Lancashire decides that I may take it to be that which it turned out to be, and, retrospectively, I ought to say that on the 28th of October, 1880, Anna Maria Moore had a third son who could take; and if so that the limitation is good, and I therefore hold it to be good.

Solicitors, Evans, Foster, & Wadham; Tylee & Co.

---

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } Dec. 4.

In re BARLOW'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Settled land—Sale—Life estate—Merger—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 50.

Where a tenant for life has parted with his life estate in an undivided share of the property to remaindermen, and he continues to be beneficially entitled to the remaining portion, the whole property is still settled land, and he can make a title to the entirety with the consent of the assignees.

In re Mundy and Roper's Contract, 47 W. R. 226, [1899] 1 Ch. 275, considered.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Vendor and purchaser summons.

This was a summons by the vendor to determine whether a title could be made to settled real estate.

The vendor was a tenant for life.

The question was raised, whether, assuming that the vendor had parted with two undivided shares of her life estate to remaindermen, she could make a title to the entirety with the consent of her alleged assignees.

R. J. Parker, for the vendor, referred to the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 50, and s. 2, sub-sections 1, 3, 4, 5; Alexander v. Mills, 19 W. R. 310, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 124.

Northcote, for the purchasers, referred to In re Mundy and Roper's Contract, 47 W. R. 226, [1899] 1 Ch. 275.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment said: The object of the Settled Land Act, 1882, is to enable a life tenant to exercise the powers of the Act, notwithstanding any assignment of his life estate. He cannot release or contract not to exercise those powers, and if he assigns his life estate for value he can still exercise his powers, but not so as to prejudice the rights of the assignee without his consent. In the present case it is contended that, owing to certain alleged assignments to remaindermen, the settlement is at an end as to two-thirds of the entire estate. But in my opinion the whole property still remains subject to the limitations of the settlement, and the vendor is still life tenant thereof within the meaning of the Settled Land Acts. There is nothing in those Acts to show that when a life tenant parts with his life estate in an undivided share of the property to a remainderman his powers are to cease in respect of that share. It is contended that they cease by the operation of the law of merger, and for this contention certain observations by Chitty, L.J., in In re Mundy and Roper's Contract are relied on. Chitty, L.J., says: "It may be that if the settlement consists merely of a life estate in A., with remainder to B. in fee, and A. surrenders his life estate to B., the power is gone under the doctrine of merger; and that such a case is not within the section, because where the settlement is thus brought to an end and exhausted there is no reason why such a power should continue after the absolute fee simple is vested in possession. I say 'may be' because it is not necessary to consider such a case, which does not arise upon the facts before us." But those observations, which are prefaced by the words "It may be," are directed to a case where an entire life estate has merged, so that the fee simple is vested in possession, and are based on the assumption that in such a case there is no reason why the powers should continue. In the present case, where at most only a portion of the life estate is gone, and the life tenant is still beneficially entitled to the remaining portion, and where it may be to the interest of all parties that she should be able to exercise her powers, I am of opinion that her powers still continue as to the entirety, and that the whole property is still settled land. The life tenant can therefore make a title to the entirety with the consent of her alleged assignees.

Solicitors, Richard F. & C. L. Smith, for Septimus Gladstone Ward, Newcastle-on-Tyne; Speechly, Mumford, Rodgers, & Craig, for J. M. Hayton, Town Clerk, South Shields.

---

K. B. Div.
(Joyce, J., an additional judge.) March 17, 18.

LYON & CO. v. LONDON CITY AND MIDLAND BANK. (a.)

Fixtures—Mortgagor and mortgagee—Chairs in theatre screwed to floor—Hired by mortgagor—Removal by owner.

The rule that chattels attached to the soil are fixtures may be displaced by showing that they were not annexed for the permanent improvement of the land, but for the purpose of their temporary enjoyment as chattels.

Accordingly, chairs in a theatre which are complete in themselves but are screwed to the floor for their better use and enjoyment are not fixtures, and do not pass under a mortgage of the premises and fixtures.

This was an action to recover certain chairs or seats alleged to be the property of the plaintiffs, and now placed in the Brighton Hippodrome, of which building the defendants were mortgagees.

The plaintiffs were a firm of upholsterers, and part of their business was to supply chairs and seats for theatres and other places of public entertainment on hire.

On the 7th of August, 1901, the plaintiffs entered into an agreement with a Mr. Ellis, who was the owner and occupier of the Brighton Hippodrome, to supply 689 crimson velvet armchairs for use at the Hippodrome, for the hire of which Ellis agreed to pay £20 per week for not less than twelve weeks, and in default of any one week's payment the plaintiffs were to be at liberty to remove the chairs without let or hindrance, and Ellis was to have an option to purchase the chairs within three months for £676.

The agreement was afterwards extended for a further period of twelve weeks.

On the 18th of October, 1901, Ellis mortgaged the Hippodrome to the defendant bank to secure his account, the mortgage deed containing a conveyance by Ellis to the bank of the premises "together with (in addition to any fixtures passing by reason of the conveyance hereinbefore contained) all fixtures whatsoever now or at any time hereafter affixed or attached to the said premises or to any part thereof."

The bank having entered into possession under their mortgage, refused to allow the plaintiffs to remove their chairs, and this action was brought in consequence of such refusal.

It appeared that the chairs in question were constructed on iron frames, each chair being separate, but so made as, if required, to be capable of being fastened to any other so as to form a row of seats. Each chair had two standards with holes at the feet of them for the insertion of screws. In accordance with the requirements of the Brighton Town Council the seats were fastened by means of screws to the floor, the floor itself consisting of planks nailed upon a bed of concrete.

H. Reed, K.C., and D. M. Kerly for the plaintiffs, contended that under the circumstances the chairs were the property of the plaintiffs and could be removed by them. The test is whether the chattels were intended under the circumstances to be fixtures: In re De Falbe, Ward v. Taylor, 49 W. R. 455, [1901] 1 Ch. 523, affirmed sub-nomine Leigh v. Taylor, 50 W. R. 623, [1902] A. C. 157. Here the chairs were clearly not intended to be fixtures.

They also referred to Norton v. Dashwood, 44 W. R. 680, [1896] 2 Ch. 497.

Muir Mackenzie and C. Holden, for the defendants, relied upon Hobson v. Gorringe, 45 W. R. 356, [1897] 1 Ch. 182, which they contended covered the present case, the annexation there, by means of screws, being identical with the annexation in the present case.

They also referred to Gough v. Wood, 42 W. R. 469, [1894] 1 Q. B. 713; Reynolds v. Ashby, [1903] 1 K. B. 87.

JOYCE, J.—Whatever my own opinion might otherwise have been, of course I am bound by any decision of the Court of Appeal and by the decision of any court of co-ordinate jurisdiction if that decision is on all fours with the present case. I must confess I cannot help feeling that there is much to be said in favour of the view taken by North, J., in the case of Cumberland Union Banking Co. v. Maryport Hematite Iron Co., 40 W. R. 280, [1892] 1 Ch. 415—namely, that a mortgagor cannot give to his mortgagee a better right or title than he has himself. Certainly no one but a lawyer would say that these chairs belonged to the mortgagees. I must, however, decide the case in accordance with the law as I understand it. It seems to me that there are important differences between this case and those relied upon by the defendant bank. The chattels in this case are chairs, and not engines, boilers, or machines, as in most of the cases cited. They are complete in themselves, and could be used without any annexation, although no doubt they could be better used and enjoyed if and when fixed down to the floor. It is also to be noticed in the present case that the agreement under which the chairs were supplied by the plaintiffs was not an ordinary hire-purchase agreement, and in some of the text-books the cases like Hobson v. Gorringe are treated as being decided on that ground. The agreement, however, here is simply for the hire of the chairs, though there is no doubt an option of purchase. At the date of the mortgage the legal ownership in these chairs was in the plaintiffs, and it never had been in the mortgagor. It is difficult, therefore, to see how the legal ownership, which was in the plaintiffs and not in the mortgagor, could have passed to the mortgagees. Where a chattel is attached to the soil primâ facie it is a fixture; but that inference may be displaced by showing the removability of the chattel and by showing that it was not annexed for the permanent improvement of the land, but for the purpose of its temporary enjoyment as a chattel. I think that that was the case here. The chairs were only annexed for a temporary purpose, and the mode of annexation was much more analogous to the case of a carpet than that of engines, boilers, and machinery. The chairs, in my opinion, never ceased to be chattels, and did not pass with the mortgage of the freehold. There must therefore be judgment for the plaintiff with costs.

Solicitors, Reed & Reed; Nye, Moreton, & Co., for J. K. Nye & Treacher, Brighton.

(a.) Reported by C. B. CAMM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Feb. 4.

JARED v. CLEMENTS. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Equitable mortgage—Notice—Forged signature—Receipt—Legal estate—Title deeds.

A purchaser, who having notice of the existence of an equitable charge on the purchased property leaves it to the vendor to pay off such charge, is not protected against such equitable charge by possession of the legal estate and the title deeds in the event of the vendor failing to discharge it, even though there has been no negligence on his part and he has been deceived by the production of a receipt which was forged by the vendor's solicitor.

This was an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J. (reported 50 W. R. 611, [1902] 2 Ch. 399).

On the 15th of January, 1897, a Mr. Joseph Taylor, in consideration of the sum of £450 advanced to him by the plaintiff, signed a memorandum of deposit, and deposited the title deeds and writing relating to the property with the plaintiff.

In September, 1898, a receiving order in bankruptcy was made against Taylor, who, in his amended statement of affairs, verified on oath, stated that the plaintiff was a fully secured creditor of his for £450, and that the particulars of his security were "mortgage of 3 and 4, Mornington-villas, Woodford," &c.

The said receiving order was rescinded in January, 1899.

On the 13th of July, 1899, the two houses were put up for auction by Taylor, but were bought in by him.

The defendant in the action, Mrs. Emma E. Clements, who was present at the auction, subsequently entered into negotiations with him for the purchase of the said houses, and on the 17th of July, 1899, entered into a contract to purchase them free from incumbrances for £630.

An abstract of title was furnished to the defendant's solicitors by Charles Parr, Taylor's solicitor, which did not disclose the equitable charge. The defendant's solicitors, however, inspected the record of Taylor's bankruptcy proceedings, and ascertained the existence of the said mortgage. Thereupon they wrote to Parr as follows: "We have to-day made the usual searches; but we thought it necessary to inspect the bankruptcy proceedings to see that the receiving order that had been made had been discharged. We see that in these proceedings it was stated that Nos. 3 and 4, Mornington-villas were subject to a mortgage for £450. Please let us have an abstract of this mortgage and of the discharge of it." To this letter they received from Parr on the 5th of August, 1899, the following reply: "I am in receipt of yours of yesterday, and as I informed you on the telephone this morning, the mortgage you refer is a mere memorandum of deposit of deeds, and I shall be pleased to hand you the same with receipt indorsed on completion. I trust you will be able to arrange for completion one day during next week as I want to get away by the 14th." The defendant's solicitors were satisfied with this assurance, and completion took place in due course on the 10th of August, 1899, when an assignment of the property by Taylor to the defendant passing the legal estate was duly executed. At the same time the memorandum of deposit with what purported to be an added receipt dated the 10th of August, 1899, in due form for all moneys due on the security signed by the plaintiff was handed over to the defendant's solicitors together with the title deeds and papers relating to the property.

The signature was not in fact that of the plaintiff, but was forged by Parr, who was also at that time the plaintiff's solicitor, and with whom the plaintiff had left the title deeds of the property for safe custody. Parr had, however, received no authority from him to deal with them in any way. The plaintiff knew nothing of the transaction, and on ascertaining the facts commenced this action.

Byrne, J., considered that no reasonable precaution was omitted by the defendant or her solicitors, nor was the plaintiff guilty of any negligence or misconduct, and he dismissed the action.

The plaintiff appealed.

Rowden, K.C., and Cozens-Hardy, for the appellant.—If the purchaser was reasonably justified in accepting the title which was put forward, there is nothing to defeat the legal estate. In the present case there has been no negligence on the part of the purchaser, and the only question is whether he took the property with notice of this charge. But as a matter of fact he never had any notice of this charge as an existing charge. He was told that it had ceased to exist, and he took all reasonable steps to assure himself that this was so. The result is that at the time he paid his money he had no notice that this charge was a subsisting charge on the purchased property. Further, this memorandum does not contain a sufficient description of the property charged to satisfy the Statute of Frauds.

They referred to Jones v. Smith, 1 Ph. 244; Jolland v. Stainbridge, 3 Ves. 478; Ratcliffe v. Barnard, 19 W. R. 764, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 652; Jones v. Powles, 3 Myl. & K. 581; Oliver v. Hinton, 48 W. R. 3, [1899] 2 Ch. 264; Hewitt v. Loosemore, 9 Hare, 449; Earl of Gainsborough v. Watcombe Terra Cotta Clay Co., 54 L. J. Ch. 991, 34 W. R. Dig. 204; and In re Beetham, Ex parte Broderick, 35 W. R. 613, 18 Q. B. D. 380, 766.

Norton, K.C., and T. T. Methold, for the respondent, were not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of opinion that this appeal must fail. The question is one between the owner of an equitable charge, who has not been paid off, and the purchaser of the property, who has got the legal estate. This is not a case of constructive notice. We have to deal with actual notice to the purchaser's solicitor of an existing equitable charge. Having received that notice under circumstances which I need not go into, the purchaser's solicitors entered into a correspondence with the vendor's solicitor and required that this equitable charge of which he had notice should be paid off. [His lordship referred to the correspondence, and continued:] Then came the date for completion, and there is produced and handed over to the purchaser the memorandum of deposit, and what purported to be a receipt dated the 10th of August, 1899, by the person in whose favour the equitable charge was made. Primâ facie that appears to be a receipt dated on that day, acknowledging the receipt of the money on that day. It has been argued on behalf of the appellant that the purchaser's solicitor here, having had notice of the equitable charge, had at the same time notice that it had been paid off, and therefore, unless he was unreasonably negligent in the way he conducted the business, on his ascertaining that it had been paid off, the legal title of the purchaser must prevail. That argument seems to me to involve a misconception of the true rights of the parties. This is not a case of constructive notice raising the question whether all reasonable diligence was exercised to find out what might have been but was not in fact found out. It is true the learned judge in the court below found that all reasonable diligence was used, and that there was no fault on the part of the purchaser; but, on the other hand there is this broad fact underlying this case—that there was in the course of this transaction actual notice of an existing equitable charge upon the property. It seems to me that if the purchaser, having notice, chooses to complete without ascertaining for himself that the charge has been paid off, he does so at his own risk. Having found out that the charge exists, he cannot set up the legal title without getting rid of the incumbrance which he knows to exist. The result is that he takes the legal estate with the entire obligations existing under the equitable charge.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It is not necessary in this case to say whether reasonable diligence was exercised by the purchaser's solicitor, but, speaking for myself alone, if it were necessary to do so, I should hesitate, in the peculiar circumstances of this case, to say that the solicitor had taken all reasonable care to see whether this equitable charge had been satisfied. We start with the fact that, until the discovery by the purchaser's solicitor in searching the proceedings in the bankruptcy of the mortgagor, no disclosure of the equitable charge was made by the person whose duty it was to have disclosed it. He, on being informed of the existence of the charge, himself admits it, although the purchaser and the purchaser's solicitor had been allowed to remain in ignorance of it; and that is the person whose assurance the purchaser's solicitor was content to rely upon. The point, however, does not arise in this case. The result is that the actual notice, which it turns out is not notice of a satisfied charge, makes the risk fall on the purchaser. For these reasons I think that this appeal fails.

I ought to add a word on another point which was pressed upon us in argument. The learned judge in the court below found that there was such a deposit of these deeds as complied with the requirements of the Statute of Frauds, and made a good equitable charge, and the evidence is entirely consistent with that view. The present case is not at all like the case of In re Beetham, where a person who is already in possession of the deeds for some other purpose says he holds them as security for some other person. There you have the very thing which the Statute of Frauds was intended to prevent. That is a totally different thing from the case where the deeds are deposited at the time.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is not one of that fairly common class of case in which the court has to decide whether a legal mortgagee is or is not entitled to set up his legal estate against an equitable mortgage on the ground of negligence or fraud on the part of the legal mortgagee. Rightly understood, the present case is simply one of title and conveyance. The facts are shortly these: A person contracts to purchase certain property. Before completion he is told of an equitable mortgage created some time before by his vendor. What is the position of the completing purchaser when he has actual notice of the prior equitable interest? He knows that he cannot get a title from his vendor except subject to the outstanding equitable interest, unless it is got in or destroyed; and if he completes without that being done he can only take subject to the equitable interest. In order to get a good title, it is for him to see that the outstanding interest is got in or destroyed, unless indeed the owner of the interest has been guilty of some conduct which renders it inequitable or improper on his part to set up his outstanding interest against the purchaser. This is not the case here. The owner of the equitable charge has done nothing of that sort. The purchaser in this case might have asked that the equitable mortgagee should join in the conveyance. He might have gone himself to the equitable mortgagee and asked him how matters stood; or he might leave it to his vendor to get the outstanding interest in, which in fact is what he did here. If he takes this course—which may be a very reasonable one between him and his vendor—and the vendor does not get the outstanding interest in, all I can say is that, under the circumstances, the purchaser, having left it to the vendor to do that which the vendor has failed to do, must suffer for it. He knew of the existence of the equitable interest and has got it in, and therefore he takes the property subject to that interest unless he can prove that he has got it in, or that the owner of the interest has lost his right.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case seems to me on the facts to be a plain one I do not rest my judgment upon any case of negligence on the part of the purchaser's solicitor or upon any fraud. One of two innocent persons has to suffer by reason of the fraud of a third person. When the facts are known the case raises a simple issue. There was clear notice to the purchaser of an equitable charge. There was no ground for presumption that that charge had ceased to exist. On the contrary, on completion two documents were handed over to the purchaser—one of them signed by Taylor, the vendor; the other purporting to be signed by Jared, the equitable mortgagee. It seems to me it was plainly the duty of the purchaser to get in or procure the discharge of that outstanding interest, of the existence of which he knew. The transaction does not in its essence differ in the least from the case which the learned judge states by way of illustration in his judgment in the court below. If the equitable mortgage to Jared had been recited in the conveyance, and Jared had been made a party, and Parr had at completion brought the deed actually signed by Taylor, and purporting to be signed but not in fact being signed by Jared, and the purchaser had accepted that on the assurance of Parr that Jared's signature was genuine, the position of the purchaser in that case would have been clear; and the present case in no wise differs from that in principle. A purchaser who knows of an outstanding equitable interest which has to be got in to perfect his title, and on completion neglects to get in that interest, takes his conveyance at his own risk.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Shepheards & Walters; Watson, Dyer, & Rydon.

---

From K. B. Div. (Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Jan. 19.

AUSTRIAN LLOYD STEAMSHIP CO. v. GRESHAM LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY (LIMITED). (a.)

Arbitration—Staying proceedings—Submission of disputes under contract to jurisdiction of foreign courts—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), ss. 4, 27.

A policy of life insurance, effected on the life of a foreigner with an English company, contained a condition that for all disputes which might arise out of the contract of insurance, all the parties interested expressly agreed to submit to the jurisdiction of the courts of Budapest having jurisdiction in such matters.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that this was a submission of all disputes under the contract to the courts at Budapest within sections 4 and 27 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and that an action on the policy in England would be stayed Appeal from an order of Darling, J., at chambers, refusing to stay the proceedings in the action.

The action was brought upon a policy of insurance for 50,000f. on the life of Hugues Rabl, a native of Trieste, who had been chief cashier of the plaintiff company at Constantinople. The policy, which was issued by the defendants, a company whose head office was in England, and who had an office at Budapest, was made in favour of the assured's wife, and was, on the death of the assured, assigned by his personal representatives to the plaintiffs. The policy was in the French language, and was made subject to certain printed conditions, by which the premiums and policy-moneys were made payable in Budapest. The policy bore an English stamp, and was sealed with the company's English seal, and was dated "Londres," though the defendants alleged that the contract was in fact made in Hungary. Conditions 23 and 24 were under the heading "Domicile," condition 24 being as follows: "Pour toutes contestations qui pourraient surgir du contrat d'assurance toutes les parties intéressées se soumettent de convention expresse à la jurisdiction des tribunaux compétents de Budapest." In the course of the hearing of the appeal the court expressed an opinion that the words "se soumettent" might have a technical meaning, and that an expert should translate the words. Accordingly the case stood over for that purpose, and the following translation of "domicile" and condition 24 was made by an expert agreed upon between the parties: "Residence-for-purposes-of-jurisdiction." "24. For all disputes which may arise out of the contract of insurance, all the parties interested expressly agree to submit to the jurisdiction of the courts having jurisdiction in such matters of Budapest."

The plaintiffs having brought this action to recover the policy-moneys, the defendants applied, under section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, for a stay of proceedings on the ground that condition 24 was a submission of all disputes arising out of the policy to the courts at Budapest.

Darling, J., refused to stay the action.

The defendants appealed.

Haldane, K.C., and G. H. Devonshire, for the defendants.—Condition 24 is clearly a "submission" of all disputes to the courts at Budapest within sections 4 and 27 of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

They referred to Law v. Garrett, 26 W. R. 426, 8 Ch. D. 26; Hamlyn & Co. v. Talisker Distillery, [1894] A. C. 202.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and D. C. Leck, for the plaintiffs.—This is an English contract entered into by an English insurance company under their seal, and with an English stamp, and the English courts must have jurisdiction over it. Condition 24 is not a submission to arbitration within the Act. It is at most a submission to the jurisdiction of the courts at Budapest. That is not enough to enable the court to stay the action. It is not an agreement to refer all disputes to those courts. The effect of it is that if the person claiming under the policy sues in Budapest the insurance company will not object to the jurisdiction. It is a condition inserted for the benefit of the policyholder, who in the present case desires to sue in the English courts. At any rate the learned judge has exercised his discretion in the matter, and this court will not interfere.

ROMER, L.J.—The point seems a very short one, though I can conceive different minds taking different views upon it. For myself I have come to the conclusion that, this being a commercial contract condition 24 has a distinct meaning, and that meaning favours of the contention of the defendants. The question is whether the condition means that if one party is sued in Budapest he will not raise any objection to the jurisdiction, or whether it means that, if any dispute arises out of the contract of insurance, this dispute shall go for determination to the courts at Budapest. Having regard to the wording of condition 24 as now before us, and considering that this is a commercial contract, in my opinion the condition means that any such dispute shall go for determination to the courts at Budapest. By the condition, as I read it, both parties have agreed to submit all disputes to those courts. It is not as if one of the parties alone had agreed merely to submit to the jurisdiction of the courts at Budapest. If the contract had been that the parties agreed to submit all disputes to a designated arbitrator, there could have been no doubt about the matter. In my opinion that is the effect of condition 24, substituting the courts at Budapest for a designated arbitrator. The appeal must therefore be allowed, and all proceedings in the action must be stayed.

MATHEW, L.J., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Stokes & Stokes.

Solicitors for the defendants, Devonshire, Monkland, & Co.

---

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Dec. 19.

In re ALLAN.
DOW v. CASSAIGNE. (a.)

Will—Construction—Gift of residue in equal shares—Provision that share of legatee dying without leaving issue shall fall into residue—Accruer to survivors—Intestacy.

A testator gave his residuary estate upon trust as to one-fourth for each of his four daughters for life with remainder to their issue, with a provision that the share of any daughter dying without leaving issue should fall into and form part of his residuary estate, and be held and disposed of "on the same trusts as are hereinbefore declared thereof."

Held, that the case fell within In re Palmer, 42 W. R. 151, [1893] 3 Ch. 369, and that on the death of any daughter without leaving issue her share accrued to the surviving daughters, and was not divisible among all the daughters, including the deceased, with an intestacy as to one-fourth of the deceased's original fourth.

Decision of Buckley, J., reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J. The facts were as follows:

Under the will of Robert Allan, who died in 1847, his residuary realty and personalty were held upon trust for sale and investment, and the investments were to be held on trust as to one equal fourth part for each of four daughters of the testator by name for life, with remainder to their children and the issue of any children dying in their lifetimes.

(a.) Reported by H. W. LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The will contained a provision that the share of any daughter dying without leaving issue should fall into and become part of the testator's residuary estate, and be held and disposed of on the same trusts as were thereinbefore declared thereof. Three of the daughters had died, one only of them (who survived the two others) leaving issue, and the remaining survivor had no issue.

It was now desired to divide the residuary fund, and this summons was taken out to determine the question whether the share of any daughter who died without leaving issue accrued to the survivors or became divisible among all the daughters including the deceased, with an intestacy as to the deceased's consequent fourth part of her original share or sixteenth part of the whole estate.

Buckley, J., held that the latter result followed, and that the testator's next-of-kin were therefore entitled, on the death of any daughter without leaving issue, to one sixteenth of his residuary estate.

The party entitled to the share of the daughter who had died leaving issue appealed.

MacSwinney, for the appellant.—There are plain indications that the testator intended none of his property to be undisposed of, and the modern tendency is to give effect to such an intention. The case closely resembles Holgate v. Jennings, 37 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 303. Humble v. Shore, 12 W. R. 149*n*, 7 Hare, 247, deciding that there is an intestacy in such cases, has been overruled by In re Palmer, 42 W. R. 151, [1893] 3 Ch. 369.

He also cited Crawshaw v. Crawshaw, 29 W. R. 68, 14 Ch. D. 817; In re Ballance, 37 W. R. 600, 42 Ch. D. 62; and In re Owen, 36 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 539.

Medd, for the next-of-kin.—There is no second carrying over of shares; if a share fails and you divide it under the accruer clause, that clause does not apply again. The trusts hereinbefore declared cannot include the accruer clause itself. In Crawshaw v. Crawshaw the intention was plain, and in In re Ballance was treated as a case of an executory gift, which the court could mould. This is not a case of a gift to a class, where it is much easier to give shares of residue to the survivors, but a specific gift to children. In In re Owen there was not only a direction that residue should go into residue, but the words "as nearly as circumstances will permit." Holgate v. Jennings was also a case of a gift to a class. Further, apart from the general law, the words of this will show that a share is to go over once only.

Champernowne, for other beneficiaries.

Rashleigh, for the trustees.

MacSwinney, in reply.—The testator shows a plain intention to deal with his residue as a whole, and he does not contemplate residue within residue.

[VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred to Barter v. Lea, 1 Turn. & Russ. 413.]

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my opinion the decision of Buckley, J., cannot be supported, and the case is really disposed of by In re Palmer, except for one consideration which I will presently mention. In his judgment, for what reason I do not know, Buckley, J., does not refer to In re Palmer at all, and the judgment might very well have been delivered at a time when it was doubtful whether or not Humble v. Shore and the cases that followed it continued to be good law. But it is no longer necessary to find distinctions enabling one to avoid following Humble v. Shore, since that case is in terms overruled by In re Palmer. The head-note of that case in the Law Reports is as follows: "A testator, by his will, gave his residuary real and personal estate upon trust as to two fifth parts for his daughters M. and A. and all other daughters born in his lifetime equally. By a codicil he declared that the share given to M. should be restricted to a life interest only, and that upon her death it should fall into and form part of his residuary estate. Held, that the share of M. after her death did not pass to the testator's next-of-kin as undisposed of, but was divisible between the other residuary legatees. Humble v. Shore overruled." It is only necessary to read that head-note, which is clearly applicable here and must be followed by us. The only other matter is the point made by Mr. Medd with reference to the clause in the will relating to the accruer of shares. He said that the words "hereinbefore declared" show that this clause cannot include what is included in the clause itself, and that it must refer to the part of the will antecedent to this clause. This is a possible and even a natural construction, but I think we ought not so to deal with the case. It is obvious that the intention of the testator here was to create one aggregate fund and dispose of it absolutely. I need not read the words of Sir J. Plumer in Barker v. Lea, and will only repeat that there seems to me to be here a disposition of one aggregate fund which the testator intended to remain such and not be broken into, and we must therefore dispose of the case on the principle laid down by In re Palmer.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree, and I differ from the decision of Buckley, J., because it really leads to a conclusion directly opposite to that of the Court of Appeal in In re Palmer. [His lordship stated the facts of that case, and continued:] The Court of Appeal held in that case that there was a gift of the share to the other residuary legatees. Here Buckley, J., has held that on the death of a daughter without issue her share, which is directed to fall into and form part of the residuary estate of the testator, does not go altogether to the other residuary legatees, but is again divided, so that there is an intestacy as to one fourth. This is clearly opposed to In re Palmer, and the learned judge ought to have held that a share was divisible on the death of the first daughter into thirds, on that of the second into halves, and so on.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. Buckley, J., may have been successful in distinguishing this case from Crawshaw v. Crawshaw, but he overlooked the fact that distinctions of this kind need no longer be sought for, since the old rule has been got rid of by In re Palmer. We cannot give effect to Buckley, J.'s, view or do otherwise than follow In re Palmer, and hold that the share of a daughter who dies without issue goes to the other legatees. As to the other point raised by Mr. Medd, I am satisfied that the testator was disposing of his residue as a whole, and that no distinction can be drawn between original and accrued shares.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for all parties, Simpson & Co.

From K. B. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) Nov. 20, 21.

REYNOLDS v. ASHBY & SON. (a.)

Fixtures—Machinery affixed to freehold by bolts and screws—Presumption of law—Hire-purchase agreement—Rights of mortgagees in possession as against owner of machinery.

The plaintiff supplied certain machines on the hire-purchase system to the lessee of a factory, and by his workmen fixed them on concrete beds, in which were iron uprights to which the machines were fastened by screws and bolts and nuts. By the hire-purchase agreement the lessee was to make certain periodical payments, and until the whole of the payments were made the machines were to remain the property of the plaintiff; and, further, it was agreed that if the lessee made default in punctual payment of any instalment the plaintiff was to have the power to determine the hiring and remove the machines. Prior to the hiring of the machinery the lessee had mortgaged the factory. The lessee made default in payment of the instalments under the hire-purchase agreement, whereupon the plaintiff gave notice determining the hiring and demanding the return of the machinery. A few days previously, however, to this the mortgagees had entered into possession of the premises under their mortgage, and they refused to give up the machines, claiming them as fixtures.

In an action brought by the plaintiff against the mortgagees to recover the machines or their value, Lawrance, J., held, on the authority of Hobson v. Gorringe, 45 W. R. 356, [1897] 1 Ch. 182, that the machines were fixtures, and refused to leave any question to the jury.

Held, that the decision of the learned judge was right.

Hobson v. Gorringe followed.

Gough v. Wood, 42 W. R. 469, [1894] 1 Q. B. 713, distinguished.

This was an application by the plaintiff for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Lawrance, J., and a special jury.

The action was for the recovery of certain machinery or its value, and the question raised was whether the machinery, which had been hired by the mortgagor, had become fixtures which would pass to the mortgagees under a mortgage of the land.

In 1900 one Holdway, the lessee of a piece of land at Reading for ninety-nine years from the 29th of September, 1892, was building a factory on it.

On the 7th of April, 1900, he mortgaged the premises, together with the fixtures thereon, and this mortgage became vested in the defendants.

On the 30th of August, 1900, after the execution of the mortgage, and before it was assigned to the defendants, the plaintiff, who was an engineer and manufacturer of carpenters' tools, carrying on business in London as F. W. Reynolds & Co., let on hire to Holdway certain carpenters' machinery.

By the hire agreement the lessee was to make certain periodical payments for the hire, and upon the whole of the payments being made the machinery and apparatus were to vest in and become the sole property of the lessee, but until the last payment of hire was made the machinery and apparatus were to continue to be the sole and absolute property of the plaintiff.

It was further agreed that if Holdway should make default in punctual payment of any of the hire payments, then the plaintiff should be at liberty to put an end to the hiring and re-possess himself of the machinery.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The machinery was set up by the plaintiff in the factory in the following way:

A concrete bed was laid for each machine, with upright iron bolts fixed in the concrete for the purpose of securing the machine. The machine was then placed in position, there being holes in the plates to fit the bolts, and the bolts were then secured by nuts screwed on to them. The machines were worked by power conveyed to them by means of a band. The machines were bolted to prevent vibration, and could be removed by removing the nuts. Holdway having made default in his payments, the plaintiff became entitled under the terms of the agreement to resume possession of the machines, and by a notice in writing put an end to the hiring and demanded the return of the machinery and apparatus. A few days before this, however, the defendants' predecessors in title took possession of the premises and refused to deliver up the machines, contending that they had been so affixed to the freehold that they became part of the land and passed under the mortgage. At the trial Lawrance, J., held, upon the authority of Hobson v. Gorringe, 45 W. R. 356, [1897] 1 Ch. 182, that the machines were fixtures and passed to the mortgagees, and that there was no question for the jury. He accordingly directed judgment to be entered for the defendants.

From this decision the plaintiff now appealed.

H. Reed, K.C. (S. A T. Rowlatt, with him), for the appellant.—The question whether the machines were fixtures which passed to the mortgagees, or whether they were mere chattels which remained the property of the plaintiff, ought to have been left to the jury. The mode and the object of the annexation to the premises must be considered: In re De Falbe, Ward v. Taylor, 49 W. R. 455, [1901] 1 Ch., 523; Leigh v. Taylor, 50 W. R. 623, [1902] A. C. 157. The question whether the articles were affixed to the premises for their more convenient user as chattels without any intention that they should become part of the freehold, or whether they were intended to become part of the freehold is a question of fact. In Wood v. Hewett, 8 Q. B. 913; Lancaster v. Eve, 7 W. R. 260, 5 C. B. N. S. 717; Climie v. Wood, L. R. 3 Ex. 257, 16 W. R. C. L. Dig. 72, L. R. 4 Ex. 328, 17 W. R. C. L Dig. 88, the question whether a thing was a fixture or not was left to a jury. In subsequent cases the question has arisen upon special cases where the court had power to draw inferences of fact. In Hobson v. Gorringe, the question arose before a judge alone, who decided, as a fact, that the article in question became part of the freehold and passed to the mortgagee. In the present case the machines, though affixed to the freehold, were easily removable. There is no evidence that they were part of the freehold. The true inference is that they were fixed merely to steady them. At any rate the question was one for the jury and it should have been left to them: Chidley v. Churchwardens of East Ham, 32 L. T. Rep. 486, 23 W. R. Dig. 150. The mortgage was made before the machines were brought on to the factory, and as the mortgagees allowed the mortgagor to remain in possession and to carry on his business on the premises they impliedly authorized him to enter into the agreement to hire the machines and to place them on the premises as trade fixtures with an implied licence to him or to the person from whom he hired them to remove them from the premises: see Gough v. Wood & Co., 42 W. R. 469, [1894] 1 Q. B. 713; Sanders v. Davis, 33 W. R. 655, 15 Q. B. D. 218; Cumberland Union Banking Co. v. Maryport Hematite Iron and Steel Co., 40 W. R. 280, [1892] 1 Ch. 415.

Hamilton, K.C. (A. Powell, K.C., and J. H. Keeling, with him), for the respondents.—The learned judge was right in not leaving any question to the jury. The facts here showed that the machines as a matter of law were fixtures. In any case, however, the ultimate question whether a certain thing is a fixture or not is one of law. In Climie v. Wood, Kelly, C.B., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, said that the finding of the jury that the articles were affixed to the premises by the mortgagor for their more convenient user, and not to improve the inheritance, and that they could be removed without damage to the freehold, became immaterial. The question how the articles came upon the premises, their nature, and the mode of attachment to the premises, if there be any dispute about these matters, would be proper questions for a jury. But whether the articles so affixed are or are not fixtures which form part of the freehold was a question of law: see Longbottom v. Berry, L. R. 5 Q. B. 123, 18 W. R. C. L. Dig. 43. In Holland v. Hodgson, 20 W. R. 990, L. R. 7 C. P. 328, Blackburn, J., suggested that when an article is annexed even slightly to the land, the presumption is that it is a fixture. In Hobson v. Gorringe it was held that the existence of a hire-purchase agreement, as in this case, was not evidence to rebut the presumption. Leigh v. Taylor laid down no principle inconsistent with the decision in Hobson v. Gorringe. The decision in Chidley v. Churchwardens of West Ham, as explained in Tyne Boiler Works Co. v. Overseers of Longbenton, 35 W. R. 110, 18 Q. B. D. 81, has no bearing on the present case. Gough v. Wood & Co. shows that the principle is that a licence by the mortgagee to the mortgagor to remove the articles must be implied only so long as the mortgagor remains in possession. That case was a very exceptional case, and the principle of it ought not to be extended. The present case cannot be distinguished from Hobson v. Gorringe

Counsel also cited Huddersfield Banking Co. v. Lister, 43 W. R. 567, [1895] 2 Ch. 273.

Reed, K.C., replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from Lawrance, J., and the case comes before us on the point that the learned judge left no question to the jury, but decided it himself upon the authority of Hobson v. Gorringe.

Holdway was the owner of a term of ninety-nine years in certain land, upon which he built a factory, and in that factory he put machinery for the purpose of carrying on his joinery business. Before building the factory he had mortgaged the land by a deed in which was recited his intention of erecting this factory, and the mortgage expressly referred to fixtures. This mortgage was followed by several others, the last being to the defendants, by whom they were all eventually bought up. Holdway, for the purpose of putting machinery in his factory, entered into a hire-purchase agreement with the plaintiff, under which, if the instalments of the price of the machinery were not duly paid, the plaintiff should have the right of resuming possession of the machinery. The machinery consisted of machine tools, such as lathes, planes, and saws, all substantial and weighty articles. These were attached by being screwed to bolts in beds of concrete. The machinery, which was actuated by steam-power, was all connected together and formed one system of machinery for the purpose of the joinery business. Default having been made by Holdway in paying the instalments, the plaintiff demanded the return of the machinery, but, just previously to this demand being made, one of the prior mortgagees had entered into possession of the premises. That mortgagee's rights having subsequently been acquired by the defendants, they have a right to say that whatever rights that mortgagee possessed to insist on the machinery being left on the premises they now possess. Therefore the question which arises is not as to what are the rights of the person who let the machinery on hire before the mortgagee took possession to resume possession of this machinery, but whether, under the circumstances of the case, the plaintiff is entitled to resume possession of it as against the defendants. It was contended by counsel on behalf of the plaintiff that there was a question of fact which ought to have been left to the jury, and that therefore it was not for the learned judge to decide the question himself. It was said by the plaintiff's counsel that the machines never lost their character as chattels, that they never became "fixtures" in the sense in which that word is used in cases between landlord and tenant—that is, something annexed to the freehold. Unless he can carry the case as far as that and can show that the machines never became fixtures, and so were never part of the mortgage security, but remained mere furniture or chattels, he must fail, inasmuch as the mortgagees had taken possession, subject to one point, as to the conduct of the mortgagees, with which I shall deal later on. That question it is said is a question of fact, and that is the only point that gives us any difficulty. There is a long series of decisions in which the matter has apparently been treated as one of law, and these cases decided that chattels attached as these machines were are to be regarded as fixtures. In Hobson v. Gorringe the mode of attachment appears to have been identical with that employed in the present case, and the only feature of distinction between the two cases is that in that case the mortgagor was owner in fee of the premises, whereas in the present case he is the owner for a term of years. In that case an elaborate judgment was delivered in which all the authorities were reviewed, and in which it was laid down as clear law that the inference from those facts was, as a matter of law, that the mode of attachment did constitute the thing a fixture. When machinery is attached which primâ facie makes it a fixture the presumption is that it becomes part of the freehold, although it is possible to rebut that presumption if evidence is forthcoming of particular circumstances sufficient to take it out of that category. That was explained in Holland v. Hodgson, where Blackburn, J., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, said, L. R. 7 C. P., at p. 335: "Perhaps the true rule is that articles not otherwise attached to the land than by their own weight are not to be considered as part of the land, unless the circumstances are such as to show that they were intended to be part of the land, the onus of showing that they were so intended lying on those who assert that they have ceased to be chattels, and that, on the contrary, an article which is affixed to the land even slightly is to be considered as part of the land, unless the circumstances are such as to show that it was intended all along to continue a chattel, the onus lying on those who contend that it is a chattel."

Therefore, we have a presumption arising from the fact of attachment that the thing is a fixture, and the onus is cast on the plaintiff of showing that it is not a fixture. If the plaintiff did not give evidence to rebut this presumption the judge was right in withdrawing the case from the jury. Is there any such evidence here? The main suggestion is that the hire-purchase agreement giving the plaintiff power to resume possession is such evidence. But that very point was considered in Hobson v. Gorringe, and it was clearly laid down there that the hire-purchase agreement could not be introduced to show with what intention the attachment was made. In that case A. L. Smith, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, said, [1897] 1 Ch. at p. 193: "In each of these instances it will be seen that the circumstance to show intention is the degree and object of the annexation which is in itself apparent, and thus manifested the intention. Lord Blackburn in his proposed rule was not contemplating a hire and purchase agreement between the owner of a chattel and a hirer, or any other agreement unknown to either a vendee or mortgagee in fee of land, and the argument that such a consideration was to be entertained, in our judgment, is not well founded."

Again, in Ward v. Taylor Vaughan Williams, L.J., said, [1901] 1 Ch., at p. 535: "In dealing with the question of fixtures, it sometimes becomes material to consider the object and purpose of the annexation, by which I do not mean that there must be an inquiry into the motive of the person who annexed them, but a consideration of the object and purpose of the annexation as it is to be inferred from the circumstances of the case." The hire-purchase agreement not being evidence to show with what intention the machines were attached, what evidence is there to rebut the presumption that these machines were attached in such a way as to make them fixtures? There is no such evidence. The person who attached the machines hired them for the purpose of using them in his factory, and there is nothing to favour the view that the attachment was only intended to be temporary or otherwise than for the purpose of the business of the factory.

Therefore it seems to me clear, considering the line of cases on the subject, that there was no evidence fit for a jury to consider to rebut the presumption arising from the mode of attachment. Therefore, on the case of Hobson v. Gorringe, which is a case on all fours with the present, the learned judge rightly withdrew the case from the jury.

There remains the second point raised—namely, as to the mortgagee's rights. It was said that the decision in Gough v. Wood & Co. gave the plaintiff a better right than the mortgagee had, that the fact that the mortgagee had allowed the mortgagor to carry on his business on the premises implied that the mortgagee had licensed the mortgagor to enter into the hire-purchase agreement, and therefore where the person who let the machines intervened and resumed possession of the goods before the mortgagee had entered into possession of the premises, the latter could not assert a title to the goods against him. That case was decided on the ground that the mortgagee had not taken possession before the removal of the fixtures. The point was left open whether the fixtures could have been removed if the mortgagee had taken possession before removal, but it seems to me that that point was decided in favour of the mortgagee in the case of Hobson v. Gorringe. There the person who let out the machines claimed to resume possession of them after the mortgagee had taken possession. Gough v. Wood is therefore distinguishable in the present case, as it was in Hobson v. Gorringe.

I should perhaps observe that it is clear law that chattels removable as between landlord and tenant or between tenant for life and remainderman, which are attached to the freehold in such a way as to show that they are fixtures in that sense only, and not as a permanent part of the freehold, nevertheless are included in a mortgage of the land and cannot be removed as against the mortgagee. That point was decided in Climie v. Wood, which was approved of in Holland v. Hodgson, where it was said, L. R. 7 C. P., at p. 333, that "since the decision of this court in Climie v. Wood it must be considered as settled law (except, perhaps, in the House of Lords) that what are commonly known as trade or tenants' fixtures form part of the land and pass by a conveyance of it; and that, though if the person who erected those fixtures was a tenant with a limited interest in the land, he has a right, as against the freeholder, to sever the fixtures from the land, yet if he be a mortgagor in fee he has no such right as against his mortgagee."

In the present case the plaintiff's counsel, feeling the difficulty of contending that this machinery came under the description of trade fixtures, argued that they were only to be regarded as chattels, and he relied upon the decision in Leigh v. Taylor. But when that case is looked at it will be seen that it does not bear out that contention. The subject-matter of discussion there was certain tapestry, and it was decided that although it was a fixture within the definition I have given it was only attached sub modo. In that case Rigby, L.J., put the tapestries into the category of "ornamental fixtures." The observations of Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L.JJ., are to the same effect. The House of Lords adopted the judgment of the Court of Appeal in its integrity, and Lord Halsbury's judgment clearly places the matter on the same footing. Having regard to these authorities, and the absence in this case of any evidence to rebut the presumption of law that the machines were fixtures, I think the view taken by Lawrance, J., is the right one.

Chidley v. West Ham Churchwardens, which was decided on a question of rating, has been commented on in the Court of Appeal. That case has given us some difficulty, and if it can be sustained it is on the ground on which it was distinguished by the Court of Appeal in the case of Tyne Boiler Works Co. v. Longbenton Overseers. In that case the court seem to have thought that the chattels referred to in Chidley v. West Ham Churchwardens would have unquestionably passed by a demise of the premises. That would be sufficient to carry the machines in the present case. It seems to me that Chidley v. West Ham Churchwardens is distinguishable for the reason stated in Tyne Boiler Works Co. v. Longbenton Overseers—namely, that it was decided on the ground that the tanks in question in that case had been rated as mere personal property.

I think, on the admitted facts of the case now before us, that Lawrance, J., was right in withholding the case from the jury, and that, therefore, this appeal must fail.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Having regard to all the circumstances, including the fact that the mortgagor was the owner of the premises for a long term of years, I think that, as between the mortgagor and mortgagees, these machines had become fixtures, and therefore part of the mortgage security. I am also of opinion that the jury, on the facts of this case, could not have found that these machines were not fixtures as between mortgagor and mortgagee. The authorities which support the view in cases similar to the present one, between mortgagor and mortgagee, that these machines are fixtures, are, it appears to me, too strong to be now departed from.

The only case which throws any doubt on this point is Chidley v. West Ham Churchwardens, which was fully dealt with in the case of Tyne Boiler Works Co. v. Longbenton Overseers, in which it was pointed out that that case must be regarded as depending upon circumstances not material here, and not as an authority that machines fixed as those are in the case before us do not form part of the premises so as to pass by a demise or mortgage. As regards the title of the mortgagor to the machines, as between him and the plaintiff, the mortgagee is not affected by any notice of the rights of the plaintiff, and is not prevented from claiming them as fixtures, finding them, as he does, on the premises. The mortgagor, though he knew of the plaintiff's rights, may yet have anticipated paying for the machinery and so acquiring a title to it.

It may be that until the mortgagees entered into possession a license to remove these machines might be inferred, and that such a license would, as between the plaintiff and the mortgagor, have enabled the plaintiff to assert his rights, but any such license ended when possession was taken by the mortgagee. A mortgagee allowing the mortgagor to remain in possession does not affect himself with notice of the mortgagor's contracts or title to the chattels affixed. In the present case the plaintiff had no rights which could affect the land as against the mortgagees. As far as concerns the difficulty, if any, by reason of the contract between the plaintiff and the mortgagor, the case of Hobson v. Gorringe binds us.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case we have to consider in the first place how the machines were attached, and in the second place the purpose for which they were attached. In the first place, they were attached as immovable, and therefore they were fixtures. Then the question arises for what purpose they were so affixed, whether for use as chattels or in order to enhance the value of the premises. It would be impossible to suggest that the machines were attached only for their more convenient use as chattels. They therefore pass, under the ordinary rule, to the defendants as mortgagees. The case of Chidley v. West Ham Churchwardens, in which the question for decision was whether movable articles could be rated and not whether they added to the rateable value of the premises, throws no light upon the case before us.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Scott, Spalding, & Bell.

Solicitor for the respondents, T. H. E. Foord.

---

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Kekewich, J. } Jan. 19.

LONDON AND COUNTY CONTRACTS (LIMITED) v. TALLACK. (a)

Bankruptcy—Undischarged bankrupt—Title of trustee in bankruptcy to after-acquired real property of bankrupt—Bonâ fide purchaser for value—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 44, 54.

The principle laid down in Cohen v. Mitchell, 38 W. R. 551, 25 Q. B. D. 262 (i e., that until the trustee in bankruptcy intervenes, all transactions by a bankrupt after his bankruptcy with any person dealing with him bonâ fide and for value in respect of his after-acquired property, and whether with or without knowledge of the bankruptcy, are valid as against the trustee) does not apply to real estate.

In re New Land Development Association and Gray, 40 W. R. 295, 551, [1892] 2 Ch. 138, followed.

Witness action.

In this case the plaintiffs asked for a declaration that they were entitled to the equity of redemption in certain freehold property which they had purchased from an undischarged bankrupt, and also sought to redeem the mortgage secured thereon, under the following circumstances.

(a.) Reported by C. B. CAMM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 22nd of August, 1900, George Carter acquired certain freehold property at Epsom. Carter had been adjudged a bankrupt in 1891, and was at the time of the transactions herein mentioned an undischarged bankrupt.

On the 15th of October, 1900, Carter mortgaged the property in question to Miss E. N. Mason, and on the 18th of December, 1900, he conveyed the equity of redemption in the property to the plaintiffs, who were unaware of Carter's bankruptcy, and they thereupon entered into possession of the property and spent a considerable sum in building thereon. The plaintiffs gave notice of the purchase to the mortgagee, who on the 20th of December, 1900, transferred her interest to the defendant.

The defendant subsequently learned that Carter was an undischarged bankrupt, and on the 21st of October, 1901, he acquired from the official receiver, as trustee of the bankrupt's property, all his interest in the land in question. The defendant disputed the plaintiffs' title on the ground that the conveyance of the 18th of December, 1900, was inoperative to confer on the plaintiffs any right or title to the equity of redemption as against the official receiver.

The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action.

Woodfin, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs have a good title as against the official receiver: Cohen v. Mitchell, 38 W. R. 551, 25 Q. B. D. 262. Although it has been held by Chitty, J., in In re New Land Development Association and Gray, 40 W. R. 295, 551, [1892] 2 Ch 138, and by Farwell, J., in Bird v. Philpott, [1900] 1 Ch. 822, 48 W. R. Dig. 19, that the principle in Cohen v. Mitchell does not apply to real estate, yet the Court of Appeal in Cohen v. Mitchell had not so limited the principle. Moreover, the plaintiffs are bonâ fide purchasers for value without notice of the bankruptcy, and their title ought to prevail over that of the official receiver.

Muir Mackenzie, for the defendant, was not called upon.

KEKEWICH, J., said that the plaintiffs in this action claimed under a conveyance from George Edward Carter. At the date when Carter acquired the property he was an undischarged bankrupt, and the question was whether he could acquire it except for the benefit of the official receiver or his trustee in bankruptcy, and whether he could give a good title to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs relied on Cohen v. Mitchell, in which case it was held that until the trustee in bankruptcy intervened all transactions by a bankrupt after his bankruptcy with any person dealing with him bonâ fide and for value in respect of his after-acquired property, and whether with or without knowledge of the bankruptcy, were valid against the trustee. No doubt that case, standing alone would be an authority in favour of the plaintiffs, but, it had been held by Chitty, J., in In re New Land Development Association and Gray, that the principle laid down in Cohen v. Mitchell did not apply to real estate, and although the Court of Appeal did not decide the point, they appeared to support Chitty, J.'s, view. Moreover, the same point came before Chitty, J., in In re Clayton and Barclay's Contract, 43 W. R. 549, [1895] 2 Ch. 212, where the learned judge adhered to his former opinion, and treated the point as having been approved by the Court of Appeal, but held that Cohen v. Mitchell did apply to leaseholds. In re New Land Development Association and Gray had been followed in Bird v. Philpott by Farwell, J., who considered it to be binding on him. Under these circumstances his lordship was bound to hold that the principle laid down in Cohen v. Mitchell did not apply to freeholds, and accordingly judgment was entered for the defendants.

Solicitors, Mason, Son, & Co.; Yeilding, Piper, & Tallack.

---

Chan. Div. }
Buckley, J. } Feb. 21.

In re TELESCRIPTOR SYNDICATE (LIMITED). (a)

Company—Winding up—Stay of proceedings—Discretion of court—Application of bankruptcy rule—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 89.

In exercising its discretionary power to order a stay of proceedings in a winding up, the court (as in the analogous case of rescinding a receiving order or annulling an adjudication in bankruptcy) will not merely regard the wishes of the creditors and shareholders, but will also consider whether an exercise of that discretion is conducive or detrimental to commercial morality and the interests of the public at large.

The Telescriptor Syndicate (Limited) was incorporated in April, 1896.

The signatories appointed Messrs R. W. Wallace, B. Hoffman, and P. Hoffman directors.

Shortly after incorporation Mr. Hayes Fisher and Sir J. Lawrence became directors; Claude Scott became secretary in July, 1897.

The company held its offices on lease from the Westminster Trust (Limited).

On the 20th of February, 1902, the secretary reported to the board that the trust had applied for the rent due, and was instructed to try to arrange for the acceptance by the trust of debentures.

On the 1st of August, 1902, the secretary reported that the trust had served a writ for rent amounting to over £350, and the directors present (Messrs. R. W. Wallace and P. Hoffman) resolved "to let the matter take its course."

On the 7th of November, 1902, the trust presented a petition for winding up the company, and on the 25th of November a winding-up order was made.

On the 27th of November the official receiver gave notice to the directors and secretary to attend him on the 3rd of December to give information as to the company's affairs, and on the following day he called upon the same persons to submit a statement of affairs.

On the 3rd of December no director attended or responded, but the secretary attended and gave some information, and stated that the directors were going to apply for a stay of proceedings in the winding up. No stay was applied for, and on the 17th of December notice was sent to the directors and secretary to attend on the 19th.

The directors failed to attend, but written explanation of this failure to attend was received from two of them, Sir J. Lawrence and P. Hoffman.

Other notices to attend were served in January, 1903.

This was an application by the secretary, with the consent of the company's creditors and a majority of the shareholders, for a stay of proceedings in the winding up.

The court has power under section 89 of the Companies Act, 1862, to stay proceedings "upon proof to the satisfaction of the court that all proceedings in relation to such winding up ought to be stayed."

The official receiver stated in his affidavit: "I have no information as to the terms upon which the claim of the petitioning creditors has been settled, or as to the terms upon which the other creditors of the company have consented to the winding up being stayed. It appears from an entry in the above-named company's minute book which was produced to me by the said Claude Scott that some of the directors received large blocks of fully paid-up shares issued to them as nominees of the vendor to the company, and I am informed by the said C. Scott that some of those shares were transferred by way of bonus to subscribers of the capital of the company. The said C. Scott informed me that he was unable to give any information as to the promotion and formation of the company, as he was not connected with the company at the time when it was formed, but was appointed secretary some months afterwards."

J. G. Wood, for the secretary, supported the application.

R. J. Parker opposed on behalf of the official receiver.

BUCKLEY, J., after stating the facts, said that when an application was made in bankruptcy to rescind a receiving order or annul an adjudication the court refused to act upon the mere assent of creditors in the matter, and considered not only whether the proposal made was for their benefit, but also whether it was conducive or detrimental to commercial morality and the interests of the public at large. The mere consent of the creditors was but an element in the case, and it was an idle notion that the court was bound by such consent: see per Fry, L.J., in In re Hester, 22 Q. B. D. 632, 37 W. R. Dig. 20. The court had to exercise a discretion; it had not merely to regard the interests of creditors but to perform a duty with regard to the commercial morality of the country: In re Hester; In re Flatau, 41 W. R. 529, [1893] 2 Q. B. 219; In re Taylor, 49 W. R. 510, [1901] 1 Q. B. 744. Here the court had to exercise an analogous jurisdiction, and it was, in his opinion, undesirable that the court should assume a different attitude or act upon a different principle in the bankruptcy of an individual and in the winding up of a company.

In this case his lordship stated that he was not satisfied that all proceedings in the winding up should be stayed by the mere fact that the consent of all the creditors and a large majority of the shareholders to a stay had been obtained; he was entitled to and desired to have further information. He should order the application to stand over for four weeks, and hoped that before that time the directors would have discharged their duty under the Act by furnishing a statement of affairs and enabling the official receiver to make his report.

Solicitors, Faithfull & Owen; Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

---

Chan. Div. }
Buckley, J. } Jan. 30.

In re RADCLIFFE.
YOUNG v. BEALE. (a.)

Will—Residuary gift—Named person—Lapse—Limited survivorship clause—Revocation of gift by codicil—Gift to person by wrong name—Construction.

A testatrix left her residuary estate to four named persons, A., B., C., and D., "as tenants in common, and if only one of them shall survive me, then to such one absolutely." By a codicil, after referring to the death of D., the testatrix revoked whatever interest D. had in her will. A., B., and C. survived the testatrix.

(a.) Reported by L. W. BYRNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the gift of survivorship was intended to be general and not confined to the case of only one legatee dying, and that in any event the revocation clause of the codicil must be construed as directing the residuary bequest of the will to be read as if D. was not one of the residuary legatees; and, consequently, that in the events that had happened D.'s share was not undisposed of, but went to the other legatees.

Two of the residuary legatees were described as "Edith Beale, daughter of E. J. Beale," and "Violet Beale, daughter of E. J. Beale." E. J. Beale had two and only two daughters, one of whom was named Violet Edith Beale, the other had different first names.

Held, that both daughters were residuary legatees.

Orginating summons.

The questions in this case were whether a lady wrongly named, but otherwise described, could take under a residuary bequest in a will; and secondly, whether the share of a named residuary legatee who died in the lifetime of the testatrix lapsed, or whether it went over to the other residuary legatees either under a survivorship clause which did not in terms apply to the event which had happened, or in consequence of a clause of revocation in a codicil.

By her will, dated the 3rd of October, 1896, after appointing certain persons executors, and giving various pecuniary and specific legacies, M. J. Radcliffe gave as follows: "I give all my real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever, not otherwise disposed of by this my will, or any codicil hereto, subject nevertheless to the payment of my just debts, and of my funeral and testamentary expenses, equally between Edith Beale, daughter of the said Edward John Beale, Violet Beale, another daughter of the said Edward John Beale, Edward Tassel Taylor, and Eveline, the widow of my late brother-in-law, Arthur Dold Walwyn Radcliffe, share and share alike, as tenants in common, and if only one of them shall survive me, then to such one absolutely."

By a codicil to the said will, dated the 16th of December, 1901, the testatrix declared as follows: "As Adolphus T. H. Radcliffe and Mrs. Eveline C. S. Radcliffe have predeceased me, I revoke whatsoever interest they had in my will (late made in 1896)."

No other part of the codicil referred to the residuary bequest in the will, nor, except for a reference to a specific gift to Mrs. Eveline Radcliffe, to any of the residuary legatees.

The testatrix died in May, 1902. As stated in the codicil, Mrs. Eveline Radcliffe died between the date of the will and of the codicil. The other residuary legatees survived the testatrix.

Edward John Beale, mentioned in the will, had two daughters, and two only, named respectively Tookie Ethel Child Beale and Violet Edith Child Beale, the former of whom in 1899 married W. Howard.

The present action was commenced by originating summons taken out by the executors of the will, one of whom, E. T. Taylor, was one of the residuary legatees, against the two daughters of E. J. Beale, and against two of the next-of-kin (one of whom was also the heir-at-law) of the testatrix, asking for a determination of the following questions:

1. Whether each or either of the defendants, Violet Edith Child Beale and Tookie Ethel Child Howard, was entitled to a share in the residuary estate of the testatrix?

2. Whether the share in the residuary estate of the testatrix to which Eveline C. L. Radcliffe would have become entitled if she had survived the testatrix, lapsed, or whether the residuary gift in the will took effect as if she had not been named therein?

A. J. Allen, for the executors.

L. Mossop, for the next-of-kin and heir-at-law.—On the first question, Mrs. Howard is not named in the will at all. The only daughter named is Violet Edith. Mrs. Howard cannot therefore take as a residuary legatee.

R. J. Parker, for Miss Violet Beale and Mrs Howard, was not called upon.

BUCKLEY, J., held that both the daughters were residuary legatees.

Mossop.—On the second question, Mrs. Eveline Radcliffe took her residuary share as a named legatee. Upon her death, therefore, her share lapsed. The survivorship clause of the will did not operate, as it only applied to the case of only one of the four residuary legatees surviving the testatrix, whereas in fact three of them survived her. The revocation in the codicil makes no difference: Cresswell v. Cheslyn, 2 Eden. 123, affirmed by the House of Lords, 5 Bro. P. C. 246; Ramsay v. Shelmerdine, 14 W. R. 46, L. R. 1 Eq. 129.

He also referred to Shaw v. M'Mahon, 4 Dr. & War. 431.

R. J. Parker.—In the cases cited the legatee survived the testator. There is no case where the share of a residuary legatee who had died before the codicil and whose share had been revoked has been held to be undisposed of. The survivorship clause in the will was intended to have a general effect, and the revocation in the codicil was intended to strike the name of Mrs. Eveline Radcliffe out of the will, and consequently for both reasons the surviving legatees take the whole of the residue.

BUCKLEY, J.—I think it is clear from the cases of Cresswell v. Cheslyn and Ramsay v. Shelmerdine that where the testator gives by will a share of residue to a person by name, and subsequently revokes the gift by a codicil, without adding any further words of disposition, the court will hold that the share is undisposed of, and that as regards it there is an intestacy. That being so, the question arises whether that principle applies here, or whether there has been a gift over of the share of Mrs. Eveline Radcliffe to the other residuary legatees, they having survived the testatrix. There are four legatees, and the gift over is expressed to be if one only of them survives the testatrix. In fact three of the legatees have survived the testatrix. I do not, however, think that the gift over was intended to be confined to the case of only one surviving. I think that it was intended to apply generally, and that the testatrix meant to give the shares to the legatees as tenants in common with the benefit of survivorship between them. But whether this is so or not, the codicil revokes whatever interest Mrs. Eveline Radcliffe had under the will. I must suppose that the testatrix knew the law, and therefore knew that the share of Mrs. Eveline Radcliffe had lapsed and was undisposed of, and that she did not make the revocation in the codicil for no purpose at all. I think that the testatrix meant by that revocation that the residuary bequest was to be read as if the name of Eveline Radcliffe was struck out; and I hold, consequently, that the share which she would have taken if she had survived the testatrix is not undisposed of, but goes to the surviving residuary legatees.

Solicitors, Allen & Son; Bircham & Co.; Corsellis, Mossop, & Berney.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } Dec. 6.

In re SISSON'S SETTLEMENT.
JONES v. TRAPPES. (a.)

Trustee—Title deeds—Certificates of registered stock—Custody.

There is no strict rule entitling a trustee as a matter of legal or equitable right to require that trust documents, consisting of title deeds and certificates of registered stock, shall not remain in the physical possession of either trustee, and shall be placed in a bank in their joint names.

Originating summons.

This was an application by one of the trustees of a settlement f r an order directing his co-trustee to concur with him in placing the deeds, documents of title, and securities relating to the trust in a box, accessible only to the trustees jointly, the box to be deposited at a bank approved by the court.

The facts were as follows: The documents in question consisted of certificates of railway and other stock in the joint names of the trustees, and the title deeds of a freehold house. They had been for many years under the control of the respondent. There were no securities to bearer. The position of the respondent was unimpeachable.

Gatey, for the applicant, contended that a trustee had a strict right to have joint custody of the trust securities.

He referred to Mendes v. Guedalla, 10 W. R. 482, 2 Jo. & H. 259; Lewis v. Nobbs, 26 W. R. 631, 8 Ch. D. 591; Field v. Field, 42 W. R. 346, [1894] 1 Ch. 425.

Hewitt, for the respondent.

SWINFEN EADY, J., after stating the facts, said: There is no suggestion that the documents are in any jeopardy, or that the applicant has met with any obstruction in inspecting them, or that the trust estate has been put to any costs for inspection. On the contrary, the applicant has been afforded every facility for inspecting the documents without charge.

But the applicant says there is a strict rule entitling him as a matter of legal or equitable right to have the documents kept in a box, which shall not remain in the physical possession of either trustee, but be placed at a bank in their joint names.

I am of opinion that the applicant has no such legal or equitable right, and that no rule hitherto established requires trust documents, consisting of title deeds and certificates of registered stock, to be put in such a position that no trustee can even look at them without the presence or concurrence of his co-trustees, as would be the case if they were placed at a bank in a box to which each trustee had a different lock and key. Such a rule would greatly impede the execution of trusts. The applicant's case and the respondent's opposition are based simply on their strict legal or equitable rights. The applicant has made no case whatever for removing the documents from their present custody, where they have remained for many years in perfect safety, and where, so far as I can see, they are perfectly safe.

Under these circumstances I make no order beyond giving the respondent costs out of capital.

Solicitors, Hamlin, Grammer, & Hamlin, for Gamlin & Williams, Rhyl; Stow, Preston, & Lyttelton, for J. W. & T. Eastham, Clitheroe.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } Dec. 6.

In re BRACKEN'S SETTLEMENT. (a.)

Settled land—Exchange of easements—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 5.

An exchange of easements, apart from any exchange or partition of land, is authorized by the Settled Land Act, 1890, s. 5.

Originating summons.

In this case the equitable life tenant of an estate, which was settled in trust for sale, applied for leave to grant an easement over the settled land in exchange for an easement over other settled land.

The Settled Land Act, 1890, s. 5, provides: "On an exchange or partition any easement, right, or privilege of any kind may be reserved or may be granted over or in relation to the settled land or any part thereof, or other land or an easement, right, or privilege of any kind may be given or taken in exchange or on partition for land or for any other easement, right, or privilege of any kind."

Henry Fellows, for the life tenant, referred to the Settled Land Act, 1890, s. 5; the Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 3, 4, 6, 17, 21, sub-section 8.

Philbrick and Bowen Davies, for the trustees, did not oppose the application.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, said: I think it is clear that the opening words, "on an exchange or partition," do not govern the whole section. In my opinion, the section should be read as if a comma preceded the words "or other land"; but whether it precedes or follows those words, I think the remaining words of the section are an independent clause authorising an exchange of easements apart from any exchange or partition of land. I give leave accordingly.

Solicitors, Whitfield & Harrison, for Humphreys, Hirst, & Whitley, Halifax; Walker & Rowe, for F. Walker & Son, Halifax.

---

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) } Jan. 28.

STILES v. ECCLESTON. (b.)

County court—Jurisdiction—Power of judge to grant injunction only—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 89—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 56.

A county court judge has jurisdiction to grant an injunction where no damages are claimed, provided that the claim is one in which the damages would, if claimed, have been under £50.

Appeal for his Honour Judge Wilmot, sitting at the Mildenhall County Court, granting an injunction restraining the defendant from carrying on business as a dressmaker for the period of ten years from the 18th of June, 1901. The agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant contained a clause fixing the damages at £40, but the plaintiff made no other claim than that for an injunction.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

For the defendant it was contended that the county court judge had no power to grant an injunction, as no damages were claimed, but this contention was overruled by the judge, who granted an injunction.

The defendant appealed.

The power of the county court to grant an injunction is conferred by the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 89. That section is as follows: "Every inferior court which now has or which may after the passing of this Act have jurisdiction in equity or at law . . . shall as regards all cases within its jurisdiction for the time being have power to grant . . . such relief, redress, or remedy or combination of remedies . . . in as full and ample a measure as might and ought to be done in the case, by a High Court of Justice."

Hon. M. M. Macnaghten, for the defendant.—The county court judge had no jurisdiction to hear this case, as the cause of action, not being for a sum not exceeding £50, was not within his jurisdiction. The County Courts Act of 1888, s. 56, confines the jurisdiction of county courts to personal actions where the debt, demand, or damage claimed does not exceed £50, and as the plaintiff claimed no damage, it clearly did not come within the section.

He referred to Cairness v. Nesbitt, 7 H. & N. 778, 10 W. R. C. L. Dig. 22; Martin v. Bannister, 28 W. R. 143, 4 Q. B. D. 491; and General Accident Assurance Corporation v. Noel, 50 W. R. 381, [1902] 1 K. B. 377.

M. Talbot (A. H. Poyser with him), for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is a point which apparently has not received judicial decision. I think if Mr. Macnaghten had made good his point that there was no jurisdiction to have entertained a breach of this agreement in the county court we would be right in saying there was no jurisdiction to grant an injunction. If parties have so bound themselves that in the event of a breach the damages claimed must of necessity be in excess of county court jurisdiction, then the case cannot be brought within the jurisdiction merely because no damages are claimed. But if the terms of the agreement are such that an action for breach could be brought in the county court, then I think Martin v. Bannister clearly shows that an injunction can also be granted in the county court. In this case the damages were fixed by the parties themselves at an amount within the limit of the county court jurisdiction; the remedy by injunction is merely ancillary to the remedy by way of damages. I therefore think the county court judge was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

WILLS, J.—I agree. The County Courts Act, 1888, came a long way after the Act of 1873, which gave to county courts all the remedies that the High Court has. I think it impossible to say that cases where an injunction only is asked for were intended to be excluded.

In cases in which if damages had been claimed judgment must have been given for a sum not exceeding £50, I think it is clear a county court has jurisdiction to entertain a claim for an injunction only.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. This is obviously a personal action, and it is also one in which there is no claim for a debt, demand, or damages exceeding £50. I should not like to say that all personal actions in which no damages are claimed could be brought in the county court, but where the parties have themselves assessed the damages at less than £50, it is clear the county court has jurisdiction although no damages are in fact claimed.

WILLS, J.—I wish to add that I quite accept the limitation expressed by my brother Channell.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for plaintiff, Edgar Robins & Clark, for Salmon & Co., Bury St. Edmunds.

Solicitors for defendant, Bridges, Sawtell, & Co., Bendall & Son, Bury St. Edmunds.

---

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) — Jan. 28.

BANKES v. JERVIS. (a.)

Practice—Trustee—Claim—Plaintiff suing as trustee—Unliquidated debt—Right of set off—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 24 (2) (3)—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 19, r. 3.

Where a plaintiff sues as trustee all defences which could be raised against the person on whose behalf he is suing can be set off by way of defence by the defendant to the extent of the claim.

Appeal from his Honour Judge Martineau, sitting at the Hastings County Court, giving judgment for the plaintiff for £50, and dismissing a counterclaim by the defendant for £51 12s. 6d.

It appeared from the statement of counsel that the plaintiff had purchased a share in the defendants' business, that of a veterinary surgeon, for her son.

The business was carried on in Battle, at premises acquired in connection with the business from the defendant by the plaintiff's son.

In 1901 the plaintiff's son left for New Zealand, and left a letter authorizing his mother to sell his share of the business. The plaintiff accordingly on the 18th of May, 1901, sold to the defendant the son's share of the business for the sum of £100. The defendant paid one-half of the sum agreed upon, but refused to pay the other half, and at the trial he set up as a defence (by way of counterclaim) that he had become liable to the landlord for a sum of £51 12s. 6d. for rent and repairs. It was admitted at the trial that the son was liable to indemnify the defendant in respect of this sum, and that if the son had been the plaintiff this would have been a good defence to the action.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff on the ground that, though the plaintiff was a trustee on behalf of her son, and would be obliged to account to him for any amount received in this action, yet this defence was not one which could be set up against her suing as a trustee.

By the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24 (2), it is provided as follows: "If any defendant claims to be entitled to any equitable estate or right, or to relief upon any equitable ground against any deed, instrument, or contract . . . or alleges any ground of equitable defence to any claim of the plaintiff or petitioner . . . the said courts respectively and every judge thereof shall give to every equitable estate or right or ground of relief so claimed, and to every equitable defence so alleged, such and the same effect by way of defence against the claim of such plaintiff or petitioner as the court of Chancery ought to have given if the same or the like matters had been relied upon by way of defence in any suit or proceeding instituted in that court for the same or any like purpose before the passing of this Act."

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Ord. 19, r. 3, of the R. S. C. provides: "A defendant in an action may set off or set up by way of counterclaim against the claim of the plaintiff any right or claim whether such set off or counterclaim sound in damages or not, and such set-off or counterclaim shall have the same effect as a cross-action so as to enable the court to pronounce a final judgment in the same action, both on the original and on the cross-claim."

Thorn Drury, for the defendant.—The county court judge was wrong in holding that the defendant could not set up this defence to the extent of the counterclaim. The plaintiff is a trustee and would be bound to account to her son for any sum received by her under this action. If it were an equitable assignment for value, I could have used this defence, and a bare trustee cannot be in a better position than an assignee for value.

He cited the following authorities: Mersey Steamship Co. v. Shuttleworth, 32 W. R 245, 11 Q. B. D. 531; Young v. Kitchin, 26 W. R. 403, 3 Ex. D. 127; Westacott v. Bevan, 39 W. R. 363, [1891] 1 Q. B. 774; Stumre v. Campbell, 40 W. R. 101, [1892] 1 Q. B. 314.

E. E. Humphreys, for the plaintiff.—This is an unliquidated counter-claim by the defendant, and he cannot set up this as a good answer to the plaintiff's claim under the agreement. The son may have a good answer to the defendant's counter-claim A counter-claim must be against the plaintiff in the same capacity in which he sues.

He cited Macdonald v. Carrington, 27 W. R. 153, 4 C. P. D. 28.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I should have said that this point was covered by authority, but it now appears there is no case directly in point. The county court judge has here found that the mother has acted as agent for the son, and must account to him for any amount received by her under the agreement with the defendant. It is also not disputed that the defendant became liable to the landlord for rent and dilapidations for the sum of £51 12s. 6d., and that the defendant could have recovered that sum against the plaintiff's son.

The question is whether where an action is brought by a trustee on behalf of another person, and the defendant has a counterclaim against the person on whose behalf the action is brought, he (the defendant) can counterclaim against the plaintiff in the same way that he can set off a liquidated debt against the principal of the plaintiff. It seems to me that that point is covered by authority, and that it was intended by the Judicature Act that that defence should be open to the defendant in such cases. Sub-section 2 of section 24 of the Judicature Act, 1873, provides that where a defendant claims to be entitled to any relief upon any equitable ground, or alleges any ground of equitable defence to any claim of the plaintiff, the courts shall give to every equitable right or ground of relief so claimed, and to every equitable defence so alleged, such and the same effect by way of defence against the claim of the plaintiff as the Court of Chancery ought to have given if the same or the like matters had been relied on by way of defence in any suit instituted in that court for the same or the like purpose before the passing of the Act. Then by sub-section 3 the courts are to have power to grant to any defendant in respect of any equitable estate or right or other matter of equity all such relief against any plaintiff as such defendant shall have properly claimed by his pleading, and as the courts might have granted in any suit instituted for that purpose by the same defendant against the same plaintiff. And ord. 19, r. 3, says that a defendant in an action may set off or set up by way of counterclaim against the claims of the plaintiff any right or claim whether such set off or counterclaim sound in damages or not, and such set off or counterclaim shall have the same effect as a cross-action so as to enable the court to pronounce a final judgment in the same action both on the original and on the cross-claim. Now if this had been a claim by the defendant for the amount due to him there would have been a right of set off in respect of the £50 balance of the purchase-money due under the agreement. I think that the cases of Jeffs v. Day, L. R. 1 Q. B. 372, and Agra and Masterman's Bank v. Leighton, L. R. 2 Ex. 56, 15 W. R. C. L Dig. 17, are authorities to show that in an action by the trustee the defendant can set up against the trustee the debt due from the cestui que trust, and that it would have been a good equitable defence to show that the action was brought by the plaintiff as trustee for a third person, and that against that third person there was a set off or an equitable defence which would make it wrong for the trustee to bring the action on behalf of the cestui que trust. I cannot think that the plaintiff can be in a stronger position than an assignee for value suing in his own name against whom such right of set off or equitable defence could be set up. Here the judge has found as a fact that the defendant was entitled to the sum of £51 from the son, and I therefore think that judgment ought to have been given for the defendant on the ground that he had an equitable claim which was a good counter-claim against the person on whose behalf the action is brought; and that this appeal must be allowed. I may add that, though there is no authority directly in point, this matter has been frequently decided in chambers.

WILLS, J.—I agree. I confess I have some difficulty in seeing how the plaintiff was entitled to sue in this action, but, admitting she could rightly bring this suit, I cannot see how any person by suing as trustee can have superior rights than the person on whose behalf he is suing. If this lady had the right to sue as trustee, it must be subject to all rights which could have been set up against her son's claim. Now there is an admitted claim against the son for £51 12s. 6d., and I cannot see any reason or justice which prevents the defendant setting up a defence which would have been a good defence against the son if he had been suing.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. I think the counter-claim ought to have been allowed as a set off, not to the extent of £51, but to the extent of the plaintiff's claim. Before the Judicature Act it could have been set off against the plaintiff's claim, as she was suing as a trustee, and the case of Agra and Masterman's Bank shows that a liquidated amount due from the person on behalf of whom the plaintiff sues can be set up by way of equitable defence to the plaintiff's claim.

The effect of the Judicature Act and the rules framed under that Act, is that unliquidated charges are put on the same footing as liquidated; and this amount may accordingly be set off, notwithstanding that it is unliquidated.

Appeal allowed; leave to appeal granted.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Kingsford, Dorman, & Co., for W. Cruttenden, Hastings.

Solicitors for the defendant, Attree, Johnson, & Ward, for C. Sheppard, Battle.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) Jan. 16.

WIRRAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. CARTER. (a.)

Local government—Private street works—Recovery of expenses by urban authority—Notice of provisional apportionment—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 150, 267—Private Street Works Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict c. 57), ss. 7, 12.

An owner whose premises are sought to be charged under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, is entitled to have service of the notice of the provisional apportionment, and proof that the owner has been served is a condition precedent to the recovery against him by the local authority of his share of the expenses incurred under the Act.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff council against the decision of the county court judge holding that the defendant, Carter, was not liable to pay the proportion of certain works which had been executed by the plaintiffs to a street called Quarry-road, Heswall, on which a quarry belonging to the defendant abuts.

The facts of the case are as follows: In February, 1900, the plaintiffs resolved to do certain private street works in Quarry-road, the Private Street Works Act, 1892, having been in force in the district since 1896, and they accordingly took the necessary steps under that Act to settle the provisional apportionment. The resolution approving the provisional order was sent to the Heswall Quarry Co., D. Robinson, Manager, but no such copy was served on the defendant, nor had he any notice of the provisional apportionment. Some objections were taken to the provisional apportionment by certain of the frontagers, but no objection was taken by the defendant or by anyone as the owner of the quarry.

The final apportionment was made on the 16th of April, 1901, and the notice was served in the same way on the Heswall Quarry Co. (Limited), D. Robinson, Manager. Shortly afterwards the plaintiff council discovered that the defendant was in fact the owner of the quarry. On the 3rd of April the plaintiffs' surveyor amended the final apportionment by striking out the notice already served and substituting the defendant's name as owner.

It appeared that David Robinson, who was the defendant's uncle, had formerly traded as the Heswall Quarry Co., and had leased the property from the defendant up till the end of 1899.

The county court judge gave judgment for the defendant, holding that service, of the provisional apportionment was a condition precedent to the right of the local authority to recover, and there was no sufficient evidence that the defendant was the reputed owner.

The Private Street Works Act, 1892, contains no special directions as to service, and notices have to be served in accordance with section 267 of the Public Health Act.

That section provides as follows: "Notices, orders, and any other documents required or authorized to be served under this Act may be served by delivering the same to or at the residence of the person to whom they are respectively addressed . . . they may also be served by post or by a prepaid letter . . . in proving such notice it shall be sufficient to prove that the notice, order, or other document was properly addressed and put into the post. Any notice by this Act required to be given to the owner or occupier of any premises may be addressed by the description 'owner' or 'occupier' of the premises (naming them) in respect of which the notices is given without further description."

Macmorran, K.C., and Naldrett, for the appellants.—The county court judge was wrong in holding that service of the provisional apportionment was a condition precedent. The defendant did not take any of the objections to the final apportionment under section 12 (2), and he is now precluded by section 8 (2) from raising any objection whatever.

Carver, K.C., and Rigby Swift, for the defendant.—The owner of premises proposed to be charged under the Act of 1892 is just as much entitled to notice as an owner who was charged under the Public Health Act, 1875. It has been decided that under that Act service is a condition precedent. The grounds on which the owner is entitled to object under section 7 of the Act of 1892 are far wider than those under section 12 (2).

They cited Jarrow Local Board v. Kennedy, 19 W. R. 275, L. R. 6 Q. B. 128; Farnmouth Local Board v. Compton, 34 W. R, 338; and Wallsend Local Board v. Murphy, 61 L. T. Rep. 777, 38 W. R. Dig. 120.

Naldrett, in reply.—There is a fundamental distinction between the Act of 1875 and the Act of 1892, as under the former Act the owner had the right to do work himself.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I confess I should have been glad to have decided this case in favour of the appellants, as in my opinion this is a technical objection without any merits, and that the persons who are representing the property abutting on the road did in effect have notice, but have availed themselves of this mistake in the direction to get out of their responsibility. However, we must construe the Act as it stands. Before the Act of 1892, which is an adoptive Act, was passed, where work was done under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, it was held that absence of service upon an owner of land abutting upon the road prevents the apportionment of the sum charged for making it up being charged upon that owner, and that service upon a previous owner will not do. In my opinion the principle of those decisions apply to this case. The Private Street Works Act, 1892, gives some important privileges to the persons who are proposed to be charged. They can raise new objections, and they can also raise objections which could only have been raised at a later stage. Under these circumstances it seems to me that effective service is just as necessary, if not more so, than it is in the case of proceedings under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875. But it is said that there is a fundamental distinction between the two sections, inasmuch as under the Act of 1875 the owner had the right to do the work himself. But it has been pointed out on behalf of the defendant that this was an option of which the owners never availed themselves. They never in fact did do the work. Therefore, as I have said, notice is just as necessary under the Act of 1892 as under the original Act of 1875.

The third section of section 6 of the Act of 1892 contains provisions as to service of copies "on the owners of premises shown as liable to be charged in the provisional apportionment within seven days after the date of the first publication." And there are liberal provisions under the Act of 1875 which show there are means of effecting substituted service where the owner is not known. Then it is said that the want of notice of the provisional apportionment is cured by section 12 of the Act of 1892. But, as was pointed out by my brother Wills, the rights given under section 12 are totally different from the rights given to the owner under section 7. Accordingly it cannot be said that the defendant has had the opportunity to make the objections he had a right to make under section 7 to the provisional apportionment if he had notice of it. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that notice of the provisional apportionment is a necessary condition to the liability of the owner, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

WILLS, J.—I agree with my lord that it is indispensable that the owner should be duly served with notice of these proceedings. The owner is here given rights under section 7, and if he neglects to take the necessary steps he is afterwards precluded from making objections. Section 12 confirms that view, for it provides that after theprovisional apportionment has been fixed the owner may only object to the final apportionment on the ground that the actual expenses have been exceeded, or that the final apportionment has not been made in accordance with this section, or that there has been an unreasonable departure from the specification. That shows that the real rights of the owner are under section 7.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree, but not without difficulty, for I am of opinion that if the local authority had framed their notice somewhat differently it would certainly have been a good service on the defendant. The objection that the provision does not contain the correct name is not of itself good, for section 6 refers to the schedule of this Act, and the fourth clause of Part I. of the schedule refers to reputed owners. Notwithstanding the finding of the county court judge that the defendant was not the reputed owner, I hardly think he construed the Act as it was intended to be construed. I think reputed owner means someone reasonably believed by the local authority to be the owner; someone with whom as owner they have had recent dealings is certainly a reputed owner. Section 267 of the Public Health Act, 1875, provides that "any notice required to be given to the owner or occupier of any premises may be addressed by the description of the owner or occupier of the premises (naming them) in respect of which the notice is given without further name or description." It seems to me there is no difference between the old Act under which the service on the owner by name was not a condition precedent and this new one as to reasonable service. If the service which has been effected here would have been a good service under the old Act, it is difficult to see why it should not be good under the new Act; but as the county court judge has held that under the new Act notice of the provisional apportionment is a condition precedent, I agree the appeal should be dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Cunliffes & Davenport.

Solicitors for the defendant, Thompson, Hughes, & Mathison, Birkenhead.

---

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Admiralty. } Jan. 13.

"THE ALMA." (a.)

Ship—Admiralty—Limitation of liability—Claims for loss of life and loss of property—Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93), s. 3—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 504.

The usual advertisement calling on all persons who had claims in respect of loss of life or property to make them within a certain time was issued under section 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, with an intimation that if the claimants failed to do so in time they would be excluded from sharing in the fund paid into court. The claims entered in respect of loss of property exceeded the amount paid in under the statutory liability of £8 per ton; but only six out of a possible eleven claims in respect of loss of life were made within the time limit on the fund paid in under the statutory liability of £7 per ton.

The Court held, that inasmuch as a time limit had been fixed for entering claims, the unappropriated balance of the life fund must be paid back to the plaintiffs in the limitation suit, notwithstanding that all possible life claims had not been entered, and that although the year had not elapsed within which, under section 3 of Lord Campbell's Act, an action in respect of such a claim could be commenced.

On the 1st of April, 1902, The Alma, a vessel of 1,145 tons gross, and belonging to the London and South-Western Railway Co., while on a passage from Southampton to Havre, collided with and sank The Cambrian Princess, a sailing vessel of 1,394 tons gross, she being on a voyage from Lobos de Afuera to Antwerp with a cargo of guano.

Eleven of the crew, including two apprentices, of The Cambrian Princess were drowned in consequence of the disaster.

On the following day the owners of The Cambrian Princess instituted an action in the district registry at Liverpool, and the railway company appeared as defendants and admitted their liability.

On the 24th of April the railway company, as owners of The Alma, commenced proceedings in this court to limit their liability against the owners of The Cambrian Princess and against all persons claiming in respect of the loss of the ship or in respect of damages or loss to goods or merchandize on board the ship, and the survivors of those on board the vessel and the legal personal representatives of those who were lost, and against all persons claiming in respect of any loss of life or personal injury occasioned by the collision.

On the 23rd of June Gorrel Barnes, J., held that the plaintiffs were entitled under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, to limit their liability, and that in respect of loss of life or personal injury or of loss or damage to ship, goods, merchandize, or other things caused by reason of the improper navigation of The Alma, her owners were answerable in damage in a sum not exceeding £16,587 9s., such sum being at the rate of £15 for each ton of registered tonnage of The Alma without deduction for engine room, and that in respect of claims for damage to ship, goods, or merchandize, or other things alone her owners were liable at the rate of £8 per ton, which worked out at £8,840 12s. 9d. The court directed that three advertisements should be inserted at intervals of not less than a week in the Times, the Shipping and Mercantile Gazette, and a Liverpool newspaper, "intimating to all persons having any claim in respect of loss of life or personal injury or damage caused as aforesaid that, if they do not come in and enter their claims on or before the 23rd of September, 1902, they will be excluded from sharing in the aforesaid amount: the last of such advertisements to be inserted on or before the 9th of September."

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 4th of July the owners of The Alma paid into court £16,758 6s. 5d., which was the sum under their statutory liability plus four per cent. from the date of the collision and this sum was invested in Consols pending the adjustment of claims. The registrar's report was dated the 15th of December, and he assessed the property claims—i.e., ship, cargo, freight, and personal effects at £13,212 14s. 8d., and set out the fact that four sums—viz., £120, £100, and £60 had been awarded be juries in King's Bench actions in respect of the death of four persons, and £300 more had been paid by the owner of The Alma to a passenger on board her for personal injuries sustained. Two other claims, it was stated in the report, had been filed in the registry in respect of the death of the two apprentices and £20 allowed in one case, whilst the other claim had been disallowed, making a total of £400 in respect of the claims for compensation for loss of life. The report concluded as follows: "Only six claims for the loss of life have been put forward, four in the King's Bench Division and two in the Admiralty Court. In the six cases and in one other case there are claims for lost effects, so that there are four cases in which no claim has been made for loss of personal effects, and five cases in which there is no claim for loss of life. Any further claims for the loss of property are clearly out of time, and the distribution of so much of the funds (£8 per ton) as is applicable to such claims ought not, I think, to be delayed with the chance of any further claims coming in; but claimants for loss of life have under Lord Campbell's Act a year and a day for bringing actions, and although there is no reason for deferring payment of the loss of life claims (£7 per ton being far more than sufficient to pay in full any possible claims upon it), a small portion of the balance remaining after payment of the present claims ought, I think, to be retained in court until the expiration of the year and day allowed by Lord Campbell's Act for bringing such claims."

Arland, for the plaintiff.—Section 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), provides that the High Court "may proceed in such manner and subject to such regulations as to the exclusion of any claimants who do not come in within a certain time." That section applies to claims in respect of loss of life and to claims in respect of damage to property, and therefore, as the court directed that the usual notice of the proceedings should be given by advertisement to all persons interested, and no other claim having been made prior to the time which has now arrived for the fund to be distributed whether in respect of life or property are equally barred, although the period mentioned in section 3 of Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93) of twelve months from the death in respect of claims has not elapsed, nor the period of six years which is allowed under the Statutes of Limitation in respect of property.

Holloway, for the relations of two of the deceased seamen.

Bateson, for the owners, master, and some of the crew of The Cambrian Princess, in support of the motion.

JEUNE, P., in giving judgment, said: At first my feeling was against the motion made by counsel on behalf of the plaintiffs, because I thought it possible, though not probable, that there might be further claimants in the King's Bench Division, and that no great harm would be done in keeping back a certain amount to meet their claims. But, on further consideration, I do not think that is the true view to take, for the words of section 504 are, to my mind, clear, and do give this court power to do that which it has done—namely, to fix a time within which claims must come in.

It seems to me, on principle, important that this court should fix a time to prevent claims from going on for an unlimited period. It would be contravening the objects of the statute to hold that, in limitation actions, claims for loss of or damage to goods should be allowed to be brought in at any time within six years, the period allowed by the Statutes of Limitation, and it seems to me important that where there is fund to be distributed persons should come forward and make their claims within the time fixed. I am impressed by the argument that claims for loss of life and claims for loss of goods cannot be dealt with separately. On the whole I am prepared to accede to the view that as the effect of section 504 is to give the court power to fix a time after which persons shall be excluded, it is only a logical consequence that, after that period has expired, you must treat possible further claims as non-existent, and it would, therefore, be inconsistent to reserve a portion of the fund. I might perhaps arrive at a reasonable figure, but it would be highly uncertain, and in many cases it might be a mere guess to determine the amount which should be reserved for such hypothetical claims. I am therefore of opinion that this part of the report ought not to be confirmed. As regards the rest of the report I understand there is no objection, and it will be confirmed.

The result is that the Consols will be sold, the London and South-Western Railway Co. will have paid out to them the balance of the £7 per ton, after paying the loss of life and personal injury claims as found by the registrar in his report.

The rest of the fund (made up of the £8 per ton) will be paid out to the parties found to be entitled thereto in respect of the property claims. The parties appearing on the motion will be allowed in addition their costs against the plaintiffs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Clarkson, Greenwell, & Co.

Solicitors for the owners of The Cambrian Princess and others, Charles Russell & Co.

Solicitors for relatives of two of the deceased seamen, G. & W. Webb.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R. and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) March 20.

DAVIS v. TOWN PROPERTIES INVESTMENT CORPORATION (LIMITED). (a.)

Lessor and lessee—Demise—Covenant for quiet enjoyment—Assignment of reversion—Liability of assignee—Acts done on land acquired subsequently to demise from strangers to lessor—Breach of covenant—Interference with access of air to chimneys.

A covenant for quiet enjoyment in a lease must be construed with reference to the state of things at the date of the covenant, and cannot be extended to cover user by the lessor of land acquired by him subsequently to the date of the lease, and even if it could be so extended the obligation would not be binding on an assignee of the reversion who has acquired adjoining land under another title, and does the acts complained of under that other title.

Section 11 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, in no way alters the old law as to the class of covenants the burden of which will run with the reversion. A demise of offices to the plaintiff contained a covenant for quiet enjoyment. The lessor afterwards assigned the reversion on the term to the defendants. The defendants subsequently acquired the house next door to the demised offices, and having pulled it down rebuilt it much higher, thus causing the chimneys of the demised offices to smoke.

Held, that there was no breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment.

Per Romer, L.J.—When by an alleged breach of the ordinary covenant for quiet enjoyment neither the title to nor the possession of the land is affected, and only the lessee's enjoyment of the land is interrupted by some act of the lessor, Quære, whether the act complained of is a breach of the covenant unless it amounts to a direct interference with the enjoyment.

Per Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.—Quære, whether Tebb v. Cave, 48 W. R. 318, [1900] 1 Ch. 642, was rightly decided on the ground of breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment.

Decision of Byrne, J., ante, p. 42, [1902] 2 Ch. 635, affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J., reported, ante, p. 42, [1902] 2 Ch. 635.

In June, 1897, a lease was granted by one Lee to the plaintiff, David Davis, of offices on the ground floor of No. 119, Colmore-row, Birmingham, for a term of fourteen years from September, 1897, at a yearly rent of £100. The lease contained a covenant for quiet enjoyment in the form hereinafter mentioned.

In September, 1898, the reversion in the offices No. 119, Colmore-row expectant upon the determination of the lease was assigned by Lee, the lessor, to the defendant company, the Town Properties Investment Corporation (Limited).

In the year 1900 the defendant company purchased from one Barber, who had no connection with Lee, a house next door to No. 119, Colmore-row, and proceeded to pull it down and to erect upon the site new buildings of much greater height than the old buildings. This caused the chimney of the offices, No. 119, Colmore-row, of the plaintiff to smoke, so as materially to interfere with the quiet enjoyment of one of his rooms.

The covenant for quiet enjoyment was as follows: "And the lessor doth hereby covenant with the lessee that the lessee paying the rent hereby reserved, and observing the covenants and conditions herein contained, and on the part of the lessee to be observed and performed shall and may peaceably and quietly possess and enjoy the said offices during the said term without any eviction or disturbance by the lessor or any person lawfully or equitably claiming from or under him." And it was provided that the expression "the lessor" should include the executors, administrators, and assigns of the lessor where the context allowed.

The plaintiff brought the present action for a declaration that the acts of the defendant company constituted a breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment, and for an injunction restraining the defendant company from allowing the buildings complained of to remain.

Byrne, J., dismissed the action.

The plaintiff appealed.

Norton, K.C., and Clayton, for the plaintiff.—The company are the plaintiff's lessors, and they are the people who are disturbing his enjoyment of the demised premises. If the original lessor had bought this land from Barber he could not have interfered with the plaintiff's enjoyment of the demised premises. The liability of the assignee is exactly the same as the liability of the original lessor. The obligation imposed by the covenant for quiet enjoyment is qua the reversion of the land demised. If the obligation extends to the reversion it attaches to the person who owns the reversion.

They referred to the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 11; Sanderson v. Mayor of Berwick-upon-Tweed. 33 W. R. 67, 13 Q. B. D. 547; Booth v. Alcock, 21 W. R. 743, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 663; Harrison, Ainslie, & Co. v. Lord Muncaster, 40 W. R. 102 [1891] 2 Q. B. 680; Tebb v. Cave, 48 W. R. 318, [1900] 1 Ch. 642; Robinson v. Kilvert, 37 W. R 545, 41 Ch. D. 88; Dennett v. Atherton, 20 W. R. 442, L. R. 7 Q. B. 316; Leech v. Schweder, 22 W. R. 633, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 463.

Levett, K.C., and Austen Cartmell, for the defendant company.—The covenant for quiet enjoyment must be construed as on the day it is granted. If the original lessor had bought this land from Barber he would not be liable under this covenant for anything done on the land bought from Barber. The covenant is given to secure what is granted, not to enlarge the grant. It the lessee here had no rights under the doctrine of implied grant, he has none under the covenant. In any case an assignee of the lessor is under no personal liability.

They referred to Harrison, Ainslie, & Co. v. Lord Muncaster.

Norton, K.C., in reply, cited Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway v. Anderson, [1898] 2 Ch. 394, 47 W. R. Dig. 168.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from Byrne, J. I adopt the facts as stated in the report of the case below in, ante, p. 42, [1902] 2 Ch. 635.

Byrne, J., has decided in favour of the defendant, and, in my opinion, he was clearly right. It is only necessary to scrutinize the covenant on which the plaintiff sues to see that this must be so. It is the ordinary covenant against eviction or disturbance by the lessor or any person lawfully claiming under him. In other words it contains no special provision enlarging the obligation of the lessor to respect or secure any other rights than those incident to the demised premises such as they were at the time of the demise. It is quite clear that unless there are special words the covenant for quiet enjoyment does not enlarge the grant. In dealing with a similar covenant in Leech v. Schweder, Mellish, L.J., says: "It is simply a covenant for quiet enjoyment; and I am clearly of opinion that it does not enlarge the right in any way. It is perfectly clear that the lessee is 'to hold and enjoy without suit, let, or hindrance.' But what is he to hold and enjoy? 'The premises.' What are the premises? The things previously demised and given. The covenant does not enlarge what is previously granted, but an additional remedy is given—namely, an action for damages if the lessee cannot get or has been deprived of that which has been previously professed to be granted." Here, then, the lessor had no interest in the adjoining premises at the time of the demise to the plaintiff. He could not and did not put any fetter on their enjoyment for the benefit of the plaintiff, and the rights of the plaintiff which the lessor undertook to respect were rights limited by the fact that the adjoining owner might if so minded build on the adjoining land so as to interfere with the draught of the plaintiff's chimney. Such an interference, therefore, by raising the wall of the adjoining house is not, by whomsoever done, an interference with any right granted by the original demise. It was on these principles that the case of Booth v. Alcock was decided. There a lessor granted a lease of a house with its appurtenances, including lights. There was the usual covenant for quiet enjoyment. At the time of the demise the lessor was tenant for a term of the adjoining house. He afterwards bought the reversion upon his term and after the expiration of the term began to build on the site of the adjoining house so as to interfere with the plaintiff's lights. It was held that the plaintiff could not complain. He had acquired no right passing over the adjoining house other than that which it was in his lessor's power to bestow, which was necessarily only during the duration of his interest therein, and consequently interferences by the lessor himself with the lights passing over the site of the adjoining house after the term was ended involved no breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment. He had not interfered with any right granted by the demise. "General words in a grant," says Mellish, L.J., "must be restricted to that which the grantor had then power to grant and will not extend to anything which he might subsequently acquire." The case before us is a much stronger one for the defendant. He is not the original lessor, but the assignee of the reversion on the lease, and liable only in that capacity, and the right said to be interfered with is not the well-known easement of light, but something which is not the subject of grant or prescription: Webb v. Bird, 9 W. R. 899, 10 C. B. N. S. 268, 13 C. B. N. S. 841; Bryant v. Lefever, 27 W. R. 612, 4 C. P. D. 172; Chastey v. Ackland, 43 W. R. 627, [1895] 2 Ch. 389. Even if the lessor's covenant could be extended to cover user by him of land subsequently acquired, such an obligation could not pass with the assignment of the reversion to the defendant, who acquired the adjoining land under another title, and has done what he has done under that other title and not as claiming under the lessor; so far as the covenant was personal or collateral it would not run with the reversion and bind the assignee. This was decided on the Act of Henry VIII. in Spencer's case, 5 Rep. 16. The facts in this case take it outside Tebb v. Cave, which we are therefore relieved from considering. Neither is it necessary in this case to speculate on what must be taken to have been the intention of the parties in making the covenant since here the grant speaks for itself and the covenant is unambiguous. But if it were necessary to resort to such reasoning the particular mischief and the sequence of events was quite as unforeseen as in Lord Muncaster's case.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree, and only wish to add that in the case of an alleged breach of the ordinary covenant for quiet enjoyment where by the alleged breach neither the title to the land nor the possession of the land is affected, and what the lessee complains of is only an interruption of his enjoyment of the land by some act of the lessor, I doubt whether the act complained of is a breach of the covenant unless it amounts to a direct interference with the enjoyment. I doubt therefore whether Tebb v. Cave was rightly decided on the ground of breach of covenant seeing that in that case the defendant was not directly interfering with the plaintiff's house. The plaintiff in this case had no right to any easement in respect of the current of air coming over the defendants' land, and the plaintiff's chimneys smoked simply because that current of air was interfered with and not otherwise by any act of the defendants.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I have read the judgment of Collins, M.R., with which I entirely agree. I share the doubt expressed by Romer, L.J., whether Buckley, J.'s, decision in Tebb v. Cave can be supported. Should the question raised in that case hereafter come before the Court of Appeal it will be necessary to consider carefully the true limits and extent of the covenant for quiet enjoyment. There is only one point which I desire to mention. Mr. Norton, in his able argument for the appellant, relied mainly upon section 11 of the Companies Act, 1881, and contended that the obligation of every covenant entered into by a lessor who is owner in fee with reference to the subject-matter of the lease is now annexed to and goes with the reversionary estate so that it may be taken advantage of and enforced against any person entitled to such reversionary estate. This covenant, he argued, has reference to the subject-matter of the lease. It binds the lessor throughout the term, and it also binds the defendants so long as the immediate reversion is vested in them. I cannot adopt this view; it seems to me that section 11 in no way alters the old law as to the class of covenants the burden of which will run with the reversion.

Solicitors, C. P. Eaton Taylor; F. A. K. Doyle, for S. T. Talbot, Birmingham.

---

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — March 19, 20.

In re BARONESS LLANOVER'S WILL. HERBERT v. FRESHFIELD. (a.)

Settled land—Trustees with power to manage and to appoint and pay servants—Trust to permit A. to reside—Tenant for life—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 2, sub-section 5; s. 58, sub-section 1 (ix.).

A testatrix devised certain mansion-houses to trustees, and directed them to permit A. at any time and from time to time during her life to reside therein. The trustees were directed to keep the mansion-houses in a fit state for residence, and for this purpose to appoint and pay servants, who were to be Protestants and Welsh-speaking.

Held, that A. had the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts.

Judgment of Swinfen Eady, J. (ante, p. 89, [1902] 2 Ch. 679), affirmed.

(a.) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from a decision of Swinfen Eady, J. (reported in ante, p. 89, [1902] 2 Ch. 679).

Mrs. Herbert, the plaintiff, had taken out a summons for a declaration that she was entitled, under the will of her mother, Lady Llanover, to exercise the powers of a tenant for life within the meaning of the Settled Land Acts.

By her will, dated the 16th of August, 1889, Lady Llanover devised all her real estate to trustees. After giving them full powers of management, and directing them to pay certain annuities, she proceeded, in clause 5, to direct as follows: "I direct that . . . my trustees or trustee shall apply such annual sum or sums of money as shall be necessary for keeping up the two mansion-houses, grounds, and gardens at Llanover, and also the residence and gardens called Abercarn Uchaf, and the mansion and premises in Great Stanhope-street in a fit state for residence in accordance with such scale and rules . . . as they or he may think fit (including in such keeping up the wages of all servants and other persons employed by my trustees or trustee in or about such mansion-houses, residences, grounds, and gardens, which servants and other persons shall be Welsh and speak the Welsh language, and shall not be of the Roman Catholic religion), and my trustees or trustee shall permit my daughter Augusta Charlotte Elizabeth Herbert (wife of John Arthur Herbert, of Llanarth, Esquire) at any time and from time to time during her life to reside at the said mansion-house, gardens, and grounds at Llanover, the residence and gardens called Abercarn Uchaf, and the mansion and premises in Great Stanhope-street, and during any and every such residence at the mansion-houses, gardens, and grounds at Llanover, or at the mansion-house at Great Stanhope-street by my said daughter under such permission as aforesaid, my trustees or trustee shall out of the rents and profits (subject to the prior payments thereout hereinbefore directed) pay to my said daughter an allowance of £80 per week during such residence if the surplus rents and profits shall be sufficient for that purpose, and if not then an allowance at the rate of so much per week as my trustees or trustee may in their or his absolute and uncontrolled discretion think that such surplus rents and profits can fairly bear, and subject as aforesaid my trustees or trustee shall during the life of my said daughter, but not for a period of more than twenty years after my death, apply the ultimate surplus, if any, of the said rents and profits in the manner by the tenth paragraph of this my will directed concerning the proceeds of my residuary estate."

Similar rights of residence were given to a granddaughter, grandson, and great-granddaughter successively, and there was an ultimate devise of the said freehold hereditaments to the daughters of her great-granddaughter by a Protestant Trinitarian husband successively in tail male.

By clause 7 the testatrix directed that the heirlooms in the three mansions should be enjoyed by the person or persons for the time being entitled to the same residences respectively under the limitations thereinbefore directed.

The testatrix died on the 17th of January, 1896, and Mrs. Herbert, who had become a widow, had continuously resided in one or other of the above premises.

Swinfen Eady, J., held that the lady had the powers of a tenant for life within the meaning of the Settled Land Acts.

The trustees appealed.

Haldane, K.C., and Howard Wright, for the trustees.—The powers of management given to the trustees are for the benefit of the settlement. Mrs. Herbert is not a life tenant but a mere licensee, although it is true that the trustees are bound to grant the licence. The trustees are the persons who pay the rates and taxes. The possession is and remains in the trustees. All the testatrix has done is to give her daughter a right to reside subject to restrictions. There is no definition of "possession" in the Act.

They referred to the definition of "possession" in Johnson's Dictionary and Wharton's Law Lexicon, and to Smith v. Overseers of St. Michael, Cambridge, 3 E. & E. 383.

Warmington, K.C., and H. Fellows, for Mrs. Herbert.—The most extensive powers of management on the part of trustees are not incompatible with beneficial possession: In re Jones, 24 Ch. D. 583, 31 W. R. Dig. 208, 32 W. R. 735, 26 Ch. D. 735. Beneficial possession is equivalent (1) to personal occupation, (2) to the receipt of rents and profits: section 58, sub-section 1 (ix.). Mrs. Herbert is the only person "beneficially entitled to possession" under section 2, sub-section 5. The purpose of the powers of management given to the trustees is the benefit of the persons successively entitled. The existence of such powers of management makes the possession more beneficial than usual. It is noteworthy that in clause 7 of the will certain chattels are given as heirlooms to the person entitled to possession. The case is covered by In re Eastman's Settled Estate, 68 L. J. Ch. 122.

They referred also to In re Trenchard, 50 W. R. 266, [1902] 1 Ch. 378, and to In re Mundy and Roper's Contract, 47 W. R. 266, [1899] 1 Ch. 275, at p. 288.

Haldane, K.C., in reply.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Swinfen Eady, J., who decided in favour of Mrs. Herbert's claim to be tenant for life in possession under the Settled Land Acts. The will of Lady Llanover undoubtedly gives very large powers to the trustees and shows a strong desire to give a strictly Protestant and Welsh character to the estate. But there is a provision in it which confers the beneficial occupation of three houses on her daughter, Mrs. Herbert. Now, it has been held that powers of management, however extensive, are not incompatible with a person being tenant for life within the meaning of the Act and having the beneficial possession of property. The definition of a tenant for life is that contained in section 2, sub-section 5 of the Settled Land Act, 1882. [His lordship read the sub-section.] Another section on which the learned judge decided the case is section 58, sub-section 1 (ix.) Mr. Warmington's argument has shown us that the lady is entitled under the first sub-section. Let us pass to the particular clause in the will (clause 5) which deals with the right of this lady to reside. [His lordship read the clause.] What is the meaning of this provision? Who is to reside? Clearly not the trustees, but the lady in question, and the residence contemplated is residence during her life. The words are "the trustees shall permit." It is not a question of mere discretion on the part of the trustees, for the terms of the will are peremptory. This is clearly a "beneficial" possession. The powers of management given to the trustees are calculated to make the place fit for residence, calculated to make the residence more beneficial from the point of view of this lady. They are not incompatible with beneficial possession by a tenant for life. The authority cited by Mr. Warmington—viz., In re Jones, is quite conclusive on this point. The only argument of the appellants having any weight was that the powers of management were so large as to be incompatible with any independent right of possession. According to Mr. Haldane, Mrs. Herbert was at most a casual licensee. But he does not define who actually has the possession. He is obliged to say that all the trusts are for the benefit of the estate somehow or other, so that the possession is, according to him, in that abstraction—viz., the estate. It is not contemplated that the trustees are themselves to occupy any of these residences. The will is clear, the lady cannot be stopped if she chooses to reside. In my opinion the powers come to nothing more than very extensive powers of management—and powers given for the purpose of increasing the enjoyment of the property. They are for the advantage of the lady in question, and enhance the beneficial character of her possession. Under these circumstances I think that the decision of Swinfen Eady, J., was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In this will elaborate provisions are made for the trustees keeping certain premises in a fit state of residence The provisions as to the servants are only one part of this general scheme. Who is to enjoy the possession of the premises? The first trust is a trust to permit Mrs. Herbert "at any time and from time to time during her life to reside." It is a trust which is compulsory on the trustees and not in any way discretionary. It is in fact a trust that Mrs. Herbert shall have a right to reside during her life. It is not a trust that she alone, that she individually shall have a right to go and stay on these premises as a sort of guest or lodger. She is the person to reside, and she is to have the ordinary powers of a mistress. For instance, she can have her own personal servants, she can have her friends to stay with her, and in other respects she can exercise the ordinary rights of a mistress in her own residence during her life. In short, the trust is to permit Mrs. Herbert to use these premises as her residence. She is, to my mind, in the words of section 2, sub-section 5, the person beneficially entitled to possession. If she is not, then there is nobody beneficially entitled. Certainly the servants cannot be beneficially entitled. There is one person, and one person only, Mrs. Herbert, to whom that phrase applies, and to my mind she is clearly tenant for life. The policy of the law is to regard the Settled Land Acts as beneficial, and not to cut down the class of persons to whom the benefits of those Acts apply. No doubt the testatrix did not anticipate this result, and no doubt the powers conferred by the Act interfere with the object she had in view. But this cannot be helped, nor do I regret it.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J. — I agree. It seems impossible to doubt that Mrs Herbert, and she alone, is entitled to possession, if she does not disclaim. The powers of management, extensive as they are, are not inconsistent with the right of the person beneficially entitled. I should like to refer to clause 7 of the will, which confers on the persons entitled to the possession of the estate the right of enjoying certain chattels as heirlooms. Can it be seriously contended that Mrs. Herbert is not entitled to the enjoyment of these heirlooms? This answer is conclusive.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Freshfields; Hunter & Haynes.

---

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) — March 18.

MILLER v. LAW ACCIDENT INSURANCE SOCIETY (LIMITED). (a.)

Insurance, Marine—"Restraints of people"—Prohibition against landing cattle — "Warranted free of capture, seizure, or detention."

Under a Lloyd's policy cattle were insured for a voyage from Liverpool to Buenos Ayres against (inter alia) "arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and people." The policy also contained the following clause: "Warranted free of capture, seizure, or detention." Prior to the shipment the Argentine Government had issued a decree prohibiting the entry of animals suffering from contagious diseases, and providing for the slaughter of animals suspected of disease. On arrival at Buenos Ayres the cattle were found to be suffering from a contagious disease, and the authorities refused to allow them to be landed. The cattle were thereupon transhipped to another vessel outside the port and taken to another port, where they were sold at a considerable loss. In an action on the policy,

Held, (1) not agreeing with the judgment of Bigham, J., that the loss was a loss within the words "restraints of people" in the policy; and (2), agreeing with Bigham, J., upon this point, that the warranty against capture, seizure, or detention freed the underwriters from liability under the words "arrests, restraints, and detainments" in the earlier part of the policy.

Judgment of Bigham, J. (50 W. R. 474, 7 Com. Cas. 151, [1902] 2 K. B. 694), affirmed.

Appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Bigham, J. (reported in 50 W. R. 474, 7 Com. Cas. 151, [1902] 2 K. B. 694).

The action was brought to recover the amount of a total or partial loss of cattle under a Lloyd's policy of marine insurance granted by the defendants to the plaintiff, and dated the 24th of August, 1900, for a voyage from Liverpool to Montevideo and (or) Buenos Ayres, and, so far as actual mortality was concerned, for three days after landing.

The cattle were shipped in the steamship Bellevue, to be carried from Liverpool to Buenos Ayres. The risks insured against included "arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and people . . . and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods . . . or any part thereof." At the end of the policy there was this clause: "Warranted free of capture, seizure, or detention, and the consequences thereof, or of any attempt thereat, piracy excepted, and also from all consequences of hostilities, warlike operations, and all risks of riots and civil commotions, whether before or after declaration of war." Having made the shipment, the plaintiff effected the policy. Many months before the shipment was made—namely, on the 22nd of May, 1899—the Argentine Government had issued a decree forbidding the entry of animals suffering from contagious diseases or coming from countries where such diseases prevailed. The decree contained articles describing the diseases and providing how animals suspected of being affected were to be dealt with, article 5 providing that animals suspected of certain diseases would be slaughtered without delay and a very vigorous disinfection of the ship, &c., would be proceeded with. The Bellevue arrived at Buenos Ayres on the 10th of September, 1900, and the cattle were duly inspected on board the vessel by the Argentine officials, with the result that the Ministry of Agriculture came to the conclusion that they were suffering from disease within the meaning of the decree, and ordered the vessel to leave the port. The order contained a provision that the captain, if he so wished, might transship the cattle to another vessel outside the limits of the port for carriage to some other destination, and that The Bellevue must be completely disinfected before the rest of her cargo could be landed.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-Law.

On the next day (the 11th of September) the President of the Republic and the Minister of Agriculture issued a general order forbidding until further notice the discharge of any cattle arriving from the United Kingdom. Bigham, J., found as a fact that the animals were suffering from disease within the meaning of the decree and that the order forbidding the landing was lawfully made by the Argentine authorities. In obedience to the order The Bellevue left the dock in Buenos Ayres, and on the 14th of September the cattle were transhipped into lighters at a place called Santiago, which was outside the limits of the port. On this day notice of abandonment was given. The cattle remained in the lighters for some days, when a ship called The Sallust was found to take them on to Montevideo, at which place, after being forty days in quarantine, they were landed and sold at a considerable loss. Bigham, J., held that this was not a loss within the policy, as the mere operation of an ordinary municipal law affecting or preventing the delivery of the insured goods at their destination was not a "restraint of people" within the meaning of the policy, those words referring to something violent and out of the ordinary course of things. The learned judge was also of opinion that the warranty against capture, seizure, or detention operated to release the underwriters from liability in respect of arrests or restraints of all kings, princes, or people. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

March 16, 17.—J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Maurice Hill, for the plaintiff.

Scrutton, K.C., and Loehnis, for the defendants.

The following authorities were referred to in addition to those referred to in the court below: Havelock v. Hancill, 3 T. R. 277; Rotch v. Edie, 6 T. R. 413; Lubbock v. Rowcroft, 5 Esp. 50; Forster v. Christie, 11 East. 205; Geipel v. Smith, 20 W. R. 332, L. R. 7 Q. B. 404; Crew, Widgery, & Co. v. Great Western Steamship Co., 4 Times L. R. 148; Nickels v. London and Provincial Marine and General Insurance Co., 6 Com. Cas. 15, 49 W. R. Dig. 85; Cunard Steamship Co. v. Marten, 8 Com. Cas. 17; Arnould on Marine Insurance (7th ed.), ss. 804, 1142, 1150; and Phillips on Insurance (3rd ed.), s. 1114.

March 18.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree with the judgments about to be delivered, and I will only add a few words of my own. In my opinion, so far as the words in the body of the policy are concerned, the events which occurred in the present case would bring it within the word "restraints," and, therefore, but for the warranty, which I will deal with presently, the underwriters would be liable for the loss. The insurance was upon cattle shipped to Buenos Ayres, the port of destination, which was the only place at which it was commercially worth while to sell them. At Buenos Ayres the adventure was altogether defeated, so far as the cattle were concerned, and the underwriters became liable for the loss. In my judgment the issuing of the decree by the Argentine Government was an act of state and comes within the words "arrests, restraints, and detainments" in the body of the policy. There seems to me to be no analogy between this case and the case of the arrest or detention of a ship at the suit of a private individual for the purpose of instituting proceedings against the ship. But when I come to the warranty, I should be inclined to say, if we were dealing with a document other than a policy of marine insurance, that a restraint of this sort, which was only in the nature of an injunction forbidding the landing of the cattle but allowing the other cargo to be landed under certain conditions if the master thought fit to do so, would not in the ordinary meaning of the English language come within the words "capture, seizure, or detention." It seems to me to be clear that it was not a "capture," and I should have thought that it was not "a seizure or detention" according to the ordinary meaning of those words. But I accept the suggestion that we must not construe policies of insurance as we should other documents, and in this respect Bigham, J., said, "It was said that this exception ought not to be interpreted to include 'restraint.' I think, however, that the very object of this exception is to free the underwriters from liability under the words 'arrests, restraints, and detainments' in the body of the policy. It is true that the same words are not used, but the exception must be taken to refer to something which has gone before, and to what, if not to the words I have mentioned?" It is true that Parsons, in his treatise on Marine Insurance, vol. 1, p. 585, does not speak with any great certainty about the matter, because he says that "detention" is a taking with intent to return the thing taken, as where a ship is arrested by an embargo, or stopped for search, or detained in a port by an actual blockade, "or, perhaps, by being lawfully restrained from entering her port of destination by a blockading force." I cannot see for this purpose much difference between the case of a restraint by a blockading force and the case of a restraint by the enforcement of a sanitary law. In these circumstances, in view of the meaning which, according to the authorities, seems to have been placed upon the words of the warranty, I have not sufficient confidence in the natural meaning of the words to justify me in differing from the interpretation placed upon them by the learned judge. The result is that Mr. Justice Bigham's judgment must be affirmed, for the reasons given in the second part—namely, the reasons based on the warranty clause—but not for those given in the first part of that judgment.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In the first place I think that the proceedings at Buenos Ayres in September, 1900, amounted to an exercise of force by the Government of the Argentine Republic so as to bring the case within the perils insured against. What took place was this. The ship, having arrived at Buenos Ayres, was inspected by an official, when it was discovered that certain of the cattle were or might be suffering from an infectious disease. Thereupon the Ministry of Agriculture intervened and served a resolution upon the captain directing him to take the ship out of the port, with leave to transship the cattle on to another vessel outside the port, and ordering that the ship should be disinfected before the rest of the goods were landed. On the following day an order was made by the President of the Republic and the Minister of Agriculture forbidding until further notice the discharge of any cattle arriving from the United Kingdom. The captain, having been served with the resolution, took the ship out of port, and, in order to minimize the loss, he transshipped the cattle on to another vessel; and they were taken to Montevideo and sold there.

It seems to me that the loss was occasioned by the active intervention of the Government of the Argentine Republic, and that intervention was none the less an exercise of superior force because neither the army nor the police force actually intervened. The natural inference is that, if the captain had not obeyed the order, the government officials would have taken possession of the ship and slaughtered the cattle in accordance with article 5 of the decree of the 22nd of May, 1899. The captain, therefore, seems to me to have been justified in taking the ship outside the port and transshipping the cattle in order to minimize the loss, and in doing so he acted in compliance with superior force. It was none the less the act of the Argentine Government because it was done in accordance with the laws in force in that country. It has been decided that it is a peril covered by a policy of insurance in similar terms to those in the present case where there has been a loss caused by the intervention of a government in enforcing the revenue laws. I can see no distinction between enforcing the revenue laws and enforcing the sanitary laws. The principle as to the enforcement of the revenue laws was recognized in Cory v. Burr, 31 W. R. 894, 8 App. Cas. 393, where the seizure was the result of smuggling, and in Robinson Gold Mining Co. v. Alliance Insurance Co., 50 W. R. 109, [1902] 2 K. B. 489. On behalf of the defendants it was argued that a long line of authorities, of which Hadkinson v. Robinson, 3 Bos. & P. 388, is a leading example, apply. The effect of those cases was summed up by Brett, J., in Rodocanachi v. Elliott, 21 W. R. 810, L. R. 8 C. P. 649, at p. 670, thus: "If the master of the ship, of his own accord, or in obedience to the orders of the officers of the Queen, abstains from entering a blockaded port, the causa proxima is not the blockade, but the voluntary act of the master." It seems to me that the present case goes far beyond what was laid down there. In the view which I take of the facts the master did not act voluntarily. If on entering the port the master had been informed that there was a law against his landing the goods and that it was likely to be put into force, and he had gone on his voyage and not entered the port, the case would have been like Hadkinson v. Robinson. But here he went as far as he could, and only desisted when the government intervened. Those cases therefore do not apply. Upon this question, therefore, I differ from the decision of Bigham, J.

Upon the second question I feel unable to differ from the opinion expressed by the learned judge. The words of the warranty are, no doubt, somewhat difficult to construe; but, having regard to the judgment which is about to be delivered by Mathew, L.J., I do not differ from the conclusion at which he has arrived.

MATHEW, L.J., read the following judgment: The material facts may be stated in a few words. By the order of the administration, the executive authority at Buenos Ayres, the vessel, The Bellevue, was stopped before she reached her berth. The discharge of the cattle was prohibited, and the animals were detained on board the vessel. The master was directed to leave Buenos Ayres and land the cattle at some other port. He obeyed. The animals were transshipped outside the port and sent to Montevideo. It was not disputed that the object of the assured in shipping the cattle to Buenos Ayres in consequence was altogether defeated. It was argued for the defendants that the loss thus occasioned was not due to "arrest, restraint, or detainment" within the meaning of the policy. The words, it was contended, implied the use of direct force, and none had in fact been employed. The case of Finlay v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Co., 23 L. T. Rep. 251, upon which reliance was placed by the defendants' counsel, afforded no grounds for this position, and no other satisfactory authority was referred to. If actual force was not used it was because there was no opposition. The master submitted to the orders of the administration. The result to the assured was the same as if force had been used, and even if the defendants were right in their interpretation of the words in question, the loss was ejusdem generis with the peril described in the policy, and was covered by the general words, "other losses and misfortunes," which end the enumeration of the perils insured against. It was further argued for the defendants that the loss was not within the policy because the acts of the administration were illegal—that is to say, were out of the ordinary course of the law. There was no reason for saying that what was done by the administration was out of the ordinary course of the law of the port of destination. Even if it were, I do not see how it would help the underwriters. I am of opinion that but for the warranty the underwriters would be responsible for the loss in question. This conclusion is in accordance with the decisions referred to in the argument with respect to the meaning of similar words in charter-parties where shipowners and charterers have been exonerated from the performance of their obligations by a blockade which rendered access to a port commercially impracticable. No reason was given with respect to this insurance why the words "arrest of princes" in this policy and in an ordinary charter-party should have different meanings. But the policy contains the warranty against "capture, seizure, or detention," commonly called at Lloyd's the f.c.s. clause; and it was argued for the defendants that their liability under the earlier part of the policy was cancelled. The warranty goes beyond the words "arrest" and "restraint." "Capture" and "seizure" are stronger expressions. It was suggested that what was meant were acts of warfare, but it is clearly settled that the words have no such restricted meaning: Cory v. Burr. It is not, in my opinion, intended by the alteration of terms to describe a different class of perils from those previously mentioned. Counsel for the plaintiff failed to suggest any practical difference for the present purpose between the two sets of phrases. It seems to me sufficient to point out that the word "detention" in the warranty cannot be distinguished from the word "detainment" in the earlier part of the policy. The loss, in my judgment, is within the warranty, and the underwriters are not liable in this action. For these reasons I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for Hill, Dickinson, Dickinson, Hill, & Roberts, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the defendants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

---

From Registrar in Bankruptcy. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — March 13.

In re BEER.
Ex parte BEER. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Discharge—Subsequent scheme of composition involving annulment of bankruptcy—Discretion of court as to annulment—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 23, 32—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), ss. 8, 9.

(a.) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The court, in exercising its discretion as to the annulment of a bankruptcy, will take into consideration not only the interest of creditors but also and primarily the interests of the public and commercial morality.

A., who had been adjudicated a bankrupt and obtained a discharge, entered into a scheme of composition with his creditors, one of the conditions of which scheme was that the bankruptcy should be annulled. A. had been guilty of certain offences under section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890.

Held, that, in the interests of public and commercial morality, the court was precluded from ordering the bankruptcy to be annulled.

This was an appeal by the bankrupt from the refusal of Mr. Registrar Giffard to approve of a scheme of composition under section 23 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

The facts were as follows:

In 1896 Mr. Beer commenced business as a whisky blender. On the 10th of April, 1899, a receiving order was made against him, and on the 27th of the same month he was adjudicated a bankrupt. In May, 1899, a first dividend of 2s. 1d. in the pound was paid, and in July the bankrupt applied for his discharge. On proof (1) that the assets were not equal to 10s. in the pound on the amount of unsecured debts; (2) that the debtor had continued to trade after knowing himself to be insolvent; (3) that the debtor had been guilty of misconduct in having, without his wife's knowledge and consent, appropriated and employed in his business money deposited with him by her, it was ordered by the registrar that the discharge should be suspended for two years and six months, and that the discharge should take effect as from the 12th of January, 1902.

On the 9th of January, 1903, a meeting of creditors was held at which the debtor proposed to pay an additional dividend of 7s. 11d. in the pound (making in all 10s. in the pound), but subject to the condition that his bankruptcy should be altogether annulled. This proposal was accepted by the majority of creditors, and accordingly on the 28th of January, 1903, application was made to the court for its approval of the scheme. One of the creditors—viz, the debtor's wife, had withdrawn her claims against the estate and executed a release under seal.

On the 4th of February, 1903, the application was heard. It was supported by nine creditors, and opposed by one. The official receiver reported in favour of the proposal. The learned registrar refused to approve of the scheme. He was of opinion that section 23 did not apply after the bankrupt's discharge had taken effect. It was in effect an application to remove disqualifications to which the bankrupt was subject by reason of the fact that five years had not elapsed since the date of his discharge.

The bankrupt, who had been elected a councillor of a borough council, appealed.

Section 23 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is as follows: (1) "Where a debtor is adjudged bankrupt the creditors may, if they think fit, at any time after the adjudication, by special resolution, resolve to entertain a proposal for a composition in satisfaction of the debts due to them under the bankruptcy, or for a scheme of arrangement of the bankrupt's affairs; and thereupon the same proceedings shall be taken and the same consequences shall ensue as in the case of a composition or scheme accepted before adjudication." (2) "If the court approves the composition or scheme it may make an order annulling the bankruptcy and vesting the property of the bankrupt in him or in such other person as the court may appoint, on such terms and subject to such conditions, if any, as the court may declare."

Section 32, sub-section 1 (d), of the Act is as follows: "When a bankrupt is adjudged bankrupt he shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be disqualified for being elected to or holding or exercising the office of mayor, alderman, or councillor."

Muir Mackenzie, for the debtor.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Carrington, for the creditors supporting the appeal.—The position is different to what it would have been if the scheme had been made before the discharge. The first offence of the bankrupt—viz., assets of a value below 10s. in the £, compelled the registrar to suspend the discharge for two years. For the two other offences he added six months. From the point of view of the creditors, if the court accede to our request, we get 10s. in the £. If the court does not accede we are punished. Is it worth while to punish the creditors for the purpose of imposing a slight inconvenience on the bankrupt. The Bankruptcy Act was passed as much for the benefit of creditors as for the punishment of the bankrupt.

Herbert Reed, K.C., and E. Clayton, for the opposing creditor, were not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Mr. Registrar Giffard, who has refused to approve of a scheme of composition under section 23 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, of a scheme which involves the annulment of the bankruptcy. The debtor got an order of discharge subject to a suspension of two and a-half years, but he wishes now to get his bankruptcy altogether annulled. Now at one time it was thought that there could be no annulment of bankruptcy except under section 35 of the Act of 1883. That view was not adopted in the Court of Appeal. Here it has been held that the court has a discretion to permit the annulment. But the circumstances must be special, and there is, to start with, a vehement presumption against the debtor's right to have the bankruptcy annulled. In the present case the debtor's conduct is open to grave suspicion. The learned registrar has reported that he knowingly appropriated and employed in his business and without his wife's knowledge and consent money deposited by her with him. This is a fraudulent breach of trust, and as such one of the offences mentioned in section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890. The annulment of a bankruptcy is a matter in the discretion of the court; it is a matter of duty on the part of the court. The court is under a duty to consider the character of the bankrupt, how it is that he came to be bankrupt, and how he has gone through the ordeal of bankruptcy. It is said that the court ought to consider the interests of the creditors rather than the interests of the public. But it has been held that, even where the bankrupt has paid his creditors in full, the court will, in the interests of the public, disallow an annulment. The primary matter for consideration is the conduct of the debtor. I cannot consider the special grounds on which the learned registrar refused the application. But he was of opinion on the facts that the debtor's conduct was not such as to entitle him to an annulment. For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In applications of this kind, made for the annulment of a bankruptcy, the court is bound, in exercising its discretion, to look at many things, amongst others at the state of affairs in the bankruptcy, and in particular the conduct of the bankrupt. The court, no doubt, is not absolutely precluded from allowing an annulment of the bankruptcy when such annulment is in the interests of the creditors merely because the bankrupt has been guilty of some offence. But it is the duty of the court to seriously consider the position of affairs when the bankrupt is proved to have been guilty of misconduct. It is important to see whether in the interest of the public there should be an annulment. The court has to look at the public interests and the requirements of commercial morality. Even if it were to the interest of creditors that there should be an annulment, yet that is no consideration if the court has come to the conclusion that an annulment would not be in the interests of public and commercial morality. I have already in the course of the argument referred to Ex parte Kearsley, 18 Q. B. D. 168, 35 W. R. Dig. 15. Lindley, L.J., at p. 174 of the report, says this: "What, then, is the duty of the court in dealing with a matter of this kind? It is laid down in sub-section 6 of section 18. It is the duty of the court to look, not only at the interest of the creditors, but also at the conduct of the debtor. Under some of the circumstances mentioned in sub-section 6, however beneficial the composition or scheme may be to the creditors, it is the duty of the court by reason of the conduct of the debtor to refuse to sanction it." Lopes, L.J., at p. 175 of the same report, says: "The circumstances differ in almost every case. It would be impossible to lay down any general rule applicable to all cases. But I understand it to be left to the discretion of the court, when a composition appears reasonable, to determine whether the conduct of the debtor is such as to make it more expedient in the interest of the public to punish him than to consult only the interest of the creditors."

It must not be forgotten that what the bankrupt desired was to be able to go into the world and say "Oh, my bankruptcy was annulled and reversed by order of the court. My conduct cannot have been very bad." Ought we to allow the debtor to go about and say this? It appears from the records of the court that he started in 1896 with £100, that he carried on business for three years, that throughout his business was unsuccessful, that he owed debts amounting to several thousand pounds, that he paid only two shillings in the pound, that he continued to trade after knowing himself insolvent, that he appropriated money of his wife without her knowledge and consent. Is that conduct such as should justify the court in annulling the bankruptcy? The interests of the public and commercial morality are against an annulment. For these reasons the appeal, in my opinion, fails.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. I protest against the notion that the bankrupt purged his offence when the period of his discharge elapsed, or that he could make a bargain with his creditors that his bankruptcy should be annulled. On the ground of public policy I disallow the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Harrison & Powell; C. W. & H. B. Taylor; Foy & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } March 12.

BOYCE v. EDBROOKE. (a.)

Powers—Lease to donee of power and others—Settled Estates Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 18)—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38)—Covenant to pay rent—Validity of lease—Lease to trustee for donee.

A lease granted by a donee of a power of leasing to himself or to himself and others is ipso facto void.

Semble, except in the case of certain powers of ancient creation, where uniform practice since their creation has been held to show that a special construction must be put on the power, a lease by a donee of a power to a trustee for himself is void.

Bevan v. Habgood, 8 W. R. 703, 1 Joh. & H. 222, discussed.

A tenant for life purported to grant a lease under the Settled Estates Act, 1877, to a firm in which he was himself a partner; the lease contained covenants for payment of rent, &c., by the "lessees," who were defined as being the donee and his partners and their executors, administrators, and assigns.

Held, that the lease was void; first, because in fact the rent received was not the best obtainable; secondly, because there was during the life of the tenant for life no enforceable covenant; thirdly, because the lease was to the donee himself with others.

Witness action.

In and prior to 1892 Frederick Boyce was tenant for life, under the will of his father, of a house in which he lived and carried on business.

The house was mortgaged to a building society, and the annual payments under the mortgage amounted to £60 10s.

In 1892 he entered into partnership with his son and W. M. Goldsworthy. It was agreed that the partnership business should be carried on in the house, and that Frederick Boyce should grant a lease of the house to the firm, but should himself continue to live in his house. Frederick Boyce accordingly purported in the exercise of the powers given to him by the Settled Estates Act, 1877, and of any other powers thereto enabling him, to grant a lease to himself, his son, and Goldsworthy, thereinafter called "the lessees." The expression "the lessees" was therein defined as including Frederick Boyce, his son, Goldsworthy, "and their executors, administrators, and assigns." The lease contained covenants by "the lessees" with Frederick Boyce for (inter alia) the payment of rent. The rent reserved was £60 10s.—i.e., the annual sum payable to the building society.

It was subsequently agreed that when Frederick Boyce ceased to manage the business he should leave the house and one of his partners should live there, and that the firm should pay Frederick Boyce £16 a year in lieu of his right to live in the house.

Frederick Boyce died in 1902. In the meantime the lease had been assigned by the lessees to a purchaser, who in turn assigned it to the defendant.

This action was brought by the persons entitled to the freehold, after the death of Frederick Boyce, under the will of his father, to recover possession of the house on the ground that the lease was void.

Both the Settled Estates Act, 1877, and the Settled Land Act, 1882, require that leases made under them shall reserve the best rent reasonably obtainable.

(a.) Reported by GODFREY R. BENSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Upjohn, K.C., and F. Thompson, for the plaintiffs.—A donee of a power may not lease to himself. The opinion of Page-Wood, V C., in Bevan v. Habgood, 8 W. R. 703, 1 Joh. & H. 222, and of Lord St. Leonards (Sugden on Powers (8th ed.), 717), that he may lease to a trustee for himself, is contrary to general principle and is not really supported by the cases to which they refer. The only case when anything similar was decided was that of Wilson v. Sewell, 4 Burr. 1975, 1 Wm. Bl. 616, where a lease had been granted by a Master of the Rolls to himself; and that lease was supported, not on a ground of general principle but because the established custom of the Rolls Office was admitted as contemporanea expositio of the Act under which the lease was granted. In any case this lease is bad because there is no enforceable covenant, and further because the evidence shows that the best rent was not reserved.

Butcher, K.C., and Clay (R. Holman Gregory with them, for the defendant, relied on Bevan v. Habgood, and the opinion of Lord St. Leonards, and argued that the covenants in the lease were joint and several and therefore enforceable.

FARWELL, J.—This is a lease purporting to be granted under a statutory power, which requires that the best rent obtainable shall be reserved. I find that the best rent obtainable was not reserved, and therefore the requirements of the Act giving the power have not been complied with and there is no lease. But there is a further ground on which the lease cannot be supported. The Act requires that the lease shall contain covenants for payment of the rent, &c. Now here the lease is made by the tenant for life to himself and others. It follows that during his lifetime there are no covenants that could be sued upon—that is, assuming that the covenants are joint. It is argued that they are joint and several, and I have done my best to spell out such a covenant; but the court, though in the case of ambiguous words it may adopt a construction which would support the lease, must not alter the plain meaning of words, and I find here no words of severance. Treating this, therefore, as a joint covenant, it is clear that no action at law could be brought, and the Act, when it requires a covenant, means a legal covenant enforceable at law and not some right which might or might not be enforceable in equity. There remains, however, the question whether in any case a lease by a tenant for life to himself and others could be upheld. Fortunately I am not bound to decide this question in a manner which would contravene any previous judgment. If there is one doctrine better settled than another, it is that a man in a fiduciary position should not enter into a transaction in which his interest conflicts with his duty. It is said that the one exception to this is the case of a donee of a power of leasing, who, it is said, may grant a lease to a trustee for himself. If it is so it is a great anomaly. But assuming that this anomaly exists in the case of a lease by a tenant for life to a trustee for himself, in which case the lease could contain valid covenants, yet there is no authority that he can grant such a lease to himself, and I should decline to extend this exception, if it exists at all, by holding that he can do so.

However, after the full discussion of this question that has taken place, I ought to say further that I much doubt whether there is such an exception to the general rule of equity as the text-books state, and as Page-Wood, V.C., in Bevan v. Habgood thought. In that case the Vice-Chancellor was clearly much guided by the circumstances of the particular case. I do not think his proposition is proved by the cases of Wilson v. Sewell and Cardigan v. Montague to which he refers. As to Cardigan v. Montague, which is only reported in an appendix to Sugden on Powers, p. 918, I cannot find that this question was ever raised in that case. There was a reference to the master to report as to certain leases whether they were valid as reserving the best rents and containing the proper covenants, and the master's certificate was afterwards varied as to certain of these leases, but from beginning to end of the report there is no suggestion that this particular objection to the leases was ever raised. That being so, I cannot treat this decision of the Lord Chancellor in 1754 as having established such an important exception to what is now, and I suppose was then, a well-settled rule. Of the cases referred to by Lord St. Leonards as showing the existence of this exemption, the earliest is Taylor v. Horde, 1 Burr. 60. I cannot find that in the argument in that case, which was reported very fully, this point was ever raised, and it was a case before a court of common law, which in those day did not regard rules of equity. There is, however, a dictum by Lord Mansfield at p. 124 to the effect stated by Lord St. Leonards. But all that was decided in that case was that a lease which had been granted by a tenant for life to a trustee for himself was a valid lease at law as against a purchaser of the freehold, and I do not see why it was not, nor do I see that the decision affects the rights of the remaindermen in this case.

Wilson v. Sewell is usually cited as reported in 4 Burr. 1975, but it is also reported in 1 Wm. Bl. 616, and as there reported does not appear to be an authority for the proposition contended for. The case was that of a lease granted under a private Act of 12 Charles II. by a Master of the Rolls to a trustee for himself. Lord Mansfield, as reported in 1 Wm. Blackstone, gave his decision on the practice of the office for a hundred years, and the real meaning of the case is that the uniform practice of the Masters of the Rolls since the passing of the Act, which conferred the power of leasing, are admissible as contemporanea expositio to show the meaning of that Act. The case is therefore no authority for the general principle; and the same explanation applies to what is said by Mr. Chance (2 Chance on Powers 2091) on leases granted by bishops.

Solicitors, S. F. Sutton, for Page & Thompson, Bristol; C. Bisgood, for C. Pillers, Bristol.

---

Chan. Div. } March 27.
Buckley, J. }

In re JENNINGS (A SOLICITOR). (a.)

Manor—Steward—Custody of court rolls.

A steward of a manor has, for the purpose of performing the duties of his office, a right to the custody of the court rolls, and, in the absence of misconduct, he possesses this right, even as against the lord.

Windham v. Giubilei, 40 L. J. Ch. 505, 19 W. R. Dig. 66, followed.

Rawes v. Rawes, 7 Sim. 624, 5 L. J. Ch. 114, explained and distinguished.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application on the part of Arthur John Wise, as lord of the manor of Beverley Water Towns, to compel William Edward Henry Jennings, the steward of the manor, to deliver up to him the court rolls, to the custody of which the applicant claimed to be entitled.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The respondent had been appointed by the predecessor in title of the applicant by a deed-poll to be steward during the life of the respondent, provided "he should so long well and faithfully demean and behave himself in his said office."

There was no allegation of misconduct on the part of the steward, but each party contended that the balance of convenience was in favour of his having the custody, and, in addition, the lord claimed the custody as a matter of right. The respondent said that there was no such right.

T. L. Wilkinson, for the applicant.—The lord has, as of right, the custody of the court rolls; and though they ordinarily remain in the custody of the steward, he holds them only as servant or agent of the lord: Rawes v. Rawes. Hughes v. Mayre, 3 T. R 275, and Ex parte Grubb, 5 Taunt. 206, which were cited in the argument in that case are, authorities, not for the proposition of law there laid down, but to show that the court had jurisdiction to make the order. Windham v. Giubilei is diametrically opposed to Rawes v. Rawes, was decided on its own facts, and ought not to be followed.

He also referred to Cocks v. Harman, 6 East 404.

Austen-Cartmell, for the respondent.—I do not claim an actual title in the court rolls, but need to have their custody for the purposes of my business as a steward. Although a steward is a servant or agent of the lord, he is not a mere servant, but has duties to the tenants. Elton on Copyhold (2nd ed.), p. 314, and Scriven on Copyhold (7th ed.), p. 431, treat Windham v. Giubilei as an authority for saying that a steward cannot be deprived of the rolls except for misconduct. I do not quarrel with the actual decision in Rawes v. Rawes, for there the steward had been guilty of misconduct, but neither Hughes v. Mayre nor Ex parte Grubb warrant the statement that the lord has an absolute right to the custody of the rolls.

He also referred to North-Western Railway v. Sharp, 3 W. R. 12, 10 Exch. 451, and Ex parte Corpus Christi College, 6 Taunt. 105.

T. L. Wilkinson replied.

BUCKLEY, J., stated the facts, and continued: The question I have to decide is whether the lord, as against the steward, is as of right entitled to have possession of the court rolls. Looking at the matter on principle, what strikes me in the first instance is that the lord is the person who unquestionably is entitled to their possession, but not as his own property. R. v. Tower, 4 M. & Sel. 162, shows that as regards the court rolls he is a trustee and guardian of the tenants' rights. Again, the steward in a sense is a servant of the lord; but he is not a mere servant. He holds a judicial office and is unquestionably entitled to the possession of the rolls for the purpose of executing the duties of his office. The lord cannot refuse to let him have them for those purposes; his rights are qualified rights. The rights of the lord are, in a certain sense, paramount, but they are subject to the steward's claim to the use of the rolls; and the steward thus has rights which in a sense are paramount to those of the lord; but both the lord and the steward are trustees for the tenants of the manor. In that state of rights, where the steward is properly exercising the duties of his office, and for the purposes of those duties needs the possession of the court rolls, has the lord any right to come to him and say, "Deliver them up to me"? In my opinion he has no such right. I must refer to the authorities, and, in particular to the case of Rawes v. Rawes, before Shadwell, V.C., in which the decision, if his language is to be understood in the wide sense in which it is reported in Simon, covers this case. I do not think it can be so understood.

The first case bearing on the subject is that of Hughes v. Mayre in 1789. What I get out of that case is that the lord of the manor, who was going abroad, and wanted to see the court rolls and deeds belonging to the estate, called on Mayre to show cause why he should not deliver them up to him; it appears that Mayre had been concerned for the original proprietor of the manor, and had been continued in the employment of Hughes. It does not appear that Mayre had any tenure of the office. I gather that he had not, but that Hughes, the lord, was minded to appoint his own steward, and for that purpose had asked for the court rolls. Mayre did not deny the right of the lord to the custody of the rolls, but said, first, that he had a lien on the muniments; and, secondly, that a third person was interested in them. It was ordered that the lord should pay £300 into court, and that thereupon the steward, or as I read it, the late steward, should deliver up the rolls. That is the whole case. No general proposition was laid down to the effect that the lord has an absolute right to an order that the steward should hand over the rolls.

In Ex parte Grubb, in 1813, the lord had dismissed one steward and appointed another in his place. The application was that the late steward should deliver up to the lord or the present steward the rolls and all other deeds relating to the manors. No cause being shown, the rule was made absolute.

The next case, in 1815, Ex parte Corpus Christi College, is similar. A Mr. Fry had employed a steward. The application was that he should deliver over the court rolls. The court, after some hesitation on a question of jurisdiction, granted a rule nisi to the whole extent prayed. It was simply a case of a lord enforcing his rights as against a former steward.

That being the position of the authorities, the case of Rawes v. Rawes in 1836 came before Shadwell, V.C. There are two reports, and from that in the Law Journal it appears that the suit was instituted to execute the trusts of a will under which the infant plaintiffs were lords of a manor. They alleged that a solicitor, who had been employed as steward of the the manor, had been negligent, had been adjudicated a bankrupt, and had been in gaol. In other words, it was a case of a steward who had been guilty of misconduct, and was not to be trusted with the documents. The cases cited in support of the application were Hughes v. Mayre and Ex parte Grubb. According to the report in Simon. Shadwell, V.C., said: "Nothing in the nature of decision has been cited to me to show that the right to hold the court rolls is in the steward as against the lord. In the cases referred to in support of the petition the only doubt that the judges entertained was whether they had jurisdiction to order, in a summary way, an attorney to deliver deeds to his client, and finding that they had that jurisdiction, they take it for granted that they had authority to compel the steward, as an attorney, to deliver up the court rolls to the lord." Then follows this sentence, which is not so strongly expressed in the Law Journal: "The lord has, as of right, the custody of the court rolls, and though they ordinarily remain in the custody of the steward, he holds them only as servant or agent of the lord." In the Law Journal the Vice-Chancellor is reported to have said: "I have heard nothing which can lead me to a decision that the right to hold the court rolls of a manor is in the steward as against the lord. I was very much struck with the boldness of this proposition; it struck me as something new."

He is considering the case of a steward who has misconducted himself, and is trying to keep the rolls as against the lord. Later on he says: "In Hughes v. Mayre, Lord Kenyon and the Court of Common Pleas took it for granted that the lord of the manor had a right to compel the steward to give up the court rolls: and my opinion is that the lord of the manor has himself a right to the custody of the court rolls, and though they frequently remain in the hands of the steward, that is only a matter of convenience, and he holds them as the servant of the lord. I am bound by the cases, and I must make the order as prayed." If he really said that, and thought that Hughes v. Mayre was an authority for holding that the lord could, as of right, call on the steward to hand over the rolls, I can only say that he was wrongly applying that decision. But I do not think that he intended to lay down so broad a principle. I think that what the Vice-Chancellor meant to decide was that, although a steward has for the purposes of his office a right to the custody of the rolls, if he has committed misconduct, the lord has a right as against him to say that he shall keep them no longer, but shall hand them over to himself.

The next decision is that of Windham v. Giubilei, by Bacon, V.C., and unless the judgment of Shadwell, V.C., in Rawes v. Rawes is understood as I have read it, these two cases appear to me to be irreconcilable the one with the other. In that case the lord was an infant, and the summons was by his guardian ad litem for an order to compel the steward to deliver up the court rolls of the manor to the receiver appointed in the suit. If there had been any such right in the lord as the broadness of the language of Shadwell, V.C., suggests, that order must have been made. The Vice-Chancellor says: "I think that this application is misconceived altogether. There is a steward of the manor validly appointed (as appears by the evidence which is uncontradicted), though not appointed by deed, and although his last appointment was made by General Windham, who, as is said, had only a limited estate, Sir William Forster is de facto the steward of the manor. Certain duties have to be discharged by him, for the neglect of which duties he is responsible to this court beyond a doubt, and perhaps to others. He cannot discharge those duties without the possession of the books, the court rolls, and so on mentioned in the first part of this summons, and no case has been suggested why he should be removed from his office. If any such case exists, or if it is thought expedient to remove him, that application must also contain a suggestion of who ought to be steward, because the court will not displace one steward without seeing that there is another to perform his functions. I do not agree with Mr. Everitt at all when he says that the receiver is the man who is to be steward of the manor or hold the manor courts. If there is a case to remove Sir William Forster from his office of steward, let that be properly brought forward in the proper way, and the court will know what to do with it; in the meantime the court rolls seem to be in the proper custody." That is, as against the lord who is seeking to have them delivered to him. "It is not suggested that any improper use will be made of them. The case does not bear the slightest resemblance to the case cited from the 7th of Simon's Reports, where the misconduct of the steward, or the qualification of the steward, formed a principal feature, though perhaps not the only reason for the decision there pronounced."

Having gone through the authorities, I desire to read a passage from Elton (p. 314): "With regard to the custody of the court rolls, the general rule seems to be that the steward is entitled to the possession of the court rolls, as he has certain duties to perform which he cannot properly discharge without possession of the rolls, and for the neglect of which he would be responsible. But as the lord is, in respect of the court rolls, 'a trustee and guardian of the evidence of the tenants' rights,' it seems that the steward is not entitled to hold the rolls as against the lord, and if there is proof of any misconduct on the part of the steward, the court will order the rolls to be delivered to the lord, but if there is no suggestion of misconduct, the courts will not deprive the steward of the custody."

I think that the steward has, for the purpose of the discharge of the duties of his office, a certain right to the court rolls—that is, to have possession of them for that purpose. He can be dispossessed of them if the lord shows that he is improperly using them. There is no suggestion in this case of any kind of misconduct on the part of the steward. I have no doubt that it is necessary for the purposes of the steward that the rolls should remain where they are.

The application fails, and I dismiss it with costs.

Solicitors, Long & Gardiner, for Crust, Todd, Mills, & Co., Beverley; Ullithorne, Currey, & Jennings.

---

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) — Jan. 16.

DUNN v. SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

County court—Practice—Costs—Money paid into court—Plaintiff recovering no more than amount paid in—Costs of particular issues—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 113.

Where money has been paid into court, and the plaintiff recovers no more than the amount paid in, the defendant is entitled to the general costs of the action, but the county court judge has the same power as a judge of the High Court to give the plaintiff the costs of any issue on which he has succeeded.

Appeal from his Honour Judge Lumley Smith, sitting at the Westminster County Court.

The appellant in this case had brought an action against the respondents for damages for negligence. At the original trial he was non-suited, as the judge held there was no evidence of negligence, but the Divisional Court ordered a new trial, and at the second trial he recovered the sum of £25. That being the sum paid into court, judgment was therefore entered for the defendants with costs.

The plaintiff then applied that he should have the costs of the issue of negligence, but the county court judge refused, on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to do so, though he would have exercised his discretion in favour of the plaintiff had it been in his power to do so.

By section 113 of the County Courts Act, 1888, it is provided as follows: "All the costs of any action or matter in the court not herein provided for shall be paid by or apportioned between the parties in such manner as the court shall think just, and in default of any special direction shall abide the event of the action or matter, and execution may issue for the recovery of any such costs in like manner as for any debt adjudged in the said court."

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Woodfin, for the appellant.—There is clear authority for saying that if this had been an action in the High Court the judge would have had power to award my client costs of the issue on which he succeeded (Wagstaffe v. Bentley, [1902] 1 K. B. 124, 50 W. R. Dig 135; Wheeler v. United Telephone Co., 33 W. R. 295, 13 Q. B. D. 597); and I submit there is no difference between the county court and the High Court in this respect. Section 113 of the County Courts Act, 1888, gives authority to the judge to deal with costs, and section 164 of the same Act shows that the High Court practice is to be followed where possible.

Mellor, for the respondent.—I admit that if this case had been a High Court case the judge would have had power to give the plaintiff the costs of the issue, but in the county court there are no pleadings, and therefore there are no issues to be tried separately.

Counsel referred to Wood v. Leetham, 61 L. J. Q. B. 215, 40 W. R. Dig. 64, and Bernard v. Greenwood, reported in note to Wheeler v. United Telephone Co.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is a case of some importance. That the county court judge has a general discretion over costs is shown by section 113 of the County Courts Act, 1888. That section provides as follows: [His lordship here read the section.] Dealing with the defendant paying money into court, section 107 of the Act directs as follows: "It shall be lawful for the defendant in any action or matter within such time as shall be prescribed to pay into court such sum of money as he shall think fit . . . but if the plaintiff shall recover no further sum in the action or matter than shall have been so paid in . . . he shall pay to the defendant the costs incurred by him in the said action or matter after such payment." It is clear, therefore, that the County Court Acts, and the rules framed under those Acts, contemplate the apportionment of costs by the judge, and it is also laid down by the County Courts Act, section 164, that the county court practice should as far as possible follow the High Court practice. Now it has been settled by a harmoniously consistent series of cases that, where the defendant has paid money into court, and the plaintiff recovers no more than the amount paid in, the defendant is entitled to the general costs of the action. I need only cite as an authority for that proposition the case of Wheeler v. United Telephone Co. But that the judge has also a discretion and can apportion the costs of particular issues is shown by the case of Wagstaffe v. Bentley. In the present case the learned county court judge said: "I should have awarded the costs of the issue of negligence to be paid by the defendant if in my opinion I had the power." In awarding the plaintiff those costs we are therefore only doing what the learned judge would have himself done. There is one other matter I wish to mention. When we on a former occasion sent back the case for a new trial we ordered the costs of the new trial to abide the event, but we did not make provision for the present contingency, and we did not intend to withdraw from the learned judge his discretion as to costs. That is, in my opinion, equally part of the event. The result is that, while the defendants get the general costs of the action, the plaintiff is entitled to have the costs of the issue on which he succeeded, that is to say—the issue of negligence.

WILLS, J., concurred.

CHANNELL, J.—I also concur in the judgment of my lord, and I only wish to add two observations—first, that in making the order that the defendants should pay the plaintiff's costs we are only exercising the judge's discretion in the way in which he himself would have exercised it; secondly, that the absence of pleadings does not prevent there being specific issues is shown by the case of Forster v. Farquhar, [1893] 1 Q. B. 564.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, H. C. Curtis.

Solicitor for the defendants, J. F. Watkin.

---

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) } Nov. 8; Dec. 18.

COVINGTON v. METROPOLITAN DISTRICT RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Taxation—Compensation under Lands Clauses Act—Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 52—Lands Clauses (Taxation of Costs) Act (58 & 59 Vict. c. 11), 1895—Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 78)—Ord. 65, r. 27 (25).

The Chancery taxing-masters have now, by virtue of their being amalgamated with the Central Taxing Office, under rules made in January, 1902, and passed pursuant to the Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879, all the powers previously possessed by masters of the Supreme Court.

Held, therefore, that a Chancery taxing-master was entitled to tax the costs of a compensation case under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845.

Owen v. London and North-Western Railway, 16 W. R. 125, L. R. 3 Q. B. 54, considered.

This was an appeal from the decision of Ridley, J., ordering a fresh taxation of costs on the ground that Master Spofforth, a Chancery taxing-master, had no power to tax the bill.

The facts of the case are set out in the judgment of Lord Alverstone, L.C.J.

Clayton, for the appellant.—The effect of the rules of January, 1902, was to give all masters jurisdiction over every class of business transacted in the Central Taxing Office. Master Spofforth was clearly entitled to tax the bill.

Courthope Munroe, for the respondent.—The Chancery masters have not been made masters of the Supreme Court, and the rules of January, 1902, do not overrule the express provisions of the Lands Clauses (Taxation of Costs) Act, 1895, which provide that costs in these cases shall be taxed before a master of the Supreme Court. The case of Owen v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 16 W. R. 125, L. R. 3 Q. B. 54, shows that the master in this case is a persona designata.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 18.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is an appeal from an order of Ridley, J., of the 24th of June, 1902, setting aside a taxation of costs by Master Spofforth and ordering that a new taxation should take place before a master of the King's Bench Division, upon the ground that Master Spofforth had no power to tax the bill.

The costs were incurred in an ordinary compensation case in respect of land taken by the Metropolitan District Railway from a person of the name of Covington.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By section 52 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, it was provided that the costs of any inquiry as to compensation before a jury should in the case of difference be settled by one of the masters of the Court of Queen's Bench.

By the Lands Clauses (Taxation of Costs) Act, 1895, it was provided that where under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, any question of disputed compensation has to be determined by the verdict of a jury or by arbitration the costs of and incidental to the inquiry or arbitration award shall, if either party so require, be taxed and settled as between the parties by one of the Masters of the Supreme Court.

The questions for our decision are whether under the authority of the Judicature Acts rules can be made empowering the old Chancery taxing-masters to tax costs in proceedings such as the present, and whether the rules made in January, 1902, are sufficient for that purpose. The Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879, established the Central Office.

Section 5 of that Act concentrated in and amalgamated with the Central Office, among others, the offices of the masters of the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer Divisions, and such other offices of the Supreme Court as might from time to time be amalgamated with the Central Office by the rules of court.

By section 6 (a) the existing masters of the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer Divisions were transferred to the Central Office, which was by section 7 placed under the control and superintendence of officers to be called masters of the Supreme Court of Judicature.

By section 6, sub-section 1 (b). the existing masters of the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer Divisions were to be among the first masters of the Supreme Court, and by section 9 provisions were made for the future appointments of such masters.

Sub-section (c) of section 6 provided that there should be transferred to the Central Office such other officers of and persons employed in the Supreme Court or the offices thereof as should be from time to time transferred to the Central Office by rules of court.

Sub-section 1 of section 12 provides that the business to be performed in the Central Office shall, subject to rules of court, comprise all the business performed in the offices by or in pursuance of that Act, amalgamated with the Central Office.

By sub-section 2 of the same section it was provided that the officers of the Central Office should be interchangeable and should be capable of performing and liable to perform the duties of each other in any department of the office, and generally should perform such duties and have such powers in relation to the business of the Supreme Court as might be directed by rules of court subject to the qualification that the duties required to be performed by any officer transferred to the Central Office by or in pursuance of the Act should, except so far as they were modified with his consent, be the same or analogous to those which he performed before being so transferred.

It is in our opinion clear that the provisions to which we have referred authorize the making of rules for the amalgamation with the Central Office of the office of the Chancery taxing-masters, and the transfer to the Central Office of the Chancery taxing-masters, they being undoubtedly officers of the Supreme Court within the meaning of sub-section (c) of section 6 of the Act of 1879.

The only remaining point requiring consideration is whether the new rules made in January, 1902, have empowered the old Chancery taxing-masters to perform the duties up to that time performed by the masters of the Supreme Court. That a rule which in terms said that the officers of the taxing department of the Central Office should tax those costs would be ultra vires, is, in our opinion, clear for the reasons we have given. It remains, therefore, only to consider whether the language of the present rules is sufficient to effect the same purpose.

Prior to the making of the rules of January, 1902, the proper person to tax costs under the Lands Clauses Act was, subsequent to the year 1879, a master of the Supreme Court, but his power to tax such costs did not depend upon section 52 of the Lands Clauses Act alone, but upon the rules of court made under the Judicature Acts, and particularly of those made under the Act of 1879 which established the Central Office: see ord. 60, r. 3, made in 1879, as it existed prior to the new rules of 1902. The authority for the masters of the Supreme Court to tax costs under the Lands Clauses Act was derived from the scheme which forms part of rule 1 of order 61, also made in 1879, under which the taxing department of the Central Office was charged with the duty of the taxation of costs in the Queen's Bench Division, except such costs as had theretofore been taxed in the Queen's Remembrancer's Office or the Crown Office.

Prior to the rules of 1902 the Chancery taxing-masters, who were undoubtedly officers of the Supreme Court, were not amalgamated with the Central Office, and it is for this reason that the language of paragraph 4 of the scheme in rule 1 of order 61 under the head "Taxing," which we have already quoted, was used until the amendment made by the rules of January, 1902. One of the objects of the new rules, 1902, was to meet the complaint of want of uniformity in taxations, and for this purpose it was determined to establish an amalgamated taxing department of the Central Office which should perform all the duties hitherto performed by the Chancery taxing-masters on the one hand and the masters of the Supreme Court on the other, and this object had to be effected, not by the preparation of a new and complete set of rules, but by alteration and amendment of the existing rules and orders under the powers of the Act of 1879. Accordingly rule 1 of January, 1902, was made, which provided that from the 11th of January, 1902, the Chancery taxing office should be amalgamated with and the Chancery taxing-masters transferred to the Central Office.

In order to give the officers of the new taxing office full power to deal with all taxations, paragraph 4 of the scheme contained in rule 1 of order 61 was amended by omitting the words which we have quoted, which limited the class of cases which should be dealt with in the taxing department. The scheme thus amended imposed upon the officers of the new department the taxation of all costs which had previously been taxed either by the Chancery taxing-masters or the masters of the Supreme Court. By rule 7, rule 18 of order 65, was amended in a way which shows that all the taxing officers of the amalgamated taxing department were to have powers to deal with all the business of that department.

By rule 10, regulation 29 of rule 27 of order 65 was repealed, and a new and very important rule as to taxing provided, and by rule 11 a very important addition was made to regulation 37 of rule 27 of order 65. Finally, by rule 14, rule 1 of order 71 was amended so as to make it appropriate to the newly-established taxing department.

We would also point out that the effect of these rules was to make all the taxing officers of the taxing department subject to the provisions of regulation 25 of rule 27 of order 65, and, in our opinion, to establish under the name of the Supreme Court Taxing Office one taxing department of the Central Office for the King's Bench and Chancery Divisions, and to make the Chancery taxing-masters and the masters of the Supreme Court officers of that taxing department, having each power to discharge the duties of taxations in all matters which had previously been performed by the Chancery taxing-masters and the masters of the Supreme Court respectively.

Rule 3 of order 60, relied upon by Mr. Courthope Munroe, has no bearing upon the point; it was consequential upon the provisions of the Act of 1879 and in no way inconsistent with the new rules.

It was contended before us that the case of Owen v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 16 W. R. 145, L. R. 3 Q. B. 54, was inconsistent with this view; we are clearly of opinion that that case has no bearing upon the point raised before us. All that it decided was that a master of the Queen's Bench was to be the final authority to settle the costs as between the parties, and has no bearing upon the question of power to make rules under the Judicature Acts imposing the duties previously performed by masters of the Queen's Bench upon other officers.

We are therefore of opinion that the rules as they now stand do confer upon old Chancery taxing-masters now transferred to the taxing department of the Central Office the power and the duty in common with the other taxing-masters of the taxing department of the Central Office of taxing costs in the proceedings in question.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the order of Ridley, J., of the 24th of June should be set aside, and the taxation by Master Spofforth should stand.

WILLS, J.—After the elaborate discussion contained in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice I have little to add, but I wish to express shortly in my own way how I have been led independently to the same conclusion.

Originally, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), s. 52, such costs as there were in question were to be taxed by one of the masters of the Court of Queen's Bench. Under the provisions of the Judicature Act, 1873, the masters of the Court of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer became masters of the respective divisions of the High Court named after their courts.

By the Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 78), s. 14, and the first part of the first schedule thereto the officers and masters in each of the three divisions were abolished and instead thereof the office of master of the Supreme Court was created and the then existing masters of the three divisions were made masters of the Supreme Court.

It is unnecessary to go through the ample provisions contained in that Act for the transfer to the masters of the Supreme Court of all the functions vested in and performed by the masters of the three divisions or to discuss the question whether the taxation of costs under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, was, by the force of that Act alone, transferred to the masters of the Supreme Court, because, by the Lands Clauses (Taxation of Costs) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 11), it was expressly provided that such costs shall be taxed by one of the masters of the Supreme Court.

The office of the Chancery taxing-masters was not by the Act of 1879 amalgamated, as were the offices of the masters of the common law division, with the Central Office, but by section 5 power was given to amalgamate by rules of court with the Central Office of the Supreme Court, and by rules of court of January, 1902, amongst other taxing offices of the Supreme Court amalgamated with the Central Office was the Chancery taxing office.

By section 12, sub-section 1, the business to be performed in the Central Office shall, subject to the rules of court, comprise all the business performed in the office by or in pursuance of this Act amalgamated with the Central Office, and shall be distributed among the several officers of the Central Office in such manner as may be directed by rules of court.

It seems to me quite impossible to deny that after the Act of 1895, at all events, the taxation of costs under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, was to be performed in the Central Office. I should have thought it pretty clear without the Act of 1895, but with it there can be no doubt. Such taxation prior to the Act of 1879 was business which was de facto performed in the office of the masters of the Queen's Bench Division, and nowhere else—and until the order of January, 1902, it was performed by one of the masters of the Supreme Court.

Section 12, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1879 provided that the several officers of the Central Office shall be interchangeable one with another, and shall be capable of performing and liable to perform the duties of each other in any department of the office, and generally shall perform such duties and have such powers in relation to the business of the Supreme Court as may be directed by rules of court, subject to this qualification, that without his consent no officer transferred to the Central Office shall be called upon to perform duties not either identical with or analogous to those which he performed before the transfer.

The first rule of January, 1902, which has been already alluded to in general terms, is as follows: "There shall be amalgamated with the Central Office the following offices—viz., the Chancery taxing office," and three other taxing offices unnecessary to enumerate.

The second rule provides that there shall be transferred to the Central Office the existing Chancery taxing-masters and others also unnecessary to enumerate.

Both of these rules are expected to be made in pursuance of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879.

The first rule is made under the powers of section 5, and the second under section 6, sub-section (c), of that Act. It is, I think, perfectly clear that after these two rules were made the taxation of such costs as now in question was amongst the different kinds of business capable of distribution by orders of court amongst the several officers of the Central Office (section 12, sub-section 1), and equally clear that the Chancery taxing-masters were amongst the officers made by sub-section 2 interchangeable with the masters of the Supreme Court, and capable of performing and liable to perform their duties, and I think that if nothing had been done there would be very strong ground for saying that the Chancery taxing-masters had jurisdiction (which is all that is in question here) to tax costs under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845.

But the matter did not rest here. It was felt obviously that it was desirable to bring the orders already cited into harmony with the Rules of the Supreme Court, and accordingly the second part of the rules of January, 1902, is headed Rules of the Supreme Court, January, 1902.

Up to that time the distributing of business in the Central Office had been regulated by order 61, rule 1, which established a department called Taxing Department, and the business assigned to it was "the taxation of costs in the Queen's Bench Division, except" certain costs unnecessary to enumerate (see clause 4 of the schedule), which forms part of the rule. By the new rule of January, 1902, for this limited description of the business assigned to the taxing department is substituted the taxation of costs, which I cannot doubt means all costs which could be dealt with in the Central Office, and provision is made in a subsequent rule (7) for the convenient arrangement of various clauses of taxation and giving power to the taxing-masters subsequent to any orders of a particular kind which might be made by the Lord Chancellor to regulate and distribute the business of the taxing department of the Central Office in such manner and order as they may deem expedient. There are two enactments under which, as it seems to me these orders are valid, one is sub-section 2 of section 12 of the Act of 1879, which empowers and requires the various officers of the Central Office to perform (interchangeably) such duties and gives them such powers in relation to the business of the Supreme Court as may be directed by rules of court. It seems to me the merest pedantry to say that the under the large words "the business of the Supreme Court" this class of taxation which could only be performed by one of the masters of that court and which was (when it had to be done) as much a part of his day's work as the hearing of summonses or anything else that he had to do as a master was not comprehended. It is true that it has been held that under section 52 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, it was held that he was what has been called a persona designata, and that that being so he and he alone could tax, and there was therefore no appeal from him as in the case of an ordinary taxation in one of the Supreme Courts. But he was the persona designata only because he was a master of the court and the taxation was undoubtedly performed in his office, and therefore after the Act of 1879 it was to be performed in the Central Office (section 12 sub-section 1). The Central Office was the "Central Office of the Supreme Court" (section 4), and how any part of the business to be performed in it can be excluded from the description of "business of the Supreme Court" I fail to understand. The general object and purview of the Act is to facilitate and improve the arrangement for the business transacted in the various offices of the court and, as it seems to me, requires that the widest meaning be given to such words of which they are reasonably capable, and surely it is no unreasonable latitude of interpretation to say that business which must be transacted by one and might be transacted by any one of the masters of the Supreme Court which was confided to him by the Lands Clauses Act only because he is a master of the court falls within the description of business of the Supreme Court.

It is perhaps worth while to note in passing that the expression in the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, that the costs shall be settled by a master of the Court of Queen's Bench is altered in the Lands Clauses (Taxation of Costs) Act, 1895, to "shall be taxed and settled" by a master of the Supreme Court; "taxation" has a definite legal meaning and was probably used in this Act with reference to the phrase in ord. 61, r. 1, as it then stood, "taxation" of costs in the Queen's Bench Division.

But the second part of the rules of January, 1902, so far as they touch the matter in question, have another sanction which as to the matter now in hand seems to me to be absolutely beyond doubt. The Judicature Act, 1875, s. 17, sub-section 3, gives power to make rules for regulating any matters relating to the duties of the officers of the Supreme Court. The conjoint effect of ord. 61, r. 1, and of the rule of January, 1902, is to direct that costs of every description shall be taxed in the taxing department of the Central Office and that the Chancery taxing-masters shall belong to that department, a perfectly valid regulation under section 17, sub-section 3, of the Act of 1875.

The process appears to me to be clear by which the power of taxing originally vested in a master of the Queen's Bench became vested in a master of Supreme Court and performed in the Central Office, by which the Chancery taxing-masters, if their office should become amalgamated with the Central Office, became themselves capable of being interchanged with the masters of the Supreme Court for all purposes of taxation, and by which they were in January, 1902, so amalgamated, and thenceforth capable of performing and liable to perform all the taxing business which was in fact performed in the Central Office, and in my opinion Mr. Spofforth, as one of the Chancery taxing-masters, had jurisdiction to tax in the present instance.

CHANNELL, J.—In this case I have had the opportunity of reading the judgments of the Lord Chief Justice and of my brother Wills, and I agree with them, but I wish to say that I have been more pressed than they appear to be with the difficulties arising from the decision in Owen v. London and North Western Railway. That case appears to me to decide that the settlement of costs under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, s. 52, were not made business of the Queen's Bench Court, which the masters transacted as officers of the court, but were entrusted to them outside their office, although so entrusted because they held that office. Whether we agree with that decision or not, it would, after it has stood for so many years, be wrong not to follow it now, and I think it would be equally wrong not to apply the same rule to the Act of 1895. It seems to me, therefore, that what we have to find is who are the persons who now come within the description of "masters of the Supreme Court" used in the Act of 1895. This expression cannot mean merely the persons who in 1895 filled the office, nor can it depend upon the title, for the title might be changed from time to time, and in fact officers performing any dissimilar duties have at various times in the history of our courts held the title of master. The expression "masters of the Supreme Court" in an Act of 1895 must therefore, I think, be construed to mean "the persons from time to time filling the office now known and described as master of the Supreme Court."

I think that although the Chancery taxing-masters have not had formally conferred on them the title of "masters of the Supreme Court," yet that the statutes and rules quoted in the judgments of my lord and my learned brother show that a Chancery taxing-master is now a person who fills the same office and performs the same duties as at the time of the passing of the Act of 1895 were filled and performed by the persons then known as masters of the Supreme Court, and consequently they must now be considered as a persona designata directed by the Act of 1895 to tax and settle these costs. I agree, therefore, with the judgments which have been delivered.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Stanley Evans & Co.

Solicitors for the respondent, Baxter & Co.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

K. B. Div. (Wright, J.) March 2, 9.

In re POLLARD.
Ex parte THE TRUSTEE. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Power of court to restrain proceedings in Chancery—Sequestration—Completion of execution—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 10, sub-section 2; s. 45.

The Court of Bankruptcy has power to restrain sequestration proceedings against a bankrupt in an action in the Chancery Division to which he is a party. Payment of a sum of money into court to the credit of the sequestrators' account in such proceedings is not equivalent to completion of an execution by the sequestrators within section 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

In re Hastings, Ex parte Brown, 9 Morr. 234, 41 W. R. Dig. 18, followed.

Motion by the trustee in the bankruptcy for a declaration that the sum of £98 9s. 9d. standing in the books of the Paymaster-General to the credit of the sequestrators' account in the action of In re Pollard, Pollard v. Pollard, in the Chancery Division, formed part of the property of the bankrupt divisible among his creditors; and for an order that the respondents B. Pollard and S R. Pollard be restrained from proceeding further under a writ of sequestration obtained by them in the said action, and dated the 20th of May, 1902, or from dealing with the said sum of £98 9s. 9d. otherwise than by procuring the same to be paid to the trustee; and for an order directing the respondents to take all steps necessary to procure the payment of the said sum to the trustee.

The bankrupt and his brothers, the respondents, were the executors of their mother's will. In 1900 the respondents began an administration action in the Chancery Division in which the bankrupt was the sole defendant.

On the 10th of March, 1902, an order was made in the action that the bankrupt was to bear two-thirds of the plaintiff's costs and to bring into court within seven days the sum of £136 13s. to meet such costs.

On the 18th of April, 1902, the bankrupt committed an act of bankruptcy by failure to comply with the terms of a bankruptcy notice.

On the 20th of May the respondents issued their writ of sequestration, and on the 5th of July an order was made thereon directing the London and County Bank to pay into court in the action to the ledger credit of the sequestrators' account, the sum of £137 7s. 5d. due from them to the bankrupt.

A petition was presented against the bankrupt on the 16th of July, and a receiving order was made thereon on the 6th of August. Upon that same day the London and County Bank complied with the order of the court by paying into court the sum of £98 9s. 9d., which was all the money of the bankrupt then in their possession.

The trustee claimed that sum from the respondents, and requested them to take out a summons in the Chancery action to determine the matter, but they refused to do so, and the trustee consequently brought the present motion.

E. W. Hansell, for the trustee.—The Court of Bankruptcy has the power, under section 10, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to restrain proceedings pending against the bankrupt in other courts. The trustee here is entitled to the money in court, as his title relates back to the 18th of April, and the sequestration proceedings were not begun until the 20th of May. The proceedings are not a protected transaction within section 49, as they are proceedings in invitum: Courage v O'Shea, 43 W. R. 232, [1895] 1 Ch. 325; Wild v. Southwood, 45 W. R. 224, [1897] 1 Q. B. 317. Nor is the order for payment of the money into court in the sequestration proceedings a completion of execution within section 45: In re Hastings, Ex parte Brown, 9 Morr. 234, 41 W. R. Dig. 18; Butler v. Wearing, 17 Q B. D. 182, 34 W. R. Dig. 17; In re Trehearne, Ex parte Ealing Local Board, 39 W. R. 116, 7 Morr. 261. Even if the payment of the money into court were equivalent to the receipt of the debt by the sequestrators, the execution was not complete before the date of the receiving order, because the money was only paid into court upon the day when the receiving order was made.

Muir Mackenzie, for the respondents.—The Court of Bankruptcy has no jurisdiction to restrain these proceedings in the Court of Chancery. That court has made the order for the payment of the money, and that court alone can deal with the money: Pelham v. Duchess of Newcastle, 3 Swans. 293. Further, the sequestration was completed upon the payment of the money into court: see Edwards on Execution, p. 268; Miller v. Huddleston, 31 W. R. 138, 22 Ch. D. 233.

Hansell, in reply.—It is quite clear from the cases of In re Hastings, Ex parte Brown, and Ex parte Hughes, In re Browne, 19 W. R. 771, L. R. 12 Eq. 137, that the Court of Bankruptcy has power to restrain sequestration proceedings in the Chancery Division.

WRIGHT, J.—In my view I cannot get over the decision in In re Hastings, Ex parte Brown, and it is not necessary for me to repeat what is said there. I will merely add that on the facts of this case, if there was an execution, it was not completed before the date of the receiving order. The receiving order was made on the 6th of August, and the money was paid into court on the same day; therefore the payment was not before the date of the receiving order. Taking the view which I do of the effect of In re Hastings, Ex parte Brown, I should be doing wrong to send this case to the Chancery Division. Moreover, in this case the trustee has a higher title than the bankrupt, which is an additional reason for keeping the matter in the Court of Bankruptcy, which clearly has jurisdiction to deal with it. There must be an order in the terms of the notice of motion.

Application allowed.

Solicitors for the trustee, Hicks, Arnold, & Mozley.

Solicitor for the respondents, S. R. Pollard.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CORRECTION.—In the report of Jared v. Clements, ante, at p. 401, 2nd column, lines 16 and 17, instead of the words "and he dismissed the action. The plaintiff appealed," read "and he gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed."

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) March 12, 13.

WATTS v. BUCKNALL. (a.)

Company—Prospectus—Omission of material contracts—"Knowingly issue"—Waiver clause—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 38.

The defendant, who was a director of a company, took part in issuing a prospectus inviting persons to subscribe for shares in the company. The prospectus did not disclose certain material contracts which had been entered into, as required by section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867. It, however, contained a clause stating that contracts relating to the formation and promotion of the company had been entered into, and that these "are or may be" contracts within the 38*th section of the Act, and that applicants for shares were to be deemed to have waived all claims against directors and others for the section not being more fully complied with. The defendant had actual knowledge of the existence of the undisclosed contracts, but not of their nature and effect, and was content to leave the statements of the prospectus to others without further inquiry. The plaintiff took shares upon the faith of the prospectus, but upon hearing of the undisclosed contracts brought an action against the defendant for compensati n.*

Held, that the defendant had "knowingly issued" the prospectus, and that, under the circumstances, his ignorance of the nature and effect of the undisclosed contracts was no answer to the action.

Held, also, that the waiver clause did not fairly disclose to an intending investor what it was that he should waive, and therefore did not protect the defendant from liability for non-disclosure of the contracts.

Judgment of Byrne, J. (ante, p. 44, [1902] 2 Ch. 628) affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Byrne, J. (reported ante, p. 44, [1902] 2 Ch. 628), in an action brought by a shareholder against a director for damages for noncompliance with section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867.

The facts were as follows:

In December, 1896, the Worcestershire Brewery and Malting Co. (Limited) was incorporated for the purpose of acquiring certain breweries, one of which breweries—viz., "Bucknall's Brewery," had belonged to the defendant Bucknall.

The defendant was one of the directors of the company, and took part in the preparation of the prospectus, which was issued in the same month—viz., December, 1896.

The prospectus gave (inter alia) particulars of the property to be purchased and the purchase price, and stated that the vendors ("who promote the company and have acquired the properties to resell at a profit") were to pay the whole of the expenses of formation and registration of the company, except certain stamp duties and legal charges, and that a contract for purchase had been entered into, being an agreement dated the 1st day of December, 1896, between E. S. Claremont (who represented the vendors) of the one part and H. Broadbridge as a trustee on behalf of the company of the other part, and that copies of the contract could be inspected at the office of the company by applicants for shares until allotment. It also contained the following clause:

"During the negotiations for the purchase of the properties and the formation of the company contracts have been entered into between various parties with reference to the formation and promotion of the company, and the subscription of its capital, but to none of which the company is a party. . . . The contracts referred to in this paragraph are, or may be, contracts within the meaning of the 38th section of the Companies Act, 1867, and accordingly applicants for shares are to be deemed to have notice of the said contracts, and to have agreed with the company (as trustee for the directors and other persons liable) to waive all claims, if any, against them for not more fully complying with the requirements of the said sections, and allotments will only be made upon this express condition."

The plaintiff, on the faith of this prospectus, applied for certain shares, which were duly allotted to him, and for which he paid £200. He subsequently discovered that prior to the issue of the prospectus there had been other contracts connected with the formation of the company, and which were material to intending shareholders, inasmuch as they showed that the value of the properties to be purchased by the company had been much exaggerated and so forth. Accordingly, in January, 1902, he commenced this action, alleging that the shares he had taken were of no value, and claiming a declaration that the defendant was liable to pay him compensation for his loss.

Byrne, J., decided in favour of the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

Levett, K.C., and Bremner, for the defendant, used the same arguments as in the court below.

Norton, K.C., and J. Ricardo, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J., in an action brought by a shareholder against a director under section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, and the question is whether there was before the learned judge evidence which justified him in holding, as a matter of fact, that all the provisions of section 38 were applicable to the case. Now, unless the learned judge has misconceived as a matter of law the operation of that section, this court will not readily differ from him, for he had certain advantages which we have not, in that he actually saw and heard the defendant as a witness, and was thus able to ascertain his knowledge and state of mind at the critical occasion—viz., the special meeting of the directors at which the prospectus was settled in the form in which it was issued to the public On that prospectus appeared these words: [His lordship read the clauses above quoted from the prospectus.] The defendant had himself been the owner of one of the three breweries which had been acquired and were to be taken over by the company, and subscriptions were asked for the purpose of carrying out the adventure of working the breweries. He knew that the company had somehow or other acquired these breweries. He knew that he himself had been the owner of one of them, and therefore it is fair to suppose that he must have known that the other two had been acquired by a contract or contracts. In addition to that, it is admitted that there were six other contracts dealing with the promotion and formation of the company. One of them has been produced to us and it may be taken as a sample of the others. It shows the amount at which the promoter had acquired one of the properties, and it also shows that he proposed to sell it at a large additional profit and to divide a portion of that profit with the vendor. This is a sample of the six contracts which, it is admitted, were not disclosed, contracts which unquestionably ought to have been disclosed in the prospectus, and which would render a director who did not disclose them liable under section 38 if he had knowledge of their existence.

(a.) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Now, the defendant, as I have said, attended a meeting of directors for the purpose of signing the prospectus. In that prospectus these contracts were not disclosed, neither those by which the breweries were acquired nor the other contracts, although they contained facts most material for subscribers to know. Are the conditions of section 38 applicable to the case? It is said that the defendant did not in fact know of the existence of the contracts, and, therefore, did not "knowingly issue" the prospectus within the meaning of the section. Now, what is the evidence as to the condition of his mind? He must have known, quite apart from the prospectus, and indeed he admits that he knew that these breweries were about to be sold. Then comes the information given to him by the prospectus itself in the waiver clause. It is important to observe that the words of that clause are not qualified, but in the indicative mood: "During the negotiations for the purchase of the properties contracts have been entered into between various parties with reference to the formation and promotion of the company and for the subscription of its capital." The defendant's own evidence is that he read the prospectus, but did not ask what the contracts were. He did know of the fact that contracts other than those disclosed did exist. This is the conclusion to which the learned judge, who heard and saw the defendant, came to, and in my opinion there is abundant evidence to justify this conclusion, and if such a finding had been arrived at by a jury it would have been perfectly hopeless to question it. I do not say that we stand in exactly the same position with reference to a finding of fact by the learned judge as we should in reference to a finding of fact by a jury, still no one can, by means of a shorthand note of evidence, be placed in exactly the same position as the judge who heard it given. That the defendant was ignorant of the legal aspect of the case, and that he knew nothing about section 38, is not improbable, but it is clear that ignorance of law does not shelter a director or any other person. If a person chooses to become the director of a company, he becomes liable to certain statutory obligations. He may be liable for a statutory fraud without any moral obliquity whatever. That is his misfortune. The Legislature deemed it right that this should be so, and though that section is now repealed it still governs the present case. It is idle to say that the defendant was honest. We are not imputing any dishonesty except statutory dishonesty. He cannot shelter himself under ignorance of law, or even by saying that he invited the opinion of someone else as to the law, and did not act for himself. It is enough to refer to the words of Cockburn, C.J., in Twycross v. Grant, 25 W. R. 701, 2 C. P. D. 469, at p. 541: "Next, was the prospectus issued by the defendants 'knowingly' within the meaning of the section. It was contended that the term 'knowingly' must be taken to mean with a knowledge that the contracts were such as the statute required to be referred to; consequently that, the jury having found that the mention of the contract was omitted from the prospectus from a bonâ fide belief that such mention was unnecessary, the contracts had not been knowingly omitted. But this is to misconceive the meaning of the term. 'Knowingly issuing' means neither more nor less than issuing with a knowledge of the existence of contracts within the section, and the intentional omission of them from the prospectus. Ignorance or mistake of the law cannot be admitted as an excuse for disobeying an Act of Parliament."

Then it is contended on the defendant's behalf that if the statement in the waiver clause is sufficient to show knowledge by the director, it must also be a sufficient notice to the intending shareholder. In my opinion this argument cannot be maintained. The director's position is different from that of the would-be purchaser of shares. He is under an absolute statutory obligation to disclose material contracts. The shareholder is under no statutory disability. If all the material contracts have not been brought home to him, the director who does not apprize him of those contracts must take the risk. The question is, whether the contracts have been set before him in such a way that a reasonable man would have understood the nature of them. The standard which must be applied to a would-be purchaser is not the same as that which regulates the duty of a director, but is quite different. In this prospectus the whole thing—[Here his lordship read the waiver clause]—is put forward in such a tentative way that an intending shareholder might be led to suppose that the persons who should best know about the matter thought that the contracts might be such as need not be set out in the prospectus. It is not a frank and fair avowal of the true nature of the contracts. In Cackett v. Keswick (ante, p. 69), [1902] 2 Ch. 456, at p. 477, Stirling, L.J., said: "When persons who issue a prospectus make statements in that prospectus with reference to the contracts in respect of which the benefit of the statute is to be excluded, they must be such as to be in all respects well founded in fact, and fairly to convey to the mind of the intending shareholder the nature of the contracts which have been excluded." And, in the same case in the court below, Farwell, J., said, 50 W. R., at p. 14, [1902] 2 Ch., at p. 468: "As I read the judgments in Greenwood v. Leather Shod Wheel Co., [1900] 1 Ch. 421, 48 W. R. Dig. 35, the decision, and the reasons given for it, involve the proposition that the statutory rights under the 38th section can be waived; that any waiver obtained by unfair dealing or trickery is void; that the person said to have waived must have sufficient information of what he was waiving; and that, apart from fraud, the same principles apply to waiver clauses as are applicable to ambiguous or misleading statements in conditions of sale or releases." I adopt those judgments. There is no logical fallacy whatever in saying that an intending purchaser of shares is not affected with the notice with which a director is affected. In the one case the bare knowledge of the fact is enough; in the other case there must be something more—there must be a fair explanation by the persons who do know to the persons who do not know of the nature of the contracts which are not disclosed. In my opinion, the decision of the learned judge was perfectly right and he has given a very clear statement of the law as to the operation of the waiver clause.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. The defendant when he issued the prospectus knew that there were in existence contracts between various parties "with reference to the formation and promotion of the company and the subscription of its capital." He knew that they were contracts which were or might be contracts within the meaning of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867. He had actual and not merely constructive knowledge of the existence of those contracts. They were, in fact, contracts most material to be set forth for the guidance of intending subscribers. Can the defendant, a director, be heard to say that he did not know of the existence of contracts which ought to have been specified under the provisions of section 38, merely because, knowing of their existence, he did not choose to look into and ascertain the contents of each document? In my opinion, clearly not. He cannot say he had no knowledge, but he chose to refrain from making any investigation. In my opinion he knowingly issued a prospectus within the meaning of section 38 which did not specify the dates of and the names of the parties to certain material contracts

But a second question arises. Had the plaintiff, who subscribed for shares on the faith of this prospectus, also notice of those contracts? In my view the notice of contracts which has to be given to an intending subscriber or which has to be possessed by an intending subscriber means notice not of the existence of contracts, but of their contents. Such notice the plaintiff clearly did not have. It follows that, in my opinion, the defendant falls under the liability imposed by section 38, and that the plaintiff must succeed in this action unless the defendant can avail himself of the waiver clause. In my opinion he cannot do that. The words in that clause, in a prospectus of this kind, amount to a representation by those who issue it that those who are in a position to know are so doubtful as to whether the contracts are material that they do not even know whether they can come within the provisions of section 38. This is clearly misleading and tricky, as regards the defendant. So far from his being able in good faith to make such a representation as was in substance made by this prospectus, his only excuse is that he did not take the trouble to investigate these contracts at all, or to see whether they were or were not material and ought to have been set forth in the interests and for the information of intending subscribers. It appears to me, therefore, that the defendant cannot rely upon this waiver clause, and, that being so, there is no other defence open to him, and accordingly he has, in my opinion, rightly been made liable at the suit of the plaintiff.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree, and I have very little to add. On looking at the prospectus it is apparent that the company was formed to purchase two distinct breweries and to amalgamate them. The company was also formed to acquire certain maltings and other houses not forming part of either of the breweries. Of the breweries one bore the name of Bucknall's Brewery, and had until shortly before the issue of the prospectus been the defendant's own brewery. He had sold it for between £40,000 and £50,000. This company was formed, as the prospectus states, to amalgamate all the breweries as going concerns, and to pay £440,000 for the whole. The prospectus, after stating, as the defendant must certainly have known, that the vendors who promoted the company had acquired these properties to resell at a profit, set forth one contract of purchase and one only—viz., the contract of the 1st of December, 1896.

Pausing there, it seems to me not to be open to doubt that the defendant must have known that contracts had been entered into by the promoters with the owners of the several properties. Not one of those contracts was disclosed in the prospectus. Moreover, there had been other contracts entered into with reference to the formation and promotion of the company and the underwriting of shares, and I am not at all clear that that paragraph in the prospectus really covers the preliminary contracts by the promoters for the purchase of the several properties, or whether, according to its true construction, it ought not to be limited to contracts with reference to the formation and promotion of the company as distinguished from contracts for the purchase by the promoters of the properties which they proposed to sell to the company at an enormous profit. At all events, I think we are entitled to read this clause very carefully and rather stringently as against those who put it in the prospectus. It seems to me that, quite apart from the waiver clause, the defendant must have known of the contracts for sale to the promoters, whether he did or did not know of the underwriting contracts and promoting contracts, and there is, I think, no fair statement that they are contracts which are intended to be excluded by the waiver clause. If, however, I am wrong, and those contracts do fall within the waiver clause, then for the reasons which have been stated by the Master of the Rolls and Romer, L.J., it seems to me impossible for the defendant to rely upon that clause. I desire to adopt entirely the language used by Farwell, J., and Romer and Stirling, L.JJ., in Cackett v. Keswick, and I doubt whether a waiver clause of this nature ought ever to be allowed to operate except upon such conditions as would enable the defendant to rely upon a release in general terms. I do not desire to repeat what has been said by the Master of the Rolls as to the different bearing and effect of statements in a waiver clause upon the director who issues the prospectus and on the person who applies for shares on the faith of the prospectus. But I think there is in this case ample evidence to justify the finding of the learned judge that the defendant did as a fact know that there were contracts which would come within section 38. He knew of the existence of contracts which, according to law, came within section 38, and he is in no way protected by the waiver clause.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co., for W. H Talbot, Kidderminster; Joseph Davis.

---

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) — March 3.

WREN v. HOLT. (a.)

Sale of goods—Warranty—Implied warranty—Purchase by description—Merchantable quality—Sale of beer by retail in public-house—Purchase in reliance on good name of particular beer—Beer containing arsenic—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), s. 14, sub-section 2.

The plaintiff was in the habit of drinking beer in the defendant's public-house, where H.'s beer was sold exclusively. Having been poisoned by arsenic contained in the beer, he brought an action for breach of an implied warranty on the sale of the beer that it was fit to drink. The jury found that the plaintiff did not buy the beer in reliance on the skill or judgment of the defendant, but because he preferred that particular beer and in reliance on the good name of H.'s beer.

Held, that, though there was no implied warranty

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

under sub-section 1 of section 14 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, there was an implied warranty under sub-section 2 that the beer was of merchantable quality; for on the finding of the jury the sale of the beer must be taken to have been a sale by description.

Appeal from the judgment of Wills, J., at the trial of an action with a jury at Manchester Assizes.

The action was brought to recover damages for breach of an implied warranty, on the sale of beer by the keeper of a public-house, that it was fit to drink.

The plaintiff was a builder's labourer residing at Blackburn.

The defendant was the keeper of a public-house at Blackburn, which belonged to the owners of a brewery called Holden's Brewery, and at which no beer was sold except beer brewed at Holden's Brewery.

The plaintiff had been in the habit of drinking beer daily at the defendant's public-house for twelve months before December, 1900, and in that month he was discovered to be suffering from the effects of arsenical poisoning.

The plaintiff alleged that the beer which he had bought from the defendant contained arsenic, and that his illness had resulted therefrom.

At the trial the plaintiff said that he knew that the defendant's public-house belonged to Holden's Brewery, and that he went there because he liked Holden's beer. It appeared from the evidence that, a number of cases of poisoning having occurred in the neighbourhood, an investigation was instituted, which resulted in the conclusion that the poisoning was caused by the presence of arsenic in beer, due to the use by several Lancashire brewers of invert sugar in the process of brewing. The arsenic could not have been discovered except by an examination by a skilled chemist specially directed to ascertaining whether or not arsenic was present in the beer.

Wills, J., left two questions to the jury—(1) Was the plaintiff made ill by arsenic in the beer? (2) Did the plaintiff buy the beer in reliance, for the good quality of the beer, on the skill or judgment of the defendant? The jury answered the first question in the affirmative. They also, in the first instance, answered the second question in the affirmative; but, after hearing observations from the learned judge, they gave the following answer to the second question: "No; because the evidence shows that he preferred that particular beer; he relied on the good name of Holden's beer." They assessed the damages at £50.

Wills, J., held that as the buyer did not rely on the seller's skill or judgment there was no implied warranty under section 14, sub-section 1, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, as to the quality or fitness for any particular purpose of the goods supplied. But he held that, apart from that sub-section, there was an implied warranty that the beer was fit to drink. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff for £50.

The defendant appealed.

E. Sutton, for the defendant.—There is no implied warranty on the sale of a specific article of food: Emmerton v. Matthews, 10 W. R. 346, 31 L. J. Ex. 139; Smith v. Baker, Son, & Death, 40 L. T. Rep 261, 27 W. R. Dig. 228. No distinction is to be drawn with regard to the rule of caveat emptor between the sale of an article of food and the sale of any other article. If the sale is of a specific article there is no implied warranty. This was established in Burnby v. Bollett, 16 M. & W. 644. Here the sale was of a specific article; the plaintiff in substance asked for a specific thing—viz., a glass of beer brewed at Holden's Brewery—and he was supplied with it. The case of a contract for a continuous supply of food of a particular quality—as, e.g., Ostend rabbits—is different: Beer v. Walker, 25 W. R. 880, 46 L. J. Q. B. 677. The law on the subject is now governed by section 14 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. No distinction is made in that section between articles of food and other articles. By sub-section 1 there is an implied warranty where the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment. The finding of the jury takes this case out of that sub-section. By sub-section 2, where goods are sold by description, there is an implied warranty that they are of merchantable quality. But that sub-section does not apply, for this was not a sale by description, neither was the beer unmerchantable within the meaning of the sub-section.

Bailhache, for the plaintiff.—According to the old law, there was an absolute liability on victuallers to sell sound victuals. This liability was undoubted, though it is not quite clear whether it depended on warranty or on the ground of "common nuisance": see per Lord Coke, 4 Inst. 261, and other authorities referred to in Burnby v. Bollett. Section 61 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, says that the rules of the common law, except so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of the Act, shall continue to apply to contracts for the sale of goods. At any rate there was a warranty in this case under section 14. Even if the finding of the jury prevents the case from coming within sub-section 1, it comes within sub-section 2. This was a sale by description, and the seller was therefore entitled to have a sound article. In Goulder v. Rook, 49 W. R 701, [1901] 2 K. B. 290, a case under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, the facts were similar to the facts in this case, and the public-house keeper was held liable.

E. Sutton, in reply.—Goulder v. Rook shows that the defendant was liable to a fine, but not that he is liable to an action for breach of warranty.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case Wills, J., directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiff. The question is whether on the findings of the jury he was right in so doing. In my opinion he was right; but the case requires careful consideration, and is not easy to deal with. The difficulty here is the difficulty which always arises when an attempt is made to enact an exhaustive code. However able the lawyers may be who drafted the code, when it comes to be applied to the innumerable variety of cases which must arise, we are sure to find cases which it is impossible to suppose were intended to be governed by the code—I mean, impossible to suppose so in fact. At the same time the code does purport to be exhaustive, and the court ought to try to deal with every case in accordance with the code.

The particular enactment which we have to deal with in this case is section 14 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, which is as follows: "Subject to the provisions of this Act and of any statute in that behalf, there is no implied warranty or condition as to the quality or fitness for any particular purpose of goods supplied under a contract of sale, except as follows." Primâ facie, in order to establish an implied warranty, you must have a case which falls within one or other of sub-sections 1, 2, or 3, which purport to set out the cases in which a warranty is to be implied. Sub-section 1 is as follows: "Where the buyer expressly or by implication makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required, so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment, and the goods are of a description which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose, provided that in the case of a contract for the sale of a specified article under its patent or trade name there is no implied condition as to its fitness for any particular purpose."

It seems to me to be difficult for us in the present case to find that there was any warranty within the terms of sub-section 1, because we have the finding of the jury, which they appear to have arrived at very reluctantly, that the buyer did not rely on the seller's skill or judgment. It would be an easy way out of the difficulty to say that there was no evidence on which the jury could properly arrive at that conclusion. But, speaking for myself, I am not prepared to say that. I will not state what conclusion I should have been inclined to have come to on the matter; but, so long as the answer of the jury to the second question stands, I think it is impossible to find that there was a warranty within the terms of sub-section 1.

Then comes sub-section 2: "Where goods are bought by description from a seller who deals in goods of that description (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be of merchantable quality; provided that, if the buyer has examined the goods, there shall be no implied condition as regards defects which such examination ought to have revealed."

This sub-section cannot apply unless goods are bought by description from a seller who deals in goods of that description. Speaking generally, I do not think that, according to the meaning of the expression "sale by description," as it is ordinarily used by lawyers and men of business, a sale of goods over the counter to a customer who asks for a commodity is a sale of goods by description.

But there is a peculiarity about this case because of the reason which the jury themselves gave for answering the second question in the negative. They were at first prepared to find, and said they found, that the plaintiff did rely on the skill and judgment of the defendant. But subsequently they abandoned that finding and substituted another, adopting a suggestion of Wills, J., which was that the plaintiff went to this house as a beerhouse kept for the purpose of the sale of this particular article—viz., Holden's beer, and that he asked the publican to supply him with beer of that description. It seems to me to be clear that the jury's reason for ultimately finding that the plaintiff did not rely on the skill or judgment of the defendant was this—they thought he did not rely on that because he asked for beer of a specified description. Therefore it seems to me that in this particular case the sale, though it was an ordinary sale of beer in a beerhouse, was, on the finding of the jury, a sale of beer by description. If so, it follows that, under sub-section 2, there was an implied condition that the goods should be of merchantable quality. This beer, by reason of the presence of arsenic in it, was, in my opinion, not of merchantable quality. The result is that, though the plaintiff fails to make out that there was any implied warranty or condition under sub-section 1, he is entitled to say that, in this particular case, beer was bought by description from a seller who dealt in goods of that description, and that—though the expression is not an apt one to use with regard to a sale of beer—the beer was not of a merchantable quality. He therefore succeeds under sub-section 2. I think judgment was rightly entered for the plaintiff, and the appeal must be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree that the case does not come within sub-section 1. I also agree that it is brought within sub-section 2. This beer, which was suffering from a defect which could not have been detected by examination, was sold by description—viz., as Holden's beer. It was therefore, under sub-section 2, impliedly warranted to be of merchantable quality, but by reason of the presence of arsenic in it it was not of merchantable quality.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am also of the same opinion. It is not necessary in this case to have recourse to section 61 of the Act, sub-section 2 of which says that "The rules of common law, including the law merchant, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of this Act . . . shall continue to apply to contracts for the sale of goods." For it seems to be quite plain that this case comes within section 14, sub-section 2. There certainly does appear to be a difficulty in saying that there was any implied warranty or condition under sub-section 1, owing to the finding of the jury on the second question put to them. I cannot help thinking that the jury felt themselves bound, after hearing the observations of the learned judge, to answer that question as they ultimately answered it.

However, I will assume that sub-section 1 does not apply. But when we come to sub-section 2, it seems to me to be impossible to get away from the plain language there used. I therefore agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, H. A. Sims, for John W. Shaw, Blackburn.

Solicitors for the defendant, Hindle & Son, Darwen.

---

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Feb. 25.

In re CALCOT PARK SETTLED ESTATES. (a.)

Settled land—Capital money—Improvement—Additions with a view to letting—Structural additions—Electric light installation—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 25—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 13 (ii.).

The word "additions" in section 13 (ii.) of the Settled Land Act, 1890, means structural additions.

The installation of electric light in a mansion-house, though necessary to enable the place to be let, is not an addition to the house within the meaning of the section, and therefore cannot be paid for out of capital moneys.

In re Freake's Settlement, 50 W. R. 237, [1902] 1 Ch. 97, overruled.

In re Gaskell's Settled Estates, 42 W. R. 219, [1894] 1 Ch. 485, and In re Clarke's Settlement Trusts, 50 W. R. 585, [1902] 2 Ch. 327, approved.

This was an appeal from a decision of Joyce, J.

A summons was taken out under the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, by Mr. Henry Barry Blagrave, the tenant for life of the Calcot Park and other estates in the county of Berks, settled by the will of the late Mr. John Henry Blagrave, asking that the sum of £1,307 10s. 2d. might be allowed to the applicant for the expenses incurred by him in providing electric light installation, including an engine or dynamo-house, for the mansion-house of Calcot Park.

Joyce, J., allowed the cost of the engine or dynamo-house, which stood at some distance from the mansion-house, but he held that by virtue of Buckley,

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

J.'s, decision in In re Clarke, 50 W. R. 585, [1902] 2 Ch. 327, electric lighting plant could not be considered an "improvement" which could be paid for out of capital moneys under the Settled Land Acts.

From this decision the tenant for life appealed.

The Settled Land Act, 1890, s. 13 (ii.) provides that "improvements authorized by the Act of 1882 shall include making any additions to or alterations in buildings reasonably necessary or proper to enable the same to be let."

Section 25 of the Act of 1882 states that the "improvements" authorized by the Act are "the making or execution on, or in connection with, and for the benefit of settled land" of any of the works mentioned in the section, "and any operation . . . necessary or proper for carrying into effect any of those purposes, and for securing the full benefit of any of those works or purposes."

Dibdin, K.C., and Errington, for the appellant.—Joyce, J., in an earlier case of In re Freake's Settlement, 50 W. R. 237, [1902] 1 Ch. 97, decided this point in our favour. In the present instance, however, he has followed the decision of Buckley, J., in In re Clarke, and refused our application. Buckley, J., in In re Clarke purported to follow the decision of Chitty, J., in In re Gaskell's Settled Estates, 42 W. R. 219, [1894] 1 Ch. 485. That decision, however, did not involve that an "addition" to be within section 13 (ii.) of the Act of 1890 must necessarily be structural. The learned judge there held that a heating apparatus was not necessary, but merely convenient, and accordingly declined to allow it. We submit that the installation of some system of lighting is necessary. Further, in that case the learned judge was influenced by section 25 (xiii.) of the Act of 1882, because he found there nothing analogous to a heating apparatus. That section, however, assists us, because, the engine-house having been allowed under section 13 (ii.) of the Act of 1890, we are entitled to the expenses of the installation under section 25 of the Act of 1882 as being necessary for securing the full benefit of the improvement which has been allowed.

Garnett, for the trustees.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Joyce, J. Although Mr. Dibdin does not admit it, it is virtually an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J., in the case of In re Clarke's Settlement. The question is whether a tenant for life is entitled out of the capital moneys to have paid for him the expense of an electric installation. His rights depend upon the Settled Land Acts, and if he has them they are, upon his admission, to be found only in section 13, clause (ii.) of the Act of 1890, coupled with section 25 of the principal Act of 1882. The words of clause (ii.) of section 13 of the Act of 1890 which come under the head of improvements are these, "making any additions to or alterations in buildings reasonably necessary or proper to enable the same to be let." That is supplemented by the last words of section 25 of the principal Act of 1882, "necessary or proper for carrying into effect any of those purposes or for securing the full benefit of any of those works or purposes," namely, those mentioned in the subsequent sub-sections. Mr. Dibdin's first argument is this. He says, "I have obtained from the learned judge the right to have built out of capital money a house for holding electric plant." Then he says, "Now that I have got that house I am entitled to say I cannot secure the full benefit of that house unless you allow me to put electric plant into it." In other words, he says that not only the electric plant for generating electricity, but also all that is necessary for the installation—that is to say, the wires, apart from the ornamental fittings, are accessories to the house in which they are put. That seems to be rather a reversal of the ordinary procedure on the part of the appellant, that having got leave to build the engine-house he is therefore entitled, at the expense of the capital, to fix the plant for an electric installation in the mansion-house. That argument cannot, in my opinion, be supported. If he has any case he might come in on the main argument that the electric plant is an addition to the building under the words of the Act which I have read. It really comes to this: Is an electric plant an addition to a building within the meaning of that section? Buckley, J., has decided that it is not. Joyce, J., in an earlier case, without giving any reason, allowed the expenditure out of capital, but in a subsequent case, having Buckley, J.'s, decision before him, he elected to follow Buckley, J. So that, so far as the courts below go, there is a decision of two judges that the addition of electric plant is not an addition to the building. For my own part I have great difficulty in differing from Buckley, J.'s, view, which was based not merely upon his own opinion, but upon an earlier decision of Chitty, J., in In re Gaskell's Settled Estates, where, although the words "structural addition" are not used, the learned judge seems to have considered that an addition to a building must be in its terms something in the nature of a structural addition. This view Buckley, J., adopted, although he says perfectly truly that the word "structural" is not used in the Act, and that the word "addition" is capable of a good many meanings But when you have an addition to a building it is difficult to imagine what addition there can be within this Act which does not involve a structural addition. Mr. Dibdin does not and cannot contend that something added to the building which is not attached to it, such as furniture and loose chattels, can be said to be additions to the building. But why not if his main argument is correct? If "addition" means something that adds to the amenities of the building, into what category are you to divide them? You can only get three gradations—namely, loose chattels which are not attached at all, fixtures which are attached in a certain sense, and actual structural additions. Which of those is meant? It seems to me that it would be very difficult to divide off any possible alternative short of an actual structural addition. Primâ facie "addition" seems to me to mean a structural addition to the building, and that is not satisfied by putting wires into a building or putting an engine into an engine-house. These do not seem to me to come within the sort of addition that is meant in this Act. I agree entirely with the observations of Buckley, J., as to electric plant, and of Chitty, J., as to heating apparatus. They completely cover this case, as it seems to me, and therefore this appeal fails.

ROMER, L.J.—I also agree with the reasoning and the decision of Chitty, J., in In re Gaskell's Settled Estates, and of Buckley, J., in In re Clarke's Settlement, and I think the principle of the decisions in those cases governs the present. The appellants are obliged to admit there is nothing in the Settled Land Acts which deals specifically with lighting either by electricity or by gas, and they are obliged to try to bring the installation of the electric lighting within section 13, clause (ii.) of the Act of 1890. Now, as to that, it certainly appears to me that when the Legislature in that clause speaks of an addition or an alteration in buildings, it is speaking of something which is in itself of the nature of a building. That being so, it appears to me clearly in the present case that even if the building itself, the dynamo-house, which may be described as additional, the cost of which has been allowed by the court below, comes within the clause, it cannot be said that the installation for the electric lighting also falls within the clause. I am bound to say that I cannot quite see how the learned judge in the court below came to allow the expense of the erection of the dynamo-house, seeing that, as far as I am aware, that house was some distance from the mansion-house. It is difficult to see at first sight how it could be said to be an addition to or an alteration in the mansion-house or any previously existing buildings, but that point is fortunately not before us.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I entirely agree. Like Romer, L.J., I at present entertain great doubt whether the expenditure of capital money in the construction of the dynamo-house, situate as I understand it is, can be brought within any head of the Settled Land Act, 1890, s. 13, clause (ii.). Certainly addition does not mean making any additional building to an estate, but is an addition to or alteration in existing buildings. However that may be, I think it is impossible to escape from the cogency of the reasoning of Buckley, J., in the case of In re Clarke. It may well be that it might be desirable to extend section 25, clause (xiii.) of the Act of 1882 so as to authorize the provision of electric light or gas, whether for lighting or power, on the same footing as the water supply, but that is a matter for the Legislature and not for us. We have in the Settled Land Acts a code which is exhaustive and complete, and it is idle simply to argue that an improvement will be beneficial, unless in the first instance you can bring it within one or more of the sub-sections of the Act. I think, therefore, the decision of the learned judge is quite right.

Solicitors, Bridges, Sawtell, & Co.

---

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Feb. 10, 11.

JARRAH TIMBER AND WOOD PAVING CORPORATION (LIMITED) v. SAMUEL. (a.)

Mortgage — Redemption action — Security for loan — Stipulation that mortgagee may purchase mortgaged security at fixed price within definite time—Clog on equity of redemption.

A stipulation in a mortgage that the mortgagee shall have the option to purchase the whole or any part of the mortgaged security at a fixed price within a definite time is invalid as a clog on the equity of redemption. The rule against clogging an equity of redemption, applies as much to a mortgage by a company of its debenture stock, as to other mortgages.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (50 W. R. 601, [1902] 2 Ch. 479), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported 50 W. R. 601, [1902] 2 Ch. 479).

The plaintiffs were a limited company incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900.

In the year 1901 the plaintiffs entered into negotiations with the defendant for a loan of £5,000.

On the 11th of June, 1901, the defendant wrote a letter to the secretary of the plaintiffs which, so far as material, was as follows: "With reference to various conversations I have recently had with Mr. Bateman, one of your directors, who is, I understand, authorized to negotiate a loan to your company upon the security of £30,000 of its first mortgage debenture stock, I request that you will be good enough to inform your board that I am willing to advance the company at 6 per cent. per annum the sum of £5,000 sterling forthwith against transfer to me of such stock as collateral security, subject to your directors electing my nominee upon the board, to my having the option to purchase the whole or any part of such stock at 40 per cent. at any time within twelve months, and, in the event of the company at any time hereafter electing to raise any further capital or to sell its undertaking by way of amalgamation or in any other manner, for shares or stocks in another company, to my having the refusal of underwriting, by way of guaranteeing the taking up of such new capital, shares, or stock at a commission of 10 per cent. thereon; the advances to become due and payable on thirty days' notice on either side."

On the 14th of June, 1901, the secretary to the plaintiff company wrote to the defendant accepting his offer.

The certificate for £30,000 first mortgage debenture stock was duly handed to the defendant, in exchange for the sum of £5,000, on the 15th of July, 1901, and the sum of £30,000 first mortgage debenture stock was duly transferred to the defendant.

On the 27th of February, 1902, the plaintiffs tendered the money due, together with interest for thirty days in lieu of notice.

The defendant insisted on having notice, and by a letter dated the same day he gave the plaintiffs notice of his intention to exercise his option to purchase the stock.

The plaintiffs thereupon commenced the present action, asking for a declaration that the option was void, and that they were entitled to redeem upon payment of £5,000 with interest at 6 per cent. per annum and thirty days' interest at the like rate in lieu of notice and costs, or alternatively were entitled to redeem the said debenture stock upon giving thirty days' notice.

The defendant, by way of counterclaim, asked for specific performance of the option to purchase.

Kekewich, J., held that the stipulation giving the defendant the option to purchase was void as being a clog upon the equity of redemption, and gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs.

The defendant appealed.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Manning, for the appellant.—This company could issue irredeemable debentures; it follows, therefore, that they could issue these debentures to the defendant subject to a clog on the equity of redemption in his favour.

They also relied on the arguments used in the court below, and referred to Carritt v. Bradley, 49 W. R. 593, [1901] 2 K. B. 550; Biggs v. Hoddinott, 47 W. R. 84, [1898] 2 Ch. 307; Browne v. Ryan, [1901] 2 Ir. R. 653; Noakes v. Rice, 50 W. R. 305, [1902] A. C. 24.

Warrington, K.C., and Martelli, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J., by which it has been held that a certain stipulation between a mortgagor and mortgagee of certain debentures was a clog on the equity of redemption. The contract is set out in the report of the case before Kekewich, J. (50 W. R. 601, [1902] 2 Ch. 479), and I will read that part of it which raises the question. [His lordship read the defendant's letter of the 11th of June, 1901, and continued:] The question arises whether the clause giving the mortgagee an option to purchase the stock at 40 per cent. at any time within twelve months does or does not constitute a clog on the equity of redemption. The plaintiff company say that it is a clog on the equity of redemption and therefore void, and that they are not bound. The learned judge in the court below has upheld that view. Now, we have had a very elaborate argument on behalf of the appellant, in which all the cases have been discussed, and it has been contended that that stipulation does not come within the meaning, as interpreted by the courts up to the House of Lords, of a clog upon the equity of redemption. In my opinion the learned judge was perfectly right in his decision, and it seems also to me to be, as he himself says, a clear case—that is to say, clearly on one side of the line. Whether it is an easy line to determine exactly or not, it seems to me that this case is clearly on that side of the line where a stipulation is held to constitute a clog on the equity of redemption. What is the effect of the present stipulation? It is that the plaintiff company on repaying the £5,000 debt will get back, not the thing which they mortgaged, unimpaired, unfettered, and free from conditions, but they will get it back with the superadded condition binding upon them, at all events to the extent of making them liable in damages if unperformed. It may also be—I do not decide the point—subject to other remedies against them if they do not perform the conditions. The plaintiff company will get back the mortgaged property subject to the condition of handing it back to the mortgagee if he carries out his engagement with them; or, if they do not hand it back to the mortgagee, paying damages to him for not doing so. On the authorities, aye or no is that a clog on the equity of redemption? I think clearly this case comes within the latest decision of the House of Lords upon this point (Noakes & Co: (Limited) v. Rice), and I simply refer to one passage from the speech of Lord Macnaghten, who states the principle thus (at p. 30 of [1902] A. C.): "Redemption is of the very nature and essence of a mortgage, as mortgages are regarded in equity. It is inherent in the thing itself. And it is, I think, as firmly settled now as it ever was in former times that equity will not permit any device or contrivance designed or calculated to prevent or impede redemption. It follows as a necessary consequence that, when the money secured by a mortgage of land is paid off, the land itself, and the owner of the land in the use and enjoyment of it, must be as free and unfettered to all intents and purposes as if the land had never been made the subject of the security." That is the statement of Lord Macnaghten of the principle which has been a good deal discussed, and which has been always accepted, though there has been some difficulty in some cases in applying it. Those cases have been discussed before us, and were also discussed in the House of Lords, and among the cases discussed is a very recent one decided in Ireland—viz., Browne v. Ryan, to which they gave special attention, and which received, certainly from a large majority of their Lordships, distinct expressions of assent. Therefore I look upon it as a help in forming an opinion on this matter, because what was there stated to be a clog on the equity of redemption was a personal contract by the mortgagor. I refer to a passage in the judgment of Andrews, J. ([1902] 2 I R, at p. 667), which seems to me to express most exactly what the nature of the fetter is where it is a contract imposing something upon the mortgagor himself not necessarily inhering in and being annexed to the res or thing itself offered as security. He says: "It is the right of a mortgagor on redemption, by reason of the very nature of a mortgage, to get back the subject of the mortgage (in the present case the mortgaged lands) to hold and enjoy as he was entitled to hold and enjoy it before the mortgage. If he is prevented from doing so, that which he is entitled to on redemption is prevented, and to constitute such prevention it is not necessary that the subject of the mortgage should be directly charged with whatever causes the prevention. If he is so prevented in fact the equity of redemption is affected by what, whether very aptly or not, has been always termed 'a clog.'" Then he proceeds to deal with the particular facts of that case, and says: "Now, how was Ryan's right of redemption affected under the agreement of the 21st of June, 1898? According to that agreement, if the mortgage debt should remain outstanding for twelve months, though the mortgage would be still a mortgage, his right on redemption to get back the mortgaged lands would be gone. It would be both prevented and annihilated; he was bound by the agreement to sell by auction within twelve months. If he redeemed within twelve months he would not get back the land to hold and enjoy it as he was entitled to do before the mortgage. He would get it back with a superadded obligation to sell it by auction within the twelve months, and in either case the agreement purported to bind him, in addition to paying the principal and interest of the mortgage debt, to pay Browne a further sum equal to £5 per cent. on what the land should be sold for, whether it was sold through Browne or not. This sum it now appears would be equal to more than 30 per cent. on his advance. Although it may be admitted that these obligations cannot be properly regarded as charges on the land, they would nevertheless directly and seriously affect the mortgagor with respect to the land and his rights in relation to it." That appears to me to be a very exact summary of the principle itself, and of the application of the principle to that case. If that is right, it seems to me to be on all fours with this case, because the effect here is that the plaintiff company find themselves under a contract in respect of the res which obliges them either to annihilate their equity of redemption by parting with it absolutely, or, at all events, obliges them to pay damages if they do not. If that is the true view of the present case, it seems to me to fall exactly within the principle which I have stated.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Lawrence has addressed a very ingenious argument to us; he said, assuming that this stipulation would be a clog on the equity of redemption in ordinary cases, yet, having regard to the special circumstances of the present case, this being a loan on the security of debenture stock, the rule of equity as to clogging the equity of redemption does not apply at all. This argument, as I understand it, comes to this: companies have a right to issue irredeemable debenture stock. It is true that the plaintiff company have not done so in this case. But, assuming that they have that right, they have also a right—if they choose to raise money on the security of that stock—to raise it on the terms that it shall be irredeemable. If they have that right, that involves the right to impose any clog on the equity of redemption—to impose any slighter fetter on the right to redeem—to impose any obligation slighter than the entire obligation which they have a right to impose—viz., that the debenture security shall never be redeemed at all. Without going into the question of whether it is competent or not for a company to issue irredeemable debenture stock, which is not, in my judgment, involved in the decision of this case at all, it seems to me that in this particular case it really cannot affect, and does not affect, the rights of the parties, whether or not such a power exists, because the subject-matter of this contract, the security offered, was not irredeemable debenture stock at all. It was debenture stock issued by the plaintiff company, which is redeemable under certain special conditions. That is the security itself. But the contract was really not the issue of debenture stock to a debenture stockholder, but was a mortgage of certain debenture stock as the consideration of an advance. It is a loan on security, and the security is the debenture stock. If it is a loan on security, it seems to me that there is nothing whatever to take it out of the ordinary rule of equity that that loan or security must be subject to the right to exercise the equity of redemption, and to get back the res unfettered, as I have already described. Therefore it seems to me that Mr. Lawrence's argument on that point fails. Whether the plaintiff company have a right to issue irredeemable securities or not, the particular security in this case was, I repeat, not irredeemable, and did not purport to be irredeemable. Therefore, whether the plaintiff company have the right to make it irredeemable or not, or to issue irredeemable debenture stock, does not affect the matter. We were also pressed with a judgment of Stirling, L.J., giving the considered judgment of the other division of the Court of Appeal in the case of Carritt v. Bradley. It was pointed out by Mr. Manning that in that case, as he contended, there remained a fetter analogous to the fetter in the present case, that that fetter remained upon the mortgage after redemption, but that the transaction was nevertheless treated as valid by the Court of Appeal. When, however, that case is examined, I do not think that the learned judge found anything of the sort. There a certain gentleman having a considerable interest in a company borrowed from a person who desired to act as the broker of the company and borrowed from him on the security of certain shares. He stipulated that he would do his best to secure the business of the company for that particular broker. But it was no part of the contract that he should not, if he redeemed, dispose of the shares at any time, and though the contract to do his best to employ the broker was held to extend beyond the period for redemption, there was also a stipulation that if the broker was not employed he should pay him the same commission that he would have got from the company if he was employed as broker. The learned judge, in giving the judgment of the court, held that the obligation did not affect the shares. He said it would have been just the same whether the loan was obtained on personal security or on the security of shares. The shares after redemption were precisely in the same condition as they were before redemption; there was no obligation whatever undertaken in respect of them. The mortgagor after redemption was at liberty to part with them, and, in fact, his rights in respect of them were absolutely unfettered after redemption. That was the ground of his decision. He pointed out that this particular obligation was not a clog, because, in his judgment, it did not affect the shares, and did not affect the mortgagor in his right to the shares. If the learned judge was right in that view, it is certainly not an authority against the decision which I am giving in the present case. It seems to me that it is not necessary to go through the authorities, which were all dealt with in the final decision of the House of Lords in Noakes & Co. (Limited) v. Rice. On these grounds I think the judgment of the learned judge in the court below was perfectly right and must be affirmed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The appellant's counsel discussed the question as to what was the true legal character, if I may venture so to describe it, of debenture stock issued by a company when the stock is irredeemable except on terms by the company. But it appears to me that any such question as that does not fall for our decision on the present appeal. Whatever the character of the debenture stock really is, treating it not as constituting a mortgage but as creating only a liability on the part of the plaintiff company to pay an annual sum which the plaintiff company is entitled to redeem on terms, yet, undoubtedly, in any point of view it creates a liability to pay money on the part of the plaintiff company, and is, in the case before us, secured on the plaintiff company's property. That being so, it is clear that, with regard to the transaction which is the subject of this appeal, it was one of loan by the defendant to the plaintiff company of £5,000, repayable at thirty days' notice on either side, charged upon £30,000 worth of debenture stock, and secured by the plaintiff company's mortgage. Whatever may be the nature of the debenture stock, I think that that transaction constituted a mortgage security in the ordinary sense, one to which the ordinary rules of equity applicable to mortgage securities apply. Now, one of those rules prevents the equity of redemption from being, as it is called, "clogged" or "fettered." It was boldly claimed on behalf of the appellant that because the mortgagors here were a limited company the rule as to clogging in cases of mortgages does not apply. The learned counsel could give no real reason in support of such a contention, and I need only say that it appears to me to be incapable of substantiation. I see no reason why a mortgage by a company should be in any different position from that of a mortgage by a private individual, so far as regards the clogging of the equity of redemption. Then, again, it was said on behalf of the appellant that the transaction between the plaintiff company and the defendant was, if properly looked at, really one by which the defendant purchased an option; that any reference there may have been in the memorandum of the transaction to a mortgage security was a mere small collateral matter, which might in substance be disregarded, and that the main object of the transaction was the purchase of the option. I will not pause to consider whether, even if that allegation could have been substantiated, the transaction, so far as regards the security—however minor in importance it may have been—could be freed from the rule as to clogging. To my mind it is clear, when the terms of the letter of the 11th of June, 1901, which formed the basis of the transaction between the parties, are looked at, the transaction was really in principle and substance a transaction between a mortgagor and a mortgagee, with certain collateral benefits stipulated for by the mortgagee as mortgagee and in no other capacity. That being so, it appears to me that the rule as to clogging is clearly applicable to such a security as we find here.

This question then arises: Has there been a clogging in fact within the purview of the rule? I think that there has been, having regard to the authorities, and particularly to the last authority in the House of Lords, which is a guide to us—viz., Noakes & Co. (Limited) v. Rice. I am satisfied on the construction of the letter of the 11th of June, 1901, that the twelve months' option there given to purchase the stock was not limited or intended to be limited to what I may call the redemption period—that is to say, it was intended to be exercised, and in terms was exercisable, even if during the twelve months the plaintiff company had paid off the principal, interest, and costs. On the terms of the contract, therefore, it is to my mind clear that, even if before the twelve months all that was really due on the mortgage security had been paid off, the clause with regard to the option still applied, and was intended to apply and to affect the stock which was the subject of the option. That being so, it is also clear on the face of the letter that the option given to the mortgagee purported directly to affect the mortgage security. It purported to give an option to the mortgagee to purchase "the whole or any part of such stock"—"such stock" clearly referring to the mortgage stock and to no other stock. It purported, therefore, to give power to the mortgagee in any point of view, to pay a sum of money to the plaintiff company on terms of getting a much larger sum of mortgage debenture stock, which, as I have said, was secured on the plaintiff company's property. That purports to bind and affect the mortgage security in the hands of the mortgagors, the plaintiff company, even after payment of principal, interest, and costs. It appears to me, therefore, clearly to fall within the principle to which I have referred, and is a clog on the equity of redemption. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that it ought not to be held a clog because the provision could not be specifically enforced. But even assuming that—I will not pause to consider whether such a provision could be enforced or not—the fact that it could not be specifically enforced does not in my opinion render that fettering clause good. That appears to me also to follow from what was said by the members of the House of Lords who took part in the decision in Noakes & Co (Limited) v. Rice, for Browne v. Ryan was there referred to and approved by all the noble lords except by Lord Lindley, who said: "I am not satisfied that the Court of Appeal in Ireland did not go too far in holding that the plaintiffs' action for damages could not be sustained." With that exception all the noble lords, as I gather from the report of the case, approved of the decision in Browne v. Ryan. Now, it is noticeable, when the facts of Browne v. Ryan are looked at, that the fettering clause there was one which could not have been specifically enforced. And in that case it was decided that the whole clause nevertheless was bad and could not be enforced by the mortgagee, even so far as a claim on it for damages for breach. It appears to me that in questions such as I am now considering we are bound to follow loyally the views expressed by so large a majority of the lords who decided the case of Noakes & Co. (Limited) v. Rice. That being so, it is clear to my mind that in the present case the clause which I have pointed out as a fettering clause or a clog on the equity of redemption is wholly bad, even though it might not have been capable of being specifically enforced. The principle really, as I understand it, which governs cases of this kind is that stated by Rigby, L.J., in Rice v. Noakes & Co. (Limited), in the report of the case in the Court of Appeal, where he said, at p. 457 of [1900] 2 Ch.: "The property which comes back to the mortgagor must not be worse than it was when it was mortgaged, and the mortgagee must not either expressly or by implication reserve to himself any hold upon the property after the time for redemption has arrived and the right of redemption has been put in force." Here this fettering clause purported to give, as I have pointed out, to the mortgagee a hold upon the property which falls within the mischief referred to by Rigby, L.J. I will only say further that with regard to the case of Carritt v. Bradley, as pointed out by Collins, M.R., the ground of the decision in that case clearly renders it no authority which affects our decision on this appeal. Carritt v. Bradley is clearly distinguishable. The governing principle in Carritt v. Bradley was that the stipulations which were there said to form a clog did not bind or really attempt to bind the shares which constituted the mortgage security. I therefore agree in thinking that this appeal fails, and should be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. In substance there is a mortgage transaction by which as part of the transaction itself the mortgagee stipulates that he may by his own act cease to be a mortgagee and become a purchaser. It was argued on behalf of the appellant that under the document in question no relief could have been obtained by way of specific performance, but he could only obtain damages. As at present advised I do not agree with that view. It seems to me that there are two periods which would have to be considered. The mortgagors could not redeem except on giving a thirty days' notice. The relation of mortgagor and mortgagee certainly subsisted until the expiration of the thirty days. If in that interval of time the mortgagee gave notice to exercise his option I do not as at present advised see that there could have been any answer at all to an action for specific performance of the agreement. It would have simply been a contract by the mortgagee to purchase the equity of redemption of the mortgaged property, and that—assuming there be no objection to the contract—is a contract of which the court would enforce specific performance. No doubt if the thirty days had elapsed and the mortgagors had got back the debenture stock certificate the case of South African Territories (Limited) v. Wallington, 46 W. R. 545, [1898] A. C. 309, would have applied. And it may well be, and I think would be, the case that the mortgagee could not then have claimed specific performance, as the remedy would have been in damages. But it is really not material to consider that distinction. If the former view as to specific performance is right, it seems to me that the decision of Hargraves, J., in In re Edwards' Estate, 11 Ir. R. Ch. Rep. 367, is directly and precisely in point. If the other view is right, then we have the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland in Brown v. Ryan, approved as it was by the House of Lords in Noakes & Co. (Limited) v. Rice, that it does not really matter, if the right to damages arises out of some contract directly relating to and purporting to affect the subject-matter of the mortgage. It has been said, however, and it has been strenuously argued, that all these doctrines have no application at all to the case of a company, that a company can give mortgages such as an ordinary individual cannot give, that a company can give an irredeemable mortgage, and that if it can give an irredeemable mortgage without any right of redemption at all, then it must of necessity be able to impose any sort of clog on the equity of redemption. In the view which I take it is not necessary to decide that point in the present case. The mortgage stock here was not irredeemable, and if irredeemable stock might have been issued, I cannot see that that would have any bearing on a transaction which was a separate and independent security given on stock of this nature. But as the matter has been mentioned, speaking only for myself, I desire to say that as at present advised, I think, in the language of Lord Macnaghten, "redemption is of the very nature and essence of a mortgage," and I fail to see how, apart from some statutory authority such as is given by the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1863, and subsequent statutes, there can be any right in a limited company to put itself in a different position and in a stronger position from that of any other owner of property dealt with by way of mortgage. I only state this in order that it may not hereafter be supposed that by silence I had acquiesced in the argument on behalf of the appellant.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Dale, Newman, & Hood; H. Percy Becher.

---

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Byrne, J. } Feb. 9, 10.

CLARK v. ROBINSON. (a.)

Contract—Vendor and purchaser—Contract in letters—Contract "subject to an agreement"—Reference to formal contract—Intention—Statute of Frauds.

In answer to an offer to purchase land for £275, the vendor accepted "subject to the conditions of sale and an agreement." At that time the property was subject to some incumbrances which the vendor had not yet removed, though he was trying so to do. The purchaser had apparently been allowed to go on the land, and had executed some repairs there, but the vendor had remained in occupation. The conditions of sale referred to were conditions used at an abortive auction at which the property had been offered for sale.

Held, on the facts, in an action by the purchaser for specific performance, that there was in this case no concluded contract.

Filby v. Hounsell, 45 W. R. 232, [1896] 2 Ch. 737, discussed.

This was an action for the specific performance of an alleged contract to sell certain copyhold land at Bishopwearmouth, in the county of Durham, the alleged contract being embodied in certain letters between G. Clark, deceased, of whose will the plaintiffs were executors and trustees, and one Campbell, acting as agent for the defendants. The defendants were the trustees of the will of a deceased testator who was owner of the land.

The plot of land in question was, with other land of greater area not belonging to the defendants, subject to a charge the amount of which in the aggregate greatly exceeded the amount of the price of the plot of land under the alleged contract.

The property had previously been offered for sale by auction, but the sale proved abortive, owing, as alleged by the defendants, to the existence of the above-mentioned incumbrance.

Negotiations with the incumbrancer were in progress for the payment off of the incumbrance, but had at the time of the alleged contract not been satisfactorily concluded. The parties then entered into negotiation for the purchase and sale of the property by private treaty, and a large number of letters passed between them.

On the 26th September, 1900, Mr. Campbell, who was one of the vendors, wrote to Clark saying: "In reference to the piece of land which you made an offer for at the auction, we have for certain reasons altered the matter, and we are now prepared to sell the plot for £50 cash and an annual ground-rent or interest of £12 18s. 4d."

On the 4th of October Clark replied: "I am not inclined to buy the piece of land referred to, subject to a ground-rent. I offered £250. I would not mind making the offer £275." After some further correspondence Clark finally refused to offer a larger sum, and on the 19th of October Campbell wrote: "I am sorry that you will not give more for the land, but I will accept it subject to the conditions of sale read at the auction and an agreement. Will you ask your solicitor to give me a call? I am communicating with the solicitor of the trust at York. I will have the agreement on Monday." Mr. Campbell appears to have put a stamp on the document, and he wrote across it "Accepted per letter of the 19th of October, 1900, J. W. Campbell as agent." Campbell also wrote to the solicitor to the effect that he had accepted an offer for £275 subject to the agreement and conditions of sale. Subsequently one of the purchasers went on the piece of land and did some repairs to some fencing. There was also a sub-letting of the land to one Wright. On the other hand, one of the alleged vendors who had lived with his mother in a house near the field stated that they had always been in possession.

The effect of the evidence is summarized in the judgment.

The main question between the parties was whether the said letter constituted a binding contract.

Norton, K.C., and G. F. Hart, for the plaintiffs.—The letters constitute a binding contract.

They cited the following cases: Crossley v. Maycock, 22 W. R. 387, L. R. 18 Eq. 180; Rossiter v. Miller, 26 W. R. 865, 3 A. C. 1124; Bolton v. Lambert, 37 W. R. 434, 41 Ch. D. 295; Jones v. Daniel, 42 W. R. 687, [1894] 2 Ch. 332; North v. Percival, 46 W. R. 552, [1898] 2 Ch. 128; Bonnewell v. Jenkins, 26 W. R. 294, 8 Ch. D. 70; Filby v. Hounsell, 45 W. R. 232, [1896] 2 Ch. 737.

J. M. Gover, for defendants.—The letters show only a preliminary agreement subject to and conditional on a further agreement being prepared incorporating the terms already arranged and any others not yet settled. The true principle applicable is that stated by Jessel, M.R., in Winn v. Bull, 26 W. R. 230, 7 Ch. D. 29, and quoted with approval in Fry on Specific Performance, at p. 241. The principle recognizes two classes of cases, and the present case falls clearly under the class first mentioned, so that the agreement was conditional and not final. [He cited the following cases: Harvey v. Barnard's Inn, 29 W. R. 922, 50 L. J. Ch. 750; Hawksworth v. Chaffey, 55 L. J. Ch. 335, 34 W. R. Dig. 41; Lloyd v. Nowell, 44 W. R. 43, [1895] 2 Ch. 744; Chinnock v. Ely, 13 W. R. 176, 4 De G. J. & S. 638; Honeymann v. Marryatt, 6 H. L. C. 112, 6 W. R. H. L. Dig. 21.] The present case may be distinguished from those quoted by the plaintiff on the ground that they fell under the second part of the above-mentioned principle.

Norton, K.C., in reply.—Filby v. Hounsell applies.

BYRNE, J. (after stating the facts).—The first question that arises in this case is whether or not there was a completed contract for the sale and purchase of this piece of land when the letter of the 19th of October, 1900, was written and received. The case has been extremely well argued on both sides, and the distinction between the two classes of cases has been referred to, and has been recognized on both sides. I cannot do better, I think, than read the passage from Fry on Specific Performance, section 511, which says, "The law upon this point has been summarized as follows by Jessel, M.R. It comes, therefore, to this, that where you have a proposal or agreement made in writing expressed to be subject to a formal contract being prepared, it means what it says; it is subject to and is dependent upon a formal contract being prepared. When it is not expressly stated to be subject to a formal contract, it becomes a question of construction, whether the parties intended that the terms agreed on should merely be put into form or whether they should be subject to a new agreement the terms of which are not expressed in detail." That is the citation of the judgment in Winn v. Bull. Then it goes on: "In that case accordingly a writing purporting to be a contract for a loan, but expressed to be made subject to the preparation and approval of a formal contract, was held not to be a concluded contract. 'If,' said Sir George Jessel in another case, 'there is a simple acceptance of an offer to purchase, accompanied by a statement that the acceptor desires that the arrangement should be put into some more formal terms, the mere reference to such a proposal will not prevent the court from enforcing the final agreement so arrived at. But if the agreement is made subject to certain conditions then specified or to be specified by the person making it, or by his solicitor, then, until those conditions are accepted, there is no final agreement such as the court will enforce." Now primâ facie, and subject to something I am going to say presently on the case of Filby v. Hounsell, on which counsel for the plaintiff relied, it appears to me this case falls within the class of cases where the terms are made conditional upon an agreement being executed. The words are "expressed to be subject to an agreement." I pause here a moment to mention a little of what took place. I need not go through the whole history of it, but, put shortly, it is this: The intending purchaser employed as solicitor Mr. Barker, and Mr. Barker never inquired whether there was a written agreement for sale or not. He says he assumed there was a proper contract. The difficulty on the title was pointed out at a very early stage, and an abstract was lent to Mr. Barker that he might look into it and see the difficulty arising on the title. There was a good deal of delay. Unfortunately the purchaser died, and his executors took the matter up. One of them, whose evidence I have heard, says that he thinks it was Mr. Barker who told them that there was an agreement. "I should have been," he says, "very glad if there was no agreement at all."

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Having heard all the evidence in the case, I am strongly disposed to think that what is suggested by the defendant is the true solution of much of the difficulty that has arisen in this case—viz., that the vendors thought throughout that there was no concluded contract; they meant to have an agreement as soon as they could get rid of the difficulty; they had arranged all the terms that were to be put into an agreement, but they did not seem to come to an agreement, and that is what they meant by "subject to an agreement." [His lordship proceeded to consider as to whether there had been any occupation or user of the land by the purchaser with the vendor's consent, and concluded that there had possibly been occupation upon the footing that there was not an agreement, and continued:]

Now the question comes up for determination, Was there a concluded agreement or not between the parties? Primâ facie there was no agreement, unless the plaintiff can so identify the words used "subject to an agreement" as meaning subject to the agreement on the form of agreement indorsed on the conditions of sale, in which case he might bring it within the authority on which he relies of Filby v. Hounsell. In Filby v. Hounsell property was put up for sale at a public auction with printed conditions and a memorandum indorsed, by which the purchaser acknowledged he had purchased the property for so much and agreed to complete the purchase according to the conditions of sale. The property was not sold at the auction, but subsequently, though on the same day G. C. Hounsell wrote to the auctioneers as follows: "To Frank Jolly & Co.—Dear Sirs,—I hereby offer the sum of £350 for No. 1, Kenmure-road, Hackney, lease about eighty-one years, ground-rent £8, and if my offer is accepted I will pay deposit and sign contract on the auction particulars." The reply to that is: "On behalf of our client we beg to accept your offer of £350 for the house, subject to contract as agreed. We enclose draft contract herewith," which was a copy of the agreement indorsed on the particulars, "and shall be glad to receive same signed, together with cheque for deposit, at your early convenience." The draft undertaking was never signed by Hounsell, but nevertheless the learned judge held that in that case the words "subject to contract as agreed," although at first sight they appeared to make the contract conditional, when carefully looked at, appeared to him to show that the acceptance was absolute and not conditional. His lordship says: "The offer stated in effect that if accepted the defendant would pay a deposit of £35 and sign the form of contract on the auction particulars. Now that form of contract was in writing and definitive in all its terms, and clearly identified by the offer. It left nothing to be agreed upon thereafter. The signing it was a form. The contract between the parties was complete on acceptance of the offer, whether the form on the auction particulars was signed or not." Now in the present case I have not got that identification, and it appears to me that I have not evidence which would justify me in saying that the parties meant that they would sign the agreement indorsed upon the conditions of sale. Under those circumstances I have come to the conclusion there was no concluded contract in this case, and the other matters that have been referred to really do not arise. It is an unfortunate case that there should have been such litigation. There has been a sub-sale apparently by the purchaser. I am afraid I cannot assist in any way. The action must be dismissed with costs.

Solicitors, Tufnell, Southgate, & Son, for A. A. Barker, Sunderland.

Ridsdale & Son, for George Crombie, York.

---

Chan. Div. Farwell, J. — Feb. 24; March 7.

In re JOHNSON.

ROBERTS v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL (a.)

Conflict of laws—Intestate—Domicil of origin—Domicil of choice—Distribution.

A testatrix, born in Malta, died in Baden, leaving part of her personal property undisposed of by her will. She was domiciled in Baden at the date of her will and up to her death, but was not naturalized there. According to the law of Baden the legal succession to the property which the testatrix had not disposed of by will was governed solely by the law of the country of which she was a subject at the time of her death.

Held, that the undisposed-of personal estate was to be distributed among the persons who would be entitled thereto according to Maltese law.

The testatrix, Mary Elizabeth Johnson, was born out of wedlock in Malta in 1810. Her father, Thomas Johnson, was a British subject and domiciled in England at the date of her birth. Her mother,

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Marianna Attard, was domiciled in Malta at her birth. They eventually married in 1815.

The testatrix left Malta about 1832 or 1833. She made a will which did not dispose of the whole of her property. She was at the date of her will and thenceforth down to her death, on the 25th of December, 1894, domiciled in Baden. She was not, however, naturalized in Baden; and "according to the law of Baden the legal succession to the property of the deceased of which she has not disposed by will is governed solely by the law of the country of which the testatrix was a subject at the time of her death."

This was the finding of fact in the master's certificate, and, there being no summons to vary, was binding on all parties.

On these facts the master submitted certain questions to the court which, in the opinion of Farwell, J., resolved themselves into this one question—according to what law were the rights of the persons claiming the undisposed-of personal estate of the testatrix to be determined?

The personal estate consisted entirely of personal property (movables), situate partly in Germany and partly in England.

Upjohn, K.C., and Daniel Jones, for plaintiff, the executor of the will.—According to the Baden law the distribution of the intestate's effects depends upon the law of the country of which she was a subject at her death. That must mean the law of England: Moorhouse v. Lord, 11 W. R. 637, 10 H. L. Cas. 272.

Butcher, K.C., and Austen-Cartmell, for the next-of-kin.—According to Maltese law the testatrix was born in Malta, and the law of Malta is applicable in this case: Abd-ul-Messih v. Farra, 13 App. Cas. 431, 36 W. R. Dig. 72; Udny v. Udny, L. R. 1 H. L Sc. & Div. App. 441, 17 W. R. H. L. Dig. 5; and Collier v. Rivaz, 2 Curt. 855.

R. J. Parker, for the Attorney-General.

FARWELL, J., stated the facts, and proceeded: Now, the rights of the parties claiming in an English court movables (and there is no question in this case of leaseholds or real estate) of an intestate, depend on the law of his domicil at the time of his death. It is a settled principle of English law that no one shall be without a domicil; everyone takes at birth the domicil of his father if he be legitimate, of his mother if illegitimate, and he may in later life acquire instead thereof a domicil of choice, but until he does so, or if he abandons his domicil of choice, his domicil of origin remains or revives. To quote Lord Watson in Abd-ul-Messih v. Farra, "Lord Westbury in Udny v. Udny said: 'Domicil of choice is a conclusion or inference which the law derives from the fact of a man fixing voluntarily his sole or chief residence in a particular place with an intention of continuing to reside there for an unlimited time.' According to English law, the conclusion or inference is that the man has thereby attracted to himself the municipal law of the territory in which he has voluntarily settled, so that it becomes the measure of his personal capacity upon which his majority or minority, his succession and testacy or intestacy, must depend."

But when I turn to the law of Baden, the municipal law of which, according to our law, the testatrix has attracted to herself, I find that the courts of Baden pay no heed to domicil. She was foreign to them in birth, and had done in her lifetime no act which their courts recognized as entitling her to be regarded as a person the succession to whose movables should be regulated by their law. According to their law, the succession to her movables is regulated by the country of which she was a subject at her death.

Now, I do not understand that anyone contends, and if they did it would be impossible for me to hold, that this results in circulus inextricabilis, an unending reference from one court to another: see La Revue de Droit International, vol. 30, p. 155, by M. Bartin. In my opinion the true view is this: the question, having arisen in an English court, primarily falls to be decided in accordance with the law administered by that court. That law distributes movables according to the domicil at the death, and according to that law every person must have a domicil somewhere or other, either of origin or of choice. When the court has ascertained that the domicil of origin has been displaced by domicil of choice, distribution of movables follows the domicil of choice.

But in order to establish a new domicil of choice the court has to be satisfied that it has been adopted animo et facto; it is essential that there should be both animus et factum. When, therefore, the law of the land said to be chosen as the new domicil, disregards domicil and declines to distribute in accordance therewith, or to treat it as of any force, there cannot have been any change of domicil de facto, and the case is accordingly remitted to this court as a case where the propositus has intended but has failed to obtain an effectual domicil of choice. No change is effectual unless the factum is proved, and the factum cannot exist in a country where the law refuses to recognize it. The result is that this court, finding that there has been no new domicil chosen, must conclude that a domicil of choice, ineffectual to create any rights and liabilities governing the distribution of movables in the country supposed to have been chosen, is for this purpose no domicil at all, and that the propositus therefore is left with his domicil of origin unaffected. The Baden court in effect disavows him, and disclaims jurisdiction. This appears to me to be the logical result of the application of our rules respecting domicil, and to be in accordance with justice. It is argued that the proper course is to remit the case again to the Baden courts, leaving them to say what their law would do with the movables of the propositus; but the only ground on which the question is referred to them at all is by reason of our law of domicil. When they have once rejected this they have rejected the propositus and all claim to direct the distribution of his movables altogether—he is a mere stranger within their gates. Why, then, should this court ask their assistance when the only ground for seeking it is repudiated by them? Take the converse case. Suppose that the Baden court is distributing the movables of an English subject whose domicil of birth is English, but who according to our law has acquired a domicil of choice in Baden, they would disregard the domicil altogether, and if they treat the question of English law as a matter of fact as we do, on which evidence must be adduced, they would distribute the movables in accordance with the domicil of origin of the propositus, exactly as I am proposing to do in the present case. If, on the other hand, they regard it as a question of their own law and not of fact, as M. Labbé appears to hold in regard to French law (see Journal du Droit International Privé, 1885, p. 5), and there is a conflict between their views and ours, I see no reason why in distributing movables under the jurisdiction of this court we should surrender our own law to their views of our law in order to secure uniformity. [The learned judge then referred to an American case of Hilton v. Guyot, quoted in Minor in Conflict of Laws, and proceeded:] I cannot think that I should have due regard to such rights if I were to abrogate our own ordinary rules simply for the sake of securing uniformity with the view taken of those rules by the courts of another country. If the movables of the same propositus are differently distributed amongst persons according as the court directing the distribution is in England or Baden, the reason is because the two systems of law are intrinsically different and can only be reconciled by international treaty: Story, Conflict of Laws, s. 28.

But in the particular matter with which I have to deal I do not think that any great divergence must necessarily result. It is not for me to say how the Baden courts would interpret their rule of distributing according to nationality. The one case in which an unavoidable conflict arises appears to me to be that of a native subject of Baden who has acquired a domicil of choice in England. I see no way to avoid this except by treaty. Nor do I think that the fact that in the converse case, such as is now before me, we distribute our own subject's movables in accordance with our law, although he would have acquired a Baden domicil, if it were possible, there is any breach of international comity, inasmuch as we make this distribution, not in disregard of, but in compliance with Baden law, which rejects the jurisdiction over the movables of the propositus that we offer it. [His lordship then referred to the cases of In re Brown-Séquard, 70 L. T. Rep. 811; The Forgo case, and the discussion thereon in Sewell on French Law Affecting British Subjects, 1897, p. 46, et. seq.; an article by M. Bartin in the Revue de Droit International, vol. 30, pp. 129, 272; articles by Herr Keedel and Signor Fiòre in the Journal du Droit International Privé, 1901, and the debate on the subject at the session of the Institut du Droit International held at Neuchatel in 1900, set out in the same volume.] I have given these treatises and Herr Bar's work the best consideration that I can, but I cannot find any such basis of authority on which to found any conclusion, and I gather that the disputants are urging their views of what ought to be, rather than stating their opinion of what is, the law. This is certainly the effect of the resolution at Neuchatel.

It was urged in argument that the finding in the certificate is that according to the law of Baden, movables are to be distributed according to the intention of the propositus. I have already given my reasons for holding that the Baden courts have really refused jurisdiction. But, even if this were not so, I should arrive at the same conclusion in a different way. When it is said that the Baden courts regard the nationality of the propositus, I apprehend that this means that they distribute according to the law of the nation to which the propositus belongs, or, in other words, of which he is a subject.

But the British Empire consists of a large number of states, countries and colonies, and differs from continental nations in that it does not impose its own laws wherever its sway extends, but admits many different systems of law within its bounds. There is no one uniform law of the Empire which can be taken for this purpose as the law of the nationality of the propositus. To what nationality, then, does the propositus belong, or of whom is he a subject? The only possible answer appears to me to be that he is a subject of the British Crown, and that his nationality is the British Empire; but inasmuch as there is no one law of the Empire to which the rule in question can refer, resort must be had to the law of England.

The first proposition seems to be clear; the propositus, whether born in England, Scotland, Canada, Cape Colony, or the Channel Islands, is a natural born subject of the Crown; and as Calvin's case, 7 Rep. 1, shows, the Crown is one and indivisible, and cannot be severed into as many distinct kingships as there are kingdoms. And even if it could, how is it possible to determine what is a distinct kingdom? Even if India or some of our great colonies could lay some claim to be so considered, how could the Isle of Man, or, indeed, Scotland, since the Act of Union? But to admit that either of these latter must be treated as one with England would let in all the inconveniences which have been pointed out in argument, and would, moreover, create an extraordinary anomaly. I base my opinion on principle and on considerations of policy and convenience. "Allegiance is the tie or ligamen which binds the subject to the king in return for that protection which the king affords the subject" (1 Bl. 354). As is said in Calvin's case—Protectio trahit subjectionem et subjectio protectionem. It is admitted that it is the same thing for this purpose to say that the propositus is the subject of X. as to say that he belongs to the nationality of X. I see no way in which the propositus can claim to belong to a separate part of the king's dominions as to a separate nationality without denying allegiance to the king as supreme over the whole empire as one empire. This point seems to me to be decided by Calvin's case. And consistently with this we find that when the East India Co. was abolished by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 106, it was enacted (section 2), "India shall be governed by and in the name of her Majesty." So, too, the sanction, either express or implied, of the Crown is required for the validity of all Acts of Colonial Legislatures: Dicey on the Law of the Constitution, p. 98. Turning from principle to policy and convenience, how is the foreign court to ascertain what law of what part of the British Empire is to apply? Foreign states are in diplomatic relation with this country as representing the whole empire. The only possible solution appears to me to be that foreign courts must necessarily refer such questions as these to, and decide them according to, the law of the country with which alone they are in diplomatic relation; and inasmuch as the law of England distributes such movables in accordance with the domicil of origin, substantial justice is done to all his Majesty's subjects. I conclude therefore that distribution according to the law of nationality means according to English law, but according to such law as applicable to the particular propositus, and not to Englishmen generally without regard to their domicil of origin.

The testatrix in this case is found by the certificate to have been born a subject of the British Crown, and to have had her domicil of origin in Malta. Her movables, therefore, will be distributed amongst the persons who would be entitled thereto according to Maltese law.

Solicitors for plaintiff, Hickson & Moir.

Solicitors for next-of-kin according to Maltese law, S. W. Johnson & Sons, for Adamson & Adamson, North Shields.

Solicitor for Attorney-General, Solicitor to the Treasury.

K. B. Div. (Bigham, J.) Dec. 10.

GREENOCK STEAMSHIP CO. (LIMITED) v. MARITIME INSURANCE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Voyage policy—Round voyage—Implied warranty of seaworthiness—Insufficiency of coal—Sacrifice of cargo and spars—Negligence clause—Breach of warranty covered by insurance.

Although the warranty of seaworthiness implied in a policy for a round voyage is that the ship is seaworthy for the whole voyage, the warranty, so far as the obligation of the shipowner to have on board a proper supply of coal is concerned, is sufficiently observed if the voyage is so arranged as that the vessel can and shall coal at convenient ports en route.

A policy of insurance for a round voyage contained the following clauses: "This insurance also to cover loss through the negligence of master, mariners, engineers, or pilots. . . . Held covered in case of any breach of warranty . . . at a premium to be hereafter arranged."

The vessel started on one of the stages of the voyage with an insufficient supply of coal to carry her to the next coaling place, in consequence of which it became necessary to sacrifice part of the cargo, spars, and fittings.

Held, that the starting of the vessel on a stage of the voyage with an insufficient quantity of coal was a breach of the implied warranty of seaworthiness on the part of the shipowner.

Held, also, that the right of the shipowner, under one of the above clauses, to call upon the underwriter to hold him covered in case of a breach of warranty could only be exercised by him on payment of a reasonable additional premium, and that in the present case such premium would exceed the amount of any loss that could be claimed by the shipowner.

Held, further, that the shipowner was not entitled to recover under the negligence clause, because the loss was not due to any negligent act.

Action tried in the Commercial List.

This was an action brought by the owners of the steamship Gulf of Florida, against the defendant company on a policy of insurance dated the 19th of July, 1897.

The policy was for a round voyage to ports on the West Coast of South America and back to the United Kingdom or the Continent, and contained the following terms: "Against the risk of total loss only, but including collision clause, general average, and salvage charges. Perils insured against of the seas, &c. Subject to and including Gulf Line voyage clauses as annexed."

These clauses included the following: "This insurance also to cover loss through the negligence of master, mariners, engineers, or pilots. Including all risks incidental to steam navigation. General average salvage and special charges payable as per official foreign adjustment, if so made up, or per York-Antwerp Rules, 1890, if in accordance with the contract of affreightment. Held covered in case of any breach of warranty, deviation, and [or] any unprovided incidental risk or change of voyage, at a premium to be hereafter arranged. It shall be lawful to the assured, their factors, servants, and assigns, to sue, labour, and travel for, in, and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the said ship, &c., and any part thereof without prejudice to this insurance."

The case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts.

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On arrival at Montevideo The Gulf of Florida filled up her bunkers with coal, and left on the 18th of December with 562 tons of coal. Meeting with an accident on the same day, she put back to Montevideo.

On the 23rd of December she resumed the voyage, by this time having 542 tons in her bunkers, which was considered still sufficient to take her to St. Vincent, her next coaling place. On the voyage she encountered strong head winds and seas. The coal was found to be burning quickly; consequently on the 9th of January the speed was reduced. On the next and following days part of the cargo, fittings, and spars were used as fuel; but for this sacrifice the vessel would not have made St. Vincent unassisted. The quantity of coal when the ship left Montevideo both on the 18th of December and the 23rd of December was in fact insufficient for the passage to St. Vincent. The plaintiff company paid £662 1s. 11d. for the cargo, so used as fuel, to the consignees, and the value of the spars and fittings so sacrificed was £312 4s.

The plaintiffs claimed that they were entitled to the defendants' proportion of the value of the spars and fittings so sacrificed and of the sums paid for the cargo so sacrificed; and alternatively for their proportion of the value of the spars and fittings so sacrificed and of the ship's contribution in general average in respect of the burnt cargo. Further, they claimed that they were entitled to recover on the payment of an additional premium to be fixed by the court.

Carver, K.C., and Leck, for the plaintiffs.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Simey, for the defendants.

The following cases were cited: Thin v. Richards, 40 W. R. 617, [1892] 2 Q. B. 141; The Vortigern, 47 W. R. 437, [1899] P. 140.

Cur. adv. vult.

BIGHAM, J.—The main question in this case is whether, when The Gulf of Florida sailed from Montevideo for St. Vincent on the 23rd of December, 1897, there existed an implied warranty on the part of the plaintiff that she was seaworthy for that voyage. It is found as a fact that she was insufficiently coaled, and this was clearly a breach of the warranty, if such a warranty existed.

Now, the policy sued upon is a voyage policy—the body of the policy and the attached clauses clearly show it, so that, when the vessel originally started from the United Kingdom on her round voyage, a warranty existed that she was seaworthy for that round voyage. But the warranty is one thing and the observance of it is another. It is clear that in such an adventure it is practically impossible for the ship to sail with sufficient coal for the whole of the contemplated voyage. She would have to call at convenient ports on her route for the purpose of replenishing her bunkers, and therefore though the warranty at starting is that she shall be seaworthy for the whole voyage, the warranty is sufficiently observed if the voyage is so arranged as that the ship can and shall coal at convenient ports en route. The warranty may be stated as an undertaking that the vessel shall be sufficiently coaled for the whole of her voyage, the warranty to be observed by coaling sufficiently at successive points to navigate the vessel to the end of her voyage. This, I think, is the true effect of Thin v. Richards and of The Vortigern. There is, to use the language of Collins, L.J., a recurring obligation to bring the vessel up to the required standard at each stage. It is true that in both those cases the question arose between shipowner and cargo owner, and not between shipowner and underwriter. But this, in my opinion, makes no difference, and I am fortified in this view by the judgment of A. L. Smith, L.J., in The Vortigern. He there states the law as follows: "In my judgment, when a question of seaworthiness arises either between a steamship owner and his underwriter upon a voyage policy, or between a steamship owner and a cargo owner upon a contract of affreightment, and the underwriter or cargo owner establishes that the ship at the commencement of the voyage was not equipped with a sufficiency of coal for the whole of the contracted voyage, it lies upon the shipowner, in order to displace this defence, which is a good one, to prove that he had divided the voyage into stages for coaling purposes by reason of the necessity of the case, and that at the commencement of each stage the ship had on board a sufficiency of coal for that stage—in other words, was seaworthy for that stage. If he fails in this he fails in defeating the issue of unseaworthiness which primâ facie has been established against him. In each case it is a matter of proof as to where the necessity of the case requires that each stage should be, and I think that in the present case the necessity of coaling places at Colombo and Suez has been established." This view of the law does not in any way conflict with the well-known rule that once the warranty of seaworthiness for the whole voyage is complied with, the ship owner's obligation to the underwriter is at an end. It merely allows a convenient way of enabling the shipowner to fulfil his warranty—that is to say, to fulfil it by stages instead of once for all at the beginning of the risk. I therefore hold that the warranty of seaworthiness still existed at Montevideo, and was there broken. The result is, that when the vessel sailed from Montevideo the policy no longer attached to the risks insured against.

But there are other questions to consider. It is said that the breach was due to the negligence of the engineer, and that, therefore, the loss is covered by the negligence clause attached to the policy. This clause is one of a number of clauses introduced into the policy by the shipowners for their own benefit. It is in the following words: "This insurance also to cover loss through the negligence of master, mariners, engineers, or pilots. . . ." I do not think this clause has any application to the present case. The underwriters are are only responsible for losses which are directly attributable to the risks insured against. The loss in question—viz., the burning of the ship's fittings and spars—was not directly due to any negligent act at all. It was due to the voluntary act of those engaged in the navigation of the ship. The original negligence was no doubt a causa sine quâ non, but it was not a causa causans; therefore it cannot be taken into consideration. Moreover, as I have before stated, the loss did not happen until after the policy had ceased to attach.

The plaintiffs, however, relied upon another of the appended clauses as affording them a right to recover. The consideration of this clause presents more difficulty. It is as follows: "Held covered in case of any breach of warranty, deviation, and [or] any unprovided incidental risk or change of voyage, at a premium to be hereafter arranged." Now, undoubtedly the warranty of seaworthiness is far and away the most important of the few implied warranties which a shipowner enters into when he insures his ship, and I am satisfied that if proper effect is to be given to this clause it must be held to apply to that particular warranty. What, then, is the operation of the clause? In my opinion it entitles the shipowner, as soon as he discovers that the warranty has been broken, to require the underwriter to hold him covered. It also entitles the underwriter to exact a new premium commensurate with the added risk. But what is to happen if the breach is not discovered until a loss has occurred? I think even in that case the clause still holds good, and the only open question would be, What is a reasonable premium for the added risk? To answer this the parties must assume that the breach was known to them at the time it happened, and must ascertain what premium it would then have been reasonable to charge. If they cannot do it by agreement, they must have recourse to a court of law. It is like the case of goods sold at a reasonable, though an unnamed, price. The sale is good, but the price has to be ascertained, either by agreement or at law. In the present case the parties ask the court to fix this additional premium, and I am prepared to do it. What might an underwriter fairly require as a premium for insuring a steamer which starts on a voyage short of coal? One of the almost inevitable consequences of such a state of things is that some other fuel will have to be used during the voyage—cargo, or ships' fittings, or spars. Such a sacrifice will constitute a general average loss, for which the underwriter will be responsible to the shipowner. Would it be reasonable to require the underwriter to charge as premium a less sum than the amount of a so obviously probable loss? I think not, and indeed I think the underwriter would reasonably be entitled to charge more, for the short supply of coal would not merely bring about the general average loss I have mentioned (as it did in this very case) but would also materially increase the risk of a total loss of the vessel herself. Thus I come to the conclusion that the additional premium in this case ought to be at least equivalent to the average loss now claimed. It follows that the plaintiffs can recover nothing in this action, for the additional premium more than meets the loss claimed.

A question was argued before me as to whether the loss in question was a general average loss or gave rise to a larger claim on the part of the shipowner under the sue and labour clause. It is not material to consider this question, for even if the full value of the burnt goods could be recovered under the sue and labour clause, I should still be of opinion that the additional premium would exceed the amount of the claim; but I desire to say that in my opinion the sacrifice cannot be regarded as within the sue and labour clause. At most it is the subject-matter of general average. There must therefore be judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, Coote & Ball, for Adamson & Adamson, North Shields.

Solicitors for defendants, Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Batesons, Warr, & Wimshurst, Liverpool.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) And Chan. Div. (Buckley, J.) — Feb. 25; March 4; April 21, 22; May 5.

BERRY v. GAUKROGER. (a)

Inland revenue — Estate duty — Incidence — Settled property—Pecuniary and residuary legatees—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 8 (4), 9 (1) (5) (6), 14 (1).

In respect of property, of which the deceased was not competent to dispose, the scheme of the Finance Act, 1894, is to tax, not the interest which ceased with the death, but the property out of which the interest was enjoyed, and to make every person who takes property otherwise than through the executor liable to pay a proportionate part of the estate duty. Accordingly where property, real and personal, was left upon trust for conversion and to pay an annuity to the testator's widow for life, and after her death upon trust to pay legacies amounting to £9,000 and to divide the residue among persons named,

Held, by the Court of Appeal, reversing the decision of Buckley, J., that under section 8 (4) of the Finance Act, 1894, the estate duty, which became payable on the death of the widow (who died in 1900), should be borne rateably both by the pecuniary legatees and the residuary legatees; and, consequently, that the pecuniary legatees were not entitled to throw the entire duty upon the residue.

Adjourned summons.

This summons, which was taken out during the course of an administration action, raised the question of the incidence of estate duty as between legacies and residue.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment:

John Berry died on the 25th of August, 1869, having by his will, made the same day, after bequeathing certain legacies, devised and bequeathed his residuary real and personal estate to trustees, upon trust to convert and pay his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and the legacies before bequeathed, and to invest the residue, and out of the income to pay his wife an annuity of £500 a year, and to pay some other small annuities; and he directed that, after his wife's death, his trustees should hold the trust funds upon trust to pay thereout certain legacies, amounting in the aggregate to £9,000, and then to divide the residue amongst certain persons named.

An administration action was brought, and in the action a sum of Consols was carried over to the account of the widow's annuity.

The widow died on the 16th of November, 1900.

By an order dated the 12th of March, 1901, payment of the legacies was ordered, and inquiries were directed to ascertain the parties entitled to the residue.

Under section 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, estate duty became payable on the widow's death upon so much of the fund as represented proceeds of real estate of John Berry, in that it was settled property in which the deceased (the widow) had an interest ceasing on her death.

Having regard to section 21 (1) of the Finance Act, estate duty was not payable so far as the fund represented personal estate.

The proportion of the fund representing real estate was ascertained or taken to be twelve-seventeenths of the total amount.

The estate duty upon twelve-seventeenths of the £9,000, being the amount required to pay the legacies, was £223 14s. That had been paid. The legacy duty had also been paid. Payment had then been made to the legatees of the difference between their respective legacies and their respective proportions of the £223 14s. and of the legacy duty.

The pecuniary legatees of the £9,000 had thus borne the £223 14s., and, of course, also the legacy duty, in their legacies.

The present summons was an application on the part of the pecuniary legatees that they should, to the extent of £223 14s., be recouped out of the residue.

W. Baker, for the pecuniary legatees.

J. Austen-Cartmell, for the persons entitled to the residue.—The widow not having been competent to dispose of this fund, the executor is not, and every person taking any part of it is, accountable for the duty: section 8 (4). The property did not pass to the executor as such, and a rateable part of the duty is charged upon it: section 9 (1). The persons accountable under section 8 (4) are in the present case persons entitled to a sum charged on the property within section 14 (1). That section, therefore, applies, and its effect is to distribute the burden rateably between the pecuniary legatees and the persons entitled to the residue: In re Countess of Orford, 44 W. R. 383, [1896] 1 Ch. 257; In re Parker Jervis, 47 W. R. 147, [1898] 2 Ch. 643. This rule applies unless there is a contrary intention shown in the will: section 14 (1). Such a contrary intention is not shown by the direction to pay testamentary expenses. For the trustees, who under section 8 (4) are the persons primarily accountable for the duty, are accountable, not as executors, but as trustees; and testamentary expenses are expenses incurred by an executor in his executorial capacity; and it is absurd to say that the testator contemplated the payment of a duty imposed several years after his death: Sharp v. Lush, 27 W. R. 528, 10 Ch. D 468; In re Clemow, 48 W. R. 541, [1900] 2 Ch. 182; In re Treasure, 48 W. R. 696, [1900] 2 Ch. 648. In no case is estate duty payable in respect of real estate a testamentary expense: In re Jolley, 17 Times L. R. 244; In re Sharman, 49 W. R 555, [1901] 2 Ch. 280. The gift of legacies to persons named, with a residuary gift, is not an expression of a contrary intention: In re Countess of Orford; In re Power, 47 W. R. 183; In re Chisholm, [1902] 1 Ch. 457, 50 W. R. Dig. 4.

He also referred to In re Campbell, [1902] 1 K. B. 113, 50 W. R. Dig. 72; Earl Cowley v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 47 W. R. 525 [1899] A. C. 198; In re Webber, 44 W. R. 489, [1896] 1 Ch. 914; Wade v. Wade, 47 W. R. 43, [1898] 2 Ch. 276; and In re Duke of St. Albans, 49 W. R. 74, [1900] 2 Ch. 873.

W. Baker, in reply.—Section 14 (1) does not apply, because the pecuniary legacies were not a sum charged on the property. In any case there is an express provision to the contrary.

Cur. adv. vult.

BUCKLEY, J., after stating the facts, said: The question I have to determine upon this summons is whether the pecuniary legatees ought to bear that £223 14s., or whether that amount ought to be thrown upon the annuity fund or the portion of it representing real estate, so as that the residuary legatees and not these pecuniary legatees shall bear it. The solution of this question looks reasonably easy. The annuity fund is settled property within the Finance Act, 1894: In re Campbell. By section 9 (1) of the Finance Act the estate duty is a first charge on the property, and when the duty has been raised under this charge and paid, there remains to be administered a fund more than sufficient to pay the £9,000 legacies. In a due course of administration the legatees would receive their £9,000, less, of course, the legacy duty, and the balance would be paid to the residuary legatees; or, again, if the executor, under section 6 (2), or any of the parties accountable under section 8 (4), pays the duty, he will be entitled to a charge under section 9 (5) and (6); and, again, the duty being raised under this charge and paid, the balance will be administered as before between the pecuniary legatees and the residuary legatees. Or again, if the pecuniary legatees (who seem primâ facie to be persons to whom the property passes for a beneficial interest in possession on the death of the widow within section 8 (4)) themselves pay the duty, they would be entitled to the like charge under section 9 (6), and could recover it by virtue of that charge, and would thus not bear the duty themselves.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING and H. L. ORMISTON, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

But Mr. Cartmell, who appears for the residuary legatees, to whom and to whose intimate knowledge of this difficult Act I am indebted for a most valuable argument, contends that the pecuniary legatees of the £9,000 are, within section 14 (1), "persons entitled to a sum charged" on the property. It is thus necessary to determine what, upon the true construction of section 14 (1), is "a person entitled to a sum charged." In my opinion, that person is a person not included within the class of persons who, under section 8 (4), are accountable for the duty. I arrive at this conclusion upon the following grounds: First, if that person be so included, then section 14 (1) gives to every member of the class accountable under section 8 (4), except that person, a right to sue him, and gives him no similar right to sue any other member of that class—a construction which, in the absence of good reason to the contrary, seems highly improbable. Secondly, in section 14 (1) the person authorized and required to pay the estate duty is, I think, mentioned by way of contrast to the person entitled to the sum charged. Thirdly, if the person entitled to the sum charged is a member of the class accountable under section 8 (4), the following result ensues—namely, (a) if he pays the duty, then under section 9 (6) he will be entitled to a charge and can recover as against the property all that he has paid, and he in that case will bear nothing, for section 14 (1) does not enable a person who has not paid (which in this case would include all the other members of the class accountable) to recover against him; whereas (b) if another member of the class accountable pays the duty, then the person entitled to the sum charged can be rendered liable to pay his proportion, for under section 14 (1) the person who has paid can sue him. It is impossible to adopt a construction which would lead to so incongruous a result. And, fourthly, if the construction be adopted that the person entitled to the sum charged is not, within section 8 (4), a person accountable, then the whole matter falls into order. For, being excluded from section 8 (4), he pays nothing to the revenue, and the person liable to the revenue can recover under section 14 (1) the proper sum from him.

Section 14 (1), in my opinion, contemplates the case of persons who either are entitled to such a charge as, under section 7 (1) (a), is brought into account for the purpose of estimating the duty (say, a charge made by the testator in his lifetime in favour of the trustees of his daughter's marriage settlement) or persons who under the testator's disposition become entitled to capital sums, say to portions, or to annuities, say, rent-charges or annuities charged upon the testator's property. If the case of such persons be considered, I think it will be found that the construction at which I arrive works consistently so as to throw upon such persons the proper portion of the duty which they ought to bear.

I am therefore of opinion that the "person entitled to a sum charged" under section 14 (1) is in this Act excluded from the class of persons who in section 8 (4) are spoken of as being persons to whom property passes for a beneficial interest in possession.

It remains to determine what upon the above principles is the character borne by the £9,000 legacies in the present case. If A. bequeaths £100 to B. and his residue to C., it is impossible, I think, to say, or at any rate to say for the purposes of this Act, that B. is a person entitled to a charge. B. takes a fixed sum and C. takes what remains, but B. does not take by way of charge. B. is, I think, in that case a person who, within section 8 (4), takes a beneficial interest in possession. Next, suppose that A. dies before the Finance Act, having bequeathed his property to X. for life, and having given upon the death of X. £100 to B. and the residue to C. Upon the death of X., it seems to me that B. takes a beneficial interest in possession just as in the former case he took such an interest upon the death of A. The £9,000 legatees in this case, in my judgment, take beneficially in possession under section 8 (4), and are not persons entitled to a charge within section 14 (1).

Mr. Cartmell, however, refers to the decision of North, J., in In re Countess of Orford. That case is, I think, distinguishable. At [1896] 1 Ch. 263 the learned judge, after referring to the decision of Stirling, J., in In re Bourne, 41 W. R. 70, [1893] 1 Ch. 188, and pointing out that that was a decision in respect to the estate of a testator who was dealing with his own estate, goes on to say, "But the present case is quite different. It is not a case of dealing with a testator's own estate." The disposition with which North, J., had to deal was a disposition by way of exercise of a power. The case before me is a case of dealing with the testator's own estate.

For these reasons I think that the £223 14s. is not to be borne by the pecuniary legatees of the £9,000. They are entitled to receive payment of their legacies (the fund after payment of the estate duty being sufficient for the purpose), less, of course, the legacy duty.

The residuary legatees appealed.

J. Austen-Cartmell, for the residuary legatees.

W. Baker, for the pecuniary legatees.

The following additional cases were referred to: In re Maryon Wilson, 48 W. R. 338, [1900] 1 Ch. 565; In re Meyrick, Meyrick v. Hargreaves, 45 W. R. 120, [1897] 1 Ch. 99; In re Shaw, Tuckett v. Shaw, 43 W. R. 315, [1895] 1 Ch. 343; In re Croft, 40 W. R. 425, [1892] 1 Ch. 652; Moore v. Dixon, 29 W. R. 12, 15 Ch. D. 566; Trollope v. Routledge, 1 De G. J. & Sm. 662; Gray v. Gray, 44 W. R. 406, [1896] 1 Ch. 620; In re Bourne, 41 W. R. 70, [1893] 1 Ch. 188; Robertson v. Broadbent, 32 W. R. 205, 8 A. C. 812; and Bothamley v. Sherson, 23 W. R. 848, 20 Eq. 304.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 5.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I take the facts as stated in the judgment of Buckley, J., and I agree with him as to the question which we have to propose to ourselves — which is, whether the pecuniary legatees ought to bear the £223 14s., or whether that amount ought to be thrown upon the annuity fund, or the portion of it representing the real estate, so that the residuary legatees and not the pecuniary legatees shall bear it. It is to be recollected that the property, in respect of which the question of the incidence of estate duty arises in this case, is property of which the deceased was not competent to dispose, and that in respect of such property the scheme of the Act is to tax, not the interest which ceased with the death, but the property out of which the interest was enjoyed. Section 8 of the Finance Act provides for the collection of estate duty, and sub-section 4 of that section provides for cases in which property passes on the death of the deceased, and his executor is not accountable for the estate duty in respect of that property. Now, that is admittedly the present case. In such a case it is provided that "every person to whom any property so passes for any beneficial interest in possession, and also, to the extent of the property actually received or disposed of by him, every trustee, guardian, committee, or other person in whom any interest in the property so passing, or the management thereof is at any time vested, and every person in whom the same is vested in possession, by alienation or other derivative title, shall be accountable for the estate duty on the property." In my judgment each of the pecuniary legatees, and also the residuary legatees, all took upon the death of the testator a portion of the property for which his executor was not accountable, for a beneficial interest in possession, and as such became accountable for the duty, and therefore debtors to the Crown for the duty. In the present case I do not think it is necessary to decide whether each person taking a beneficial interest in possession became accountable for the duty on the whole £9,000, or only to the extent of his beneficial interest, but I am inclined to think only to the extent of his beneficial interest. By section 9, sub-section 5, any "person authorized, or required to pay the estate duty in respect of any property shall, for the purpose of paying the duty or raising the amount of the duty when already paid, have power" to raise the amount by sale or mortgage of the property. This sub-section applies to all property passing, whether "free property" of the testator or not. Sub-section 6 of section 9 provides that "a person having a limited interest in any property who pays the estate duty in respect of that property shall be entitled to the like charge, as if the estate duty in respect of that property had been raised by means of a mortgage to him." I agree with Buckley, J., that sub-section 6 would give this charge to any person accountable under section 8 (4). It was argued before Buckley, J., that section 14 (1) would enable a person accountable under section 8 (4) to recover an amount equal to the proper rateable part of the estate duty from persons to whom property passes for any beneficial interest in possession within the meaning of section 8 (4), as being persons entitled to a charge on such property. I suppose the argument was meant to apply to a case in which the person authorized or required to pay the estate duty had paid that duty on the whole sum out of which the interests in possession passed on the death of the deceased. I doubt, however, whether, even in such a case, the persons taking the interest in possession would fall within the words "the person entitled to any sum charged on such property." I will assume the negative for the purpose of my judgment; but, notwithstanding my agreement in most of the premises arrived at by Buckley, J., I cannot agree in his ultimate conclusion. It seems to me that the moment you find that under section 8 (4) every person to whom property (other that free property of the testator) passes for a beneficial interest in possession (which includes these pecuniary legatees) is accountable for the duty, be it on the whole fund or his portion of the fund, and therefore pro tanto a debtor to the Crown, the court ought in the due course of administration to take the whole duty out of the fund, and to deduct that duty rateably from the legacy of each legatee and from the residue alike. If this were not so, the ultimate incidence of the estate duty on the fund passing would depend upon the accident of which of the parties accountable was in fact called on to pay, or on the fact that no one was called on to pay, but that payment was left to be determined in due course of administration. It seems to me that the pecuniary legatees cannot relieve themselves of the burden of a rateable part of this duty unless they can show that, outside the Finance Act, there is something which entitles them to have, as against the residuary legatees, the amount of their legacies free of estate duty. Now, in the first place, it seems to me the whole scheme of the Finance Act, so far as it relates to property passing on the death of the deceased in respect of which his executor is not responsible for estate duty is to tax the property itself so passing, and to make the estate duty a first charge. The decision of North, J., in In re Countess of Orford, seems to me to be a distinct authority on the construction of the Finance Act, 1894, that in all cases where the duty becomes payable for which the executor is not made accountable by section 6 (1) the duty must be paid ultimately by the persons beneficially entitled in proportion to their shares, and it follows that the duty cannot be thrown wholly on the residue. North, J., although he thought section 14 supported the conclusion he was arriving at, nevertheless arrived at his judgment independently of section 14, and, I think, independently of the fact that in that case the funds were settled upon trust to invest in land. It was argued that the residuary legatees ought to bear the estate duty in this case by reason of the rule as between specific and residuary legatees laid down by Lord Selborne in Robertson v. Broadbent, 8 App. Cas. 812, and Bothamley v. Sherson, 20 Eq. 304, and it was said also that the estate duty was analogous to probate duty, and that the ultimate incidence of this estate duty ought to be determined as if it were probate duty, and the case of In re Bourne, and the judgment of Stirling, J., were cited in support of this contention. But I do not think that the observations of Stirling, J., are applicable to the present case, for it seems to me that estate duty in a case in which property passes on the death of the deceased, and his executor is not accountable for estate duty, is not analogous to probate duty, but rather to succession duty. Moreover, whatever may be the analogy, it seems to me that the scheme of the Finance Act in cases in which the "executor as such" is not accountable for estate duty, and in particular the terms of section 8 (4), making the person to whom such property passes for a "beneficial interest in possession" accountable, exclude the analogy of probate duty, and also any rule which governs the incidence of charges and costs between specific legatees and residuary legatees inter se.

ROMER, L.J.—I also think that the appeal must succeed. I quite agree that the onus is on the appellants to show that under the Finance Act of 1894 a rateable part of the estate duty is cast upon the pecuniary legacies payable out of the proceeds of sale of the realty. If the Act contained no provision to that effect, then the appellants, being only entitled to the residue of the proceeds, could not throw any part of the duty on the pecuniary legatees. On the other hand, if the Act does cast on the pecuniary legatees a proportionate part of the duty, there is nothing which would justify the court in holding that, as between the residuary and pecuniary legatees, the former must indemnify the latter against that proportionate part. I think that in cases like the present the Act does cast a rateable part of the duty on the pecuniary legatees. Section 8, sub-section 4, applies. In my opinion the pecuniary legacies are "property" which passed on the death of the annuitant to the legatees for a "beneficial interest in possession." And in this case the interest in possession is an absolute interest. In my view the word "property," which is used in different parts of this sub-section, does not in every part mean of necessity exactly the same property. I think the section has been expressly framed so as to make it elastic. For example, the words "any property" do not mean of necessity the whole of the property which passes on the death within the meaning of the phrase that opens the sub-section. In the present case I think the pecuniary legacies come within the words "any property," and, that being so, I think that under section 9 (1) the duty assessable as against these legacies became a first charge on the legacies as against the legatees. And, as above observed, I find nothing in the Act or the will which would justify the court in freeing the pecuniary legatees from this charge by making the residuary legatees idemnify them from it. In this view it becomes unnecessary for me to consider the effect of section 14 (1) of the Act. I may add that in my view, inasmuch as the pecuniary legatees became absolutely entitled to the legacies, they could under section 8 (4) be made liable by the Crown to pay, not all the duty on the whole proceeds of the realty, but only the duty chargeable as against the pecuniary legacies. On the other hand, though it is not necessary for me to determine the point, I incline to the view that not only the trustees of the whole fund, but also the beneficiaries who became entitled to the residue, could at the instance of the Crown have been made to pay the whole duty on the fund. But in that event there would have been, under the general law applicable to such cases, a right of adjustment and recoupment as between the residuary and pecuniary legatees by treating the whole duty as rateably payable by the residuary and pecuniary legatees. And, moreover (though, as above stated, it is not necessary for me to determine the point), I may add that section 9 (6) appears to me to allow the residuary legatees, paying the whole duty (they having only a limited interest in the fund regarded as a whole), to recoup themselves as to the part assessable against the pecuniary legatees by obtaining a charge which would rateably embrace the interest of the pecuniary legatees in the fund.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—In my opinion the judgment of Buckley, J., cannot be supported. It seems plain that the annuity fund was property passing on the death of the annuitant within the meaning of the Finance Act, and in so far as the annuity fund arose from the proceeds of sale of real property it was property in respect of which estate duty became payable, notwithstanding section 21 (1). The estate duty has been paid by the trustees, and the question is simply whether the legatees of the £9,000 are bound to contribute their rateable proportion of the estate duty, or whether the whole must be borne by the persons entitled to the residue of the fund. Before Buckley, J., the argument for the residuary legatees seems to have been rested mainly on section 14, sub-section 1, the legacies being treated as charged upon the fund, belonging to the residuary legatees, and the legatees being, therefore, bound to repay. I doubt whether this contention was well founded, but it is not in my view necessary to decide this, for I prefer to base my judgment upon section 8, sub-section 4. I think the legacies must be regarded as property which passed to the legatees for a beneficial interest in possession on death of the annuitant. If so, the legatees were accountable to the Crown for the estate duty. It is true that the Crown, having the right to demand the duty from other persons—namely, the trustees—have not proceeded against the legatees, but that, I think, can make no difference. It is an old and well-established principle of equity that when several persons are liable in respect of one and the same obligation the rights of the parties inter se are not affected by the circumstance that one of those persons has been called upon to discharge and has discharged the obligation. This right of contribution must, I think, prevail here, and although the money has been found out of the entire fund, it ought to be contributed rateably according to the beneficial interests in the fund, or. in other words, the legatees must bear their rateable proportion. This is, I think, exactly the sort of case contemplated by section 14, sub-section 1. The only other question is whether there is anything in the language of the will sufficient to exempt the legatees from this liability to contribute. I can find nothing in the use of the word "legacy" to justify this conclusion. The charge created by the Finance Act under section 9, sub-section 1, was, of course, not in contemplation by the testator, who died many years before the Finance Act. It is a fresh burden, and it must be borne rateably according to the beneficial interest of the parties in the fund.

Solicitors, James, Mellor, & Coleman, for Learoyd & Co., Halifax; Williamson, Hill, & Co., for England & Co., Halifax.

---

From Chan. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Feb 26.

QUICKE v. CHAPMAN (a.)

Easement — Light — Implied grant — Derogation from grant—Title of grantor to adjacent land—Leaseholds —Building agreement—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c 41), s. 6 (2) (4) (5).

A builder entered into an agreement under which he was to be at liberty to enter upon certain plots of land for the purpose of building houses thereon. On the completion of each house a lease of the premises was to be granted him, but nothing in the agreement was to operate as a demise of any part of the land. A house was built and a lease duly granted to the builder, who assigned it to the plaintiffs. The builder subsequently erected, under the terms of the agreement, another house on an adjoining plot of land which interfered with the lights of the plaintiffs' house.

Held, that, as the builder had no such interest in the adjacent land as would have enabled him at the time of the assignment to the plaintiffs to grant them an easement of light over it, no action could be maintained by the plaintiffs against him on the ground of derogation from the grant of light implied in the assignment to them.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

By an agreement dated the 29th of August, 1899, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England granted to W. G. Chapman, a builder, the right to enter upon a certain piece of land of about two acres situate on the north-west side of Stamford Brook-road, in the parish of Hammersmith, in the county of Middlesex, "for the purpose of carrying out the several works thereinafter agreed to be done by him, but for no other purpose whatsoever," amongst which purposes was the erection of private dwelling-houses in accordance with designs to be submitted to the commissioners, and within the times and in the manner therein set out. And the commissioners agreed, at the cost and request of a grantee, when and as any one or more of the dwelling-houses should be erected and completed, to demise such dwelling-house to the grantee or to such person as he should direct, each lease to be in a specified form. And the grantee agreed until leases had been granted of all the land to pay to the commissioners by way of rent for the land during the term of ninety-nine years the sum therein set out, deducting therefrom a proportion as the leases were granted, and also to pay all rates, taxes, and outgoings to be imposed on the premises, and to perform all covenants and agreements agreed to be inserted in the leases in like manner as he would be bound to do if such leases had been actually granted to him so far as the nature of the case would permit.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was also further provided that nothing therein contained should be deemed to operate as an actual demise to the grantee of the lands or any part thereof, or to create as between the grantee and the commissioners the relationship of tenant and landlord.

In accordance with this agreement Chapman built a house, No. 28, Stamford Brook-road, and on the 28th of March, 1901, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners granted to Chapman a lease of the house (in the form specified in the agreement) for a term of ninety-seven and a-half years from the 25th of March, 1901, at the rent and subject to the conditions therein set out, and (inter alia) subject to the following: "The lessors (their successors and assigns) shall at all times have power, without obtaining any consent from or making compensation to the lessee (his executors, administrators, and assigns), to deal as the said lessors may think fit with any of the lands and premises adjoining or opposite or near to the hereditaments hereby demised, and to erect or suffer to be erected on such adjoining, opposite, or neighbouring lands or premises any buildings whatsoever, whether such buildings shall or shall not affect or diminish the light or air which may now or at any time during the said term hereby granted be enjoyed by the said lessee or other the lessees, tenants, or occupiers of the hereditaments hereby demised or any part thereof."

This lease was registered by Chapman under the provisions of the Land Transfer Acts, 1875 and 1897, with possessory title, and on the 2nd of August, 1901, was transferred by him according to the provisions of the said Acts to J. N. Quicke and W. S. Barnes for the residue of the term, for the sum of £650.

At this date plans had been settled, and Chapman had commenced to build a house, subsequently known as No. 30, Stamford Brook-road, on land adjoining No. 28 under the provisions of the agreement of the 29th of August, 1899, but no lease of it had then been granted by the commissioners, nor was Chapman then entitled to demand one.

When Quicke and Barnes took their assignment this building did not interfere with the access of light to No. 28, but they were then aware that a house was to be erected at No. 30 larger and more expensive than other houses in the road. They did not, however, know its exact position, nor in what manner, if at all, it would interfere with their lights.

This house, when erected, interfered with the lights of No. 28, in consequence whereof Messrs. J. N. Quicke and W. S. Barnes brought this action against Chapman, alleging that in obstructing the access of light to No. 28 Chapman was derogating from his own grant to them, and claiming an injunction to restrain him from interfering with the access of light to their windows and damages.

The plaintiffs' house was at present in the occupation of a Mrs. Worsley.

Kekewich, J., held that Chapman's act was obnoxious to the maxim that a man shall not derogate from his own grant, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to compensation in damages.

Chapman appealed.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the appellant.

Warrington, K.C., and Mitchell, for the respondent.

The following cases were referred to in the course of the argument: Booth v. Alcock, 21 W. R. 743. L. R. 8 Ch. App. 663; Beddington v. Atlee, 35 W. R. 799, 35 Ch. D. 317; Pollard v. Gare, [1901] 1 Ch. 834, 49 W. R. Dig. 54; Birmingham Banking Co. v. Ross, 36 W. R. 914, 38 Ch. D. 295; Godwin v. Schweppes, 50 W. R. 409. [1902] 1 Ch. 926; Broomfield v. Williams, 45 W. R. 469, [1897] 1 Ch. 602; Day v. Singleton, 48 W. R. 18, [1899] 2 Ch. 320.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from Kekewich, J., in a case where the plaintiff claims against the defendant that the plaintiff is entitled by virtue of an implied grant, to light coming into certain windows upon a house which he acquired from the defendant. and he complains that the defendant has obstructed those lights. It is admitted here that the grant of lights is one to be implied out of the circumstances—that is to say, there is no express grant of light for any particular time made by the defendant to the plaintiff—and that any implication that there is has to be got out of the terms of the grant itself into which are read the terms of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. The provisions of the Conveyancing Act have been the subject of consideration in several cases, and the result of them all, I think, is stated very well in the judgment of Joyce, J., in Godwin v. Schweppes. [His lordship read the judgment from "There are no express words in any of the deeds" to the words "had then the power to grant."] Now it is said here that there is an implied grant of light. In order to found that implication it is not sufficient to show that the grantee got from the grantor a house with windows; he has made no way at all towards founding the implication by proof of that fact, because the implication which it is desired to set up is an implication that the grantor has granted a right of access of light over land of his own on to the land granted, and unless he is in a position to grant the passage of light over land of his own, there can be no implication at all. If the land adjoining the obstructed window does not belong to the grantor, the grantee does not found any basis for an implication of grant passing from the grantor. Therefore the solution of this case really lies in a true appreciation of what the basis of an implication of a grant of light is. As I have said, it must rest upon the facts ascertained as to what is the interest of the grantor in land, out of which interest he is supposed to make this grant of an easement, constituting his land the servient tenement. Has the plaintiff who complains here (and the onus is upon him, I think) shown that the person who he says has granted him this easement was himself in a position to grant it? What he does show is this, that the defendant here is the person who by an agreement with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners has a right to enter upon a certain tract of land which belongs to them, and which they have laid out for the purposes of a building scheme, and he undertakes an obligation to cover that land with houses upon certain plots laid out by them, according to plans to be approved by them and according to dimensions, the maximum and minimum limits of which are fixed for him by the terms of his bargain; and it is further provided that unless and until he has conformed to all the conditions imposed by them as to the building of the houses and the production of plans and the approval by the commissioners—unless and until he has completed in each case a house upon the particular plot—he is not entitled to and does not acquire any interest in the land—that is to say, he does not become a tenant. Then and then only is he entitled to take a lease—either through himself or his nominee. That is the whole extent of his interest in the land adjoining that on which the house of the plaintiff is built.

The defendant had completed the house now in the plaintiff's occupation and he had taken a lease of it in accordance with the printed form imposed upon him. He had taken the lease in his own name and from him the plaintiff bought that house.

Now where are we to get the foundation for an implication of a grant of light from the defendant to the plaintiff on the sale of this house? His interest in the adjoining land, as I have pointed out, was only that which he had under his agreement with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and unless that agreement enabled him to grant a passage of light and put him into a position to make that land servient to the extent of light passing over it, there could be no grant and no implication of it.

When you criticize the defendant's position in regard to this adjoining land, it seems to me quite obvious that he could not, if he would, have granted a right to the passage of light over this land. He himself had at most a sort of licence coupled with an interest in the land, which could not ripen into ownership until he had actually completed the building upon the land. In other words, he was not in a position to acquire a sufficient interest in the adjoining land to enable him to grant any right over it until he had, under the terms of his bargain with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, himself created an obstruction to the passage of light (I do not measure the amount of the obstruction at present) on the adjoining land, as he was bound to build houses, in this particular case, opposite the windows as to which the complaint is made. The agreement between him and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners did give him a certain margin of choice—that is to say, it rested with him to set the plans before the commissioners; but he was hampered there by certain conditions. But within those conditions I suppose he had a discretion as to the exact dimensions of the house he was going to submit for their approval. It is contended that, that being so, he had come under an obligation to only submit with reference to the adjoining plot of land a house that would in the least degree admissible interfere with the access of light in the plaintiff's house. There is certainly no contract imposing such an obligation on the defendant, and it can only be got out of the implication arising from the fact that the defendant had sold a house with windows in it to the plaintiff. When we look back to that implication to see what is the nature and extent of it, we can only get at it by introducing all the rights and obligations that the defendant had under the agreement with reference to the adjoining land; and the implication is to be measured in view of all those rights and obligations, and those rights and obligations embrace the one of tendering for approval the plans of a house to the full extent of that which is here in question.

Therefore, in limine, it seems to me the plaintiff's case fails, because when you examine the basis of the foundation, it negatives the possible inference of a grant of light to any larger extent than that compatible with the enjoyment and performance of all the rights and obligations contained in the building scheme. All those had to be performed. The inference of implication had to be measured on the footing that all those were performed. Therefore it seems to me that this case breaks down in its initial stage and it is not necessary to follow it further.

There was, in my judgment, under the particular circumstances of this case, no implication whatever of any right to light over the adjoining land—no implication of a grant made by a person who was in a position to make it, and therefore, there being no right to the access of light, of course there can be no claim for damages or injunction in respect of interference with it.

In my judgment this appeal must succeed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The learned judge in the court below has decided this case on the view that the defendant was in the position of a person who had covenanted not to build on the adjoining land. If the defendant had been in that position the judgment of the learned judge no doubt could have been supported, but as a matter of fact the defendant was not in that position. He had entered into no such covenant, express or implied, and indeed the learned counsel for the respondent felt obliged before us not to attempt to base their case on such a grant as that. They base their case on the doctrine that a grantor shall not derogate from his own grant, and they say that what the defendant has been doing was a breach of that doctrine so as to make him liable to the plaintiff in damages. The rules governing a grant of light are now well settled so far as they are relevant to the case before us. Even in a case where you do not find the word "lights" expressly mentioned, since the Conveyancing Act, 1881, you must treat each grant as if the word "lights" had been expressly mentioned. So that in that sense it has always since the Act to be taken that there is an express grant of lights. But that will carry us no further so far as concerns the question that we have now to consider, for on the face of the deed itself you cannot merely from the use of the word "lights" gather to what extent that word carries the grantee. There is nothing on the face of the deed itself which would enable you to say that the word "lights" implies any rights over adjacent land not conveyed. Of course the case is far different from the case where you find that a grantor purports expressly to grant a right of way over the adjoining land which he mentions. In that case he will be bound by what he has attempted to do whether he had a title to that adjoining land or not, and of course it is far different from a case where a grantor chooses to enter into an express covenant purporting to bind the adjacent land, by which covenant he may be bound whether at the time of the conveyance he has the title to that land or not. But otherwise what passes by the word "lights" is only a general right, and the extent of it has to be ascertained by the circumstances of the case existing at the date of the grant.

Now there are two things you have to inquire into in order to see whether there is a grant to be implied of light over the adjacent land. You must first inquire into the title with regard to that adjacent land to see whether the grantor has such an estate or interest in that adjacent land as will support an implied grant by him of the right of light over that land. You inquire into the title with that object. That inquiry is one purely as to title and has nothing to do with the question whether the grantee did or did not know at the time of the state of the title. For if he did not know at the time of the state of the title, still if he is claiming a right over the adjacent land he was bound to take such title as the grantor had. He is in no better position than he would have been if he had inquired into the title of the adjacent land. But there is more than that, in my opinion, which has to be inquired into in order to see what passed by implication by the use of the word "lights." In my opinion you are also entitled to inquire into the surrounding circumstances which are relevant to such a question as this—the circumstances affecting the two pieces of land, though this is not strictly a question of title and might not appear on the title at all if inquired into. The circumstances to be relevant must in my opinion have been known to both parties; but if they are known to both, although not strictly a question of title, in my opinion those circumstances also have to be considered in order to see whether there is any implied grant of a right of light over the adjacent land or not.

Now, applying those principles to the present case, it is perfectly clear to my mind that the plaintiff here has no case. In the first place, on the mere question of title to the adjacent land being looked into, that in itself negatives any possible implication of a grant by Mr. Chapman of a right of light over the adjacent land; and I need not go into the circumstances, for to my mind they are perfectly clear. But, further, I should like to say that, apart from the question of title, the other circumstances which are in evidence here, having regard to the findings on the question of fact on the part of the learned judge, in my opinion, would in themselves also be sufficient to negative the implication of a right of light being granted over the adjacent land. On both those grounds it appears to me that the plaintiff ought never to have succeeded, and the appeal must be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I have very little to add. I decline to imply a grant of light against a man who could not have made a grant of light over the adjoining land. The whole point seems to have been very clearly put by Bowen, L.J., in his judgment in the case of the Birmingham Bank v. Ross, where he points out that the obligation relied upon is not one which arises simply from the interpretation of the deed. It is a duty which arises from outside circumstances, having regard to the relation of grantor and grantee which the deed creates. Supposing you take the deed alone, no amount of construction could evolve from the deed itself the protection which the grantee desires. It does not appear from the deed whether the grantor had the power of giving the protection which is necessary for the enjoyment of that which he grants. It is only by looking outside the deed that you can see whether he had such a power of protection. Now looking here you find that the defendant had no more power to grant the right of light over the adjoining land than if it had been land altogether outside the building agreement, and over which he never had license, any right, or title whatsoever.

On this ground alone, without in any way differing from what my brother Romer has said on the other part of the case, I think it is quite clear that this appeal ought to succeed.

Solicitors, W. S. Barnes; J. E. Hetley.

---

From Chan. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Feb. 25.

In re APPLEBY.
WALKER v. LEVER.
WALKER v. NISBET. (a.)

Will—Construction—Rule against perpetuities—Void trust for sale—Intention of testator—Class ascertained with prescribed limit.

Effect will be given to the intention of a testator, which appears from his will, to benefit certain persons who can be ascertained within the rule against perpetuities even though he has directed his intention to be carried out by means of a trust for sale which is void as offending against the rule against perpetuities.

Decision of Byrne, J. (ante, p. 153), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J. (reported ante, p. 153).

R. Appleby by his will in 1848, having given his personalty, other than leaseholds, to trustees for sale and conversion and for investment as therein mentioned, and having given and devised his real and leasehold estates to his trustees, directed them to hold his real and leasehold estates and residuary personalty, and the stocks, funds, and securities of which the same might consist, upon certain trusts for his daughter Ann Skinner, the wife of J. H. Skinner, during her life. And after her death, in case she should leave J. H. Skinner, or any future husband, surviving her, to pay the rents and profits, interests, dividends, and income to J. H. Skinner, or such future husband, during his life, and subject to these trusts the real and residuary personal estates were after the death of Mrs. Skinner to be held upon certain trusts for her children, and in default of children (which event happened), after the decease of Mrs. Skinner and of any husband of hers, and of such failure of her children as aforesaid, the trustees were to sell the real and leasehold estates and hold the moneys to arise from the sale, and also the residuary personal estate, upon trust for certain persons and their children as therein mentioned, all of whom were ascertainable within the period allowed by law.

The testator died in 1854.

In the same year J. H. Skinner was appointed a trustee of the will together with the two trustees named in the will who had accepted the trust.

In 1873 these two other trustees died, leaving J. H. Skinner the sole trustee.

In 1875 two new trustees were appointed, who were the plaintiffs in the first summons.

Ann Skinner died in 1882 without ever having had a child.

J. H. Skinner died in 1899.

In February, 1899, the surviving trustee took out the first summons against the beneficiaries and persons claiming under them asking for an inquiry who were the persons then entitled and in what shares to the residuary estate.

Shortly afterwards one trustee, who was the legal personal representative of Mrs. Skinner, the sole next-of-kin of the testator, took out the second summons against the other trustee, who was appointed to represent the heir-at-law of the testator, and against all the persons claiming under the trust for sale, to have it declared that all the limitations after the death of J. H. Skinner were void for remoteness.

Byrne, J., held that the trust for sale was mere machinery, and that the equitable interest in the property went to the persons who would have taken them under the trust for sale if it had been valid.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff appealed.

Mulligan, K.C., and Waley, for the appellant.—Byrne, J., founded his decision on Goodier v. Johnson, 30 W. R. 449, 18 Ch. D. 441, and Goodier v. Edmunds, [1893] 3 Ch. 455, but those cases were very different from the present. This will shows no indication that any of the beneficiaries therein named are to have any interest at all in the land until it is sold, but the trust for sale is not to arise until the death of any future husband, and therefore offends against the rule against perpetuities. It is true that the class of persons to take is ascertained within the rule, and that they may elect to take the property as real estate, but that is not enough: they must also elect within the time to take the property as land. That event is not limited by the testator in his will, and consequently they might delay beyond the period before exercising that option. An indefinite option of this kind is bad. London and South-Western Railway v. Gomm, 30 W. R. 321, 620, 20 Ch. D. 562. The case of In re Daveron, 42 W. R. 24, [1893] 3 Ch. 421, really assists the appellant, because it shows that the beneficiaries who claim in a case like this must elect to take the property as land. Here there has been no election.

They referred to Dungannon v. Smith, 12 Cl. & F. 546; Wollaston v. King, 17 W. R. 641, L. R. 8 Eq. 165; and In re Harvey, Peek v. Savory, 39 Ch. D. 289, 37 W. R. Dig. 203.

Rowden, K.C., and R. Hughes; Norton, K.C., and Turner; Levett, K.C., and Potts; Younger, K.C., and MacSwinney; T. H. Carson, K.C., and Beddall; E. P. Hewitt and Douglas, for the respondents, were not called on to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—This question arises on construction, and the case before us is an appeal from Byrne, J. The testator directed in substance that the rents and profits of real estate should be received by certain persons in succession, his daughter or any husband or future husband of hers. I leave out the intermediate dispositions, which are not material, and on the death of the survivor there was to be a sale, and certain persons were named, or rather certain classes were named, who were to take the proceeds of sale. Now it turns out that the sale itself, being, according to his disposition, one that might take place beyond the limited period, on the question of perpetuity the trust for sale was undoubtedly bad; and the question is, what are the rights of the parties in view of that fact.

Byrne, J., has held that inasmuch as on the face of this will there is clear indication that a certain class ascertainable and ascertained within the proper period was intended by the testator to receive the rents and profits until the sale, and intended to have the proceeds after the sale, that was a clear indication on the part of the testator of an intention to dispose of that property to those persons, and that the sale if it has become impossible, as the parties say, was a mere piece of machinery, and that striking it out of the will does not affect the other rights of the parties in accordance with the intention of the testator. That is contested here by Mr. Mulligan, for he says it involves this: that there must be an election on the part of those beneficiaries, in view of the impossibility of sale, to take the property in the form of realty as it was irrespective of sale; and he says you cannot get that election or give effect to it unless you can get the election in fact. That really appears to me to be the only point that he makes upon the case.

It seems to me that the case is concluded by authority. We have what is called the dictum of the late Master of the Rolls, Sir George Jessel, in Goodier v. Johnson, and we have the decision of Stirling, J., in another case upon the same will, and the judgment of Chitty, J., in In re Daveron, which is in fact directly in point, and a decision on a matter upon which Stirling, J., gave an opinion but did not decide it. Chitty, J., says this in the case of In re Daveron, Bowen v. Churchill: "The will contains a general devise to the use of trustees which carries the reversion in fee; and the trusts which he declared are to pay this ground-rent of £70 so long as the lease shall run in certain proportions and to certain persons. I need not go through that part of the will, because there is no question in regard to the validity of this trust as declared. Now comes the question whether I can give effect to the testator's intention, seeing that he has directed a sale and his directions as to the sale are invalid. It is plain that the trust to sell and pay the proceeds to 'A' (a named person) confers an equity on 'A' and gives him the whole beneficial title which the testator is entitled to in fee simple. In equity 'A' is the beneficial owner and 'A' can come to the trustees and say: 'I desire you not to sell, but to convey the estate to me.' About that there is no question. It is equally plain that if there is a direction to sell and to pay the proceeds in shares to A., B., and C., then A., B., and C., are regarded in equity also as the owners of the estate. They can by the doctrine of election prevent any sale taking place, and if they all express their intention the trustees could lawfully convey the estate to them in the shares in which they were entitled to the purchase-money. The difference between the cases I have put of the proceeds going to one person or the proceeds going to several consists in this, that where there are several they must all concur to stop the sale. I mention these points to show how equity regards the substance of the matter and considers those beneficially entitled to the purchase-money as entitled to the estate itself. One other observation is material in regard to this point, which is, that where there is a trust for sale—a valid one, of course—and where there is no gift of intermediate rents, the persons who take the proceeds of sale being thus regarded as equitable owners of the estate unquestionably take the rent for the period during which the sale is postponed." Then he goes on to say: "I think it right to take the broader rather than the narrower view of the subject. I think the point made on behalf of the heir-at-law that the testator intended that the property should be taken in the shape of personalty and not in the shape of realty is insufficient to displace the conclusion at which I have arrived. The doctrine of election for the purpose of reconversion, which proceeds on the footing of the equitable property in the thing being vested in those that take the proceeds of sale, shows that the court does allow persons thus entitled to take the property as of a different quality to that which the testator intended; or, to put it quite shortly, where the testator intended that several persons should take a gift in money they may all concur in saying 'We will not take it in money but we will take it in land.'"

Now in this case there is a clear intention, it seems to me, on the will to benefit these particular persons who are ascertained; and that being the intention of the will, there is simply the failure of a piece of machinery which if it had been effectual might have enabled them to take it in a different shape. As it is the intention stands; it is unaffected by the failure of the power of sale, and the persons entitled to the property take it in the form in which it now is without going through the process of sale. For these reasons I think the appeal fails.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. I think the principle which governs the decisions of In re Daveron and Goodier v. Edmunds, and which had been previously indicated by Sir George Jessel in Goodier v. Johnson, was a right principle and, when applied as it ought to be in the case before us, governs this appeal.

I take the will in the present case, and I look at it, disregarding in the first instance any question as to perpetuity at all, to ascertain what is the meaning of the testator; and having got that, then I apply the rules as to perpetuity generally. Well, looking at the will, what do I gather with regard to the gift over to the persons who are to take in fifths in the events which have happened? I gather this, that the testator clearly intended those persons to have the beneficial interests in these freeholds; that he intended the trust for sale as a means by which he would enable that property to be more easily divided between them, and to be enjoyed in substance. But I certainly gather from this will the intention that these persons should benefit in this property, and that so far as there is a trust for them, it is clearly a trust which is perfectly good. Suppose the property under the trust for sale had not been sold for some years, who would have been entitled under this will to the rents and profits in the meantime, although there is nothing said on the face of the will with regard to it? Why, clearly, the persons whom the testator has indicated as being the persons beneficially interested in the property. But suppose those persons had all been sui juris, and had elected at the time to take the property without it being sold at all, putting aside any question of perpetuity. They could have said to the trustees, "Please hand us over this property unconverted." Why? Because the testator in this will has shown that he regards those persons that he indicated as being the persons who are to have a beneficial interest under his will in the property, the persons to whom the property is beneficially given, and the trust for sale is the machinery for carrying that out.

In this particular case that intention of the testator is further shown by the power of maintenance, although I desire to say for my own part that I should have come to exactly the same conclusion on this will even if the power of maintenance had not been found there. It appears to me, having once come to the conclusion what the meaning of the will is, when you find it is only the trust for sale which is invalid because of the law of perpetuity, but that the trust for the beneficial interest is good, then the court does that which in my opinion it is bound to do in a case like that—namely, although the sale cannot be carried out, the trust for sale being bad, yet the court will hold that the beneficial interest in the property has passed and is perfectly good and should be enforced.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. We are really asked to differ from the view of Stirling, J., in Goodier v. Edmunds and from the actual decision of Chitty, J., in In re Daveron.

The Master of the Rolls has referred in detail to Chitty, J.'s, judgment, and I would only read a sentence from Stirling, J.'s, judgment: "Where it can be seen that the trust for sale is mere machinery for facilitating the division between the persons for whom the property is destined I think that effect ought to be given to the equitable interest even though the instrument by means of which the division is intended to be carried out may prove unavailing." That seems to me, if I may say so, a perfectly clear and satisfactory statement of the law. It has been argued before us by Mr. Mulligan that the case depends upon some election by the beneficiaries. That seems to me to be quite a fallacy. The view taken by the court in cases of this kind does not at all depend upon the fact of election. The right of election is only an illustration of a consequence from the doctrine of equity that the persons who take the proceeds of sale are regarded in equity as the real beneficial owners. They do not take it because they elect to take it, but because they are beneficial owners, and the application by the court of the doctrine of election is an illustration of the fact that they are beneficial owners. Like Romer, L.J., I do not rely on the maintenance clause in any other sense than as assisting a general indication of intention, but I should certainly arrive at the same conclusion if the maintenance clause had not been there.

Solicitors, S. J. Daw; Capron, Hitchins, Brabant, & Hitchins; Walter Turner; Iliffe, Henley, & Swest; Stuart & Tull; Bloxam, Ellison, & Co.

---

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Feb. 18.

HUDSON v. GRIBBLE (SURVEYOR OF TAXES).
BELL v. GRIBBLE (SURVEYOR OF TAXES). (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—Salary—Deductions—Sum payable or chargeable by virtue of any Act of Parliament—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 146, rr. 1, 9, Schedule E—Manchester Corporation Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. ccvii.), ss. 5. 7.

The Manchester Corporation Act, 1891, empowered the corporation to establish a fund for encouraging thrift amongst their officers and servants, and to frame a scheme under which every person who contributed to the fund should on retirement be entitled to receive back the whole amount of his contributions with interest, and in case of his death his representatives should be entitled to receive the same. The scheme made under this power provided that persons entering the service of the corporation after the passing of the Act should contribute to the fund a certain percentage of their salaries or wages, to be deducted by the corporation, and that persons who were in the service of the corporation at the passing of the Act might, on application, be admitted to the benefit of the fund and become contributors, and that no contributor should cease to contribute while in the service of the corporation.

Held, affirming the judgment of Phillimore, J., in Hudson v. Gribble, 50 W. R 557, [1902] 2 K. B. 298, and reversing his judgment in Bell v. Gribble, that a servant of the corporation who contributed to the fund, whether compulsorily or on his own application, was not entitled, under the first rule of section 146 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, to have the amount of his contribution deducted from his assessment to income tax under Schedule E.

Beaumont v. Bowers, 48 W. R. 557, [1900] 2 Q. B. 204, not followed.

Appeals from judgments of Phillimore, J., on cases stated by income tax commissioners.

The first of the two cases is reported 50 W. R. 685, [1902] 2 K. B. 298.

In the first case, Thomas Hudson, the deputy town clerk of the city of Manchester, having been assessed to income tax on the sum of £800, being the gross amount of the profits of the office or employment held by him, appealed to the commissioners claiming that he was entitled to have a certain deduction made from that assessment.

---

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By section 5 of the Manchester Corporation Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. cvii.), the mayor, aldermen, and citizens of the city of Manchester were empowered to establish a fund for the encouragement of thrift amongst the officers and servants of the corporation, with a view of providing a sum of money which, in the event of the retirement or death of any person in the service of the corporation who had contributed to the fund, should be available for himself or his representatives; such fund to be called "the thrift fund."

They were further empowered to prepare and approve by resolution a scheme for the establishment of such fund, determining by any such scheme (inter alia) what classes of persons should be entitled to contribute to and participate in the benefit of the fund.

By section 7 it was required that any such scheme should contain provisions to the following effect: that any contributing member retiring bonâ fide from the service of the corporation and not to escape dismissal for fraud or misconduct should be entitled to receive back the whole amount of his contributions with interest; that in case of his death his representatives should be entitled to receive the same; and that any contributing member dismissed for fraud or misconduct or retiring to escape dismissal should, at the discretion of the corporation, forfeit all or any part of his contributions.

By section 9 it was required that the corporation should, at the end of each half-year after the establishment of the thrift fund, contribute thereto, out of the rate or revenue upon which the salary or wages of each contributing member was or were chargeable, a sum equal to one-third of the sum which during the same half-year had been contributed thereto by such contributing member.

On the 3rd of August, 1892, the corporation by resolution approved a scheme for the establishment of, and did thereby establish, the thrift fund.

The scheme provided, inter alia: (1) That persons entering the service of the corporation after the 5th of August, 1891 (the date of the passing of the Act), should contribute and pay to the thrift fund £3 15s per cent. of their salaries or wages, which might be deducted by the corporation, and that no such person should cease to so contribute to the thrift fund while in the service of the corporation; (2) that persons in the service of the corporation on the 5th of August, 1891, might, by application in writing, be admitted to the benefit of the thrift fund and become contributors, provided that no person who should have been so admitted and should so become a contributor should cease to contribute while in the service of the corporation.

The appellant, who was already in the service of the corporation at the time of the passing of the Act, made an application in writing to be admitted to the benefit of the fund, and he thereupon became, and had since continued to be, a contributor to the fund, and under the provisions of the scheme he could not cease to contribute to the fund while in the service of the corporation.

By the first rule in section 146 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, which contains the rules for charging the duties under Schedule E, it is provided that the duties shall be annually charged on the persons exercising the offices or employments of profit mentioned in the schedule for all salaries, fees, wages, perquisites, or profits accruing by reason of such offices or employments, "after deducting the amount of duties or other sums payable or chargeable on the same by virtue of any Act of Parliament where the same have been really and bonâ fide paid and borne by the party to be charged."

By the ninth rule it is provided that, in estimating the duty payable for any such office or employment of profit, all official deductions and payments made upon the receipt of the salaries and profits thereof shall be allowed to be deducted, provided that a due account thereof shall be rendered to the commissioners and proved to their satisfaction.

The appellant contended that under these rules he was entitled to deduct the amount of his contribution to the thrift fund from his salary, and that he was only chargeable on the amount of his salary after making such deduction.

In the second case the facts were similar to those in the first case, with the exception that the appellant Bell entered into the service of the corporation after the passing of the Act.

The commissioners refused to allow the appellants' claims and confirmed the assessments, but stated these cases for the opinion of the court.

Phillimore, J., affirmed the decision of the commissioners in the first case, and gave judgment for the Crown, on the ground that the amount contributed by the appellant Hudson to the fund was not payable by virtue of any Act of Parliament, but by virtue of the scheme and of the appellants' application to be admitted to the benefits thereof. In the second case he reversed the decision of the commissioners, and gave judgment for the appellant Bell, on the authority of Beaumont v. Bowers, 48 W. R. 557, [1900] 2 Q. B. 204.

The appellant Hudson appealed in the first case.

The Crown appealed in the second case.

Asquith, K.C., and Ryde, for the appellant Hudson and the respondent Bell.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., Sir Edward Carson, S.G., and Rowlatt, for the Crown.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my judgment, the decision of Phillimore, J., in the first case is right and ought to be affirmed. The question which we have to decide is whether or not certain sums of money which have been deducted by the corporation of Manchester from the salaries or wages of persons employed by them come within the words of the first rule of Schedule E of the Income Tax Act, 1842. That rule provides for the payment of income tax by persons exercising certain offices or employments of profit on all salaries, fees, wages, perquisites, or profits accruing by reason of such offices or employments, "after deducting the amount of duties or other sums payable or chargeable on the same by virtue of any Act of Parliament where the same have been really and bonâ fide paid and borne by the party to be charged." The question is whether or not these deductions made by the corporation come within the terms of that part of the rule which defines the nature of the sums which may be deducted. In my judgment the deductions made by the corporation under the scheme in question do not fall within the definition, they do not fall within either part of it. The sums deducted are not deductions of duties or other sums payable or chargeable by virtue of any Act of Parliament; and further, in my opinion it would not be true to say that they had been really and bonâ fide paid and borne by the party to be charged. I will deal with the second part of the definition first. In my judgment, if one examines the nature of these deductions, it is clear that they cannot be said to be really and bonâ fide paid and borne by the party to be charged. Under the scheme these sums, although payment of them was postponed, never ceased to be the property of the person employed from whose salary or wages they were deducted by the corporation. Without going into the details of the Act under which the scheme was framed or of the scheme itself, it plainly appears to be the intention of the Act and of the scheme, that any employed person, who is not guilty of certain offences and misconduct mentioned in the Act and the scheme, is to be entitled on withdrawing from the service of the corporation to receive back the whole amount of his contributions to the thrift fund with interest; and that in the case of the death of any employed person that amount is to be paid to his legal personal representatives. All that it is true to say of these sums is that payment of them has been postponed. It cannot be said that the true effect of the deductions is that the sums so deducted have been paid or borne by the person employed.

With regard to the other part of the definition I do not think the words used cover deductions of this nature. I agree with the argument of the law officers that the words are really intended to cover sums which have been deducted in respect of payment of taxes. I am inclined to think that the deductions authorized by this rule are limited to such cases. It is not, however, necessary to decide that. It is sufficient to say that these deductions are not duties or other sums payable or chargeable by virtue of any Act of Parliament. No one is bound to accept an engagement in the service of the Manchester corporation. If he chooses to enter their service, he is really voluntarily entering into a service which he knows will carry with it as part of his contract of service his agreement that a certain percentage of his wages shall be deducted and appropriated to the purposes of the thrift fund scheme. It is not true to say of such deductions that they are sums payable or chargeable by virtue of an Act of Parliament. Speaking generally, I wish to say that, in my judgment, the object of the words used in this rule was to prevent double taxation.

An independent argument was put forward by counsel for the appellants. They said that the Income Tax Act of 1842 was an Act by which incomes alone were intended to be taxed, and they quoted the judgment of Lord Macnaghten in London County Council v. Attorney-General, 49 W. R. 686, [1901] A. C. 26. They contended that in this case the part of the salary of the person employed which was represented by the deduction never really came to him, that his true income was his salary less this deduction, and that he ought only to be taxed on his salary less the deduction. To my mind that contention is not well founded. It is not true to say that the Manchester corporation were never indebted to their servant in the whole amount of his salary. If they were sued by him, they would have to admit their indebtedness for the whole and then justify the deduction as made by virtue of their contract with him. I ought to add that, if my view as to the construction of this rule with respect to deductions is correct, then it seems to me that the decision in the case of Beaumont v. Bowers was wrong. I need not, however, decide that question. It is sufficient to say that in both these cases it is clear that the sums deducted were not within the words of the rule either as being payable or chargeable by virtue of any Act of Parliament or as having been really and bonâ fide paid and borne by the party to be charged. I therefore think that the appeal in the first case should be dismissed, and the appeal in the second case allowed.

STIRLING and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

Judgment for the Crown.

Solicitors for the appellant in the first case, Austin & Austin, for Thomas Hudson, Manchester.

Solicitors for the respondent in the second case, Austin & Austin, for R. Bell, Manchester.

Solicitor for the Crown, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

From K. B. Div.
(Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Feb. 13.

KODAK (LIMITED) v. CLARK (SURVEYOR OF TAXES). (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—Company resident in United Kingdom hold 98 per cent. of shares in foreign company—Control—Liability to pay income tax on profits made by foreign company—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, Schedule D, case 1—Income Tax Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 2, Schedule D.

The respondent company was incorporated in England and registered under the Companies Acts to acquire (inter alia) not less than 95 per cent., and did in fact acquire 98 per cent. of the share capital of a foreign company, the remaining 2 per cent. being held by shareholders abroad independently of the English company.

Held, that the respondent company was not assessable under Schedule D, case 1, of the Income Tax Act, 1842, to income tax upon the full amount of the profits of the foreign company as the Crown contended, because there was no evidence to rebut the respondent's contention that their interest in the foreign company was simply that of a shareholder, that they did not direct and control the foreign company, and that there was no such relationship of principal and agent or of master and servant existing between the two companies as to make the respondents liable under the claim put forward by the Crown.

Decision of Phillimore, J. (ante, p. 75, [1902] 2 K. B. 450), affirmed.

This was an appeal on behalf of the Crown, from a judgment of Phillimore, J., on a special case.

The material facts may be shortly stated thus:

In 1880 the business of George Eastman, of Rochester, United States of America, was established to manufacture photographic materials.

That business was taken over by the Eastman Dry Plate and Film Co., of Rochester, which company in 1889 entered into an agreement to sell its business in the United Kingdom, and in all other parts of the world except North and South America, to the Eastman's Photographic Materials Co (Limited), of London, a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862-1886, with a nominal capital of £150,000.

That business was carried on wholly independently of the business of the American company, the Eastman Dry Plate and Film Co.

In 1890 this latter company transferred its business to a company called the Eastman Co., formed under the laws of the State of New York.

In the following year a company called the New Process Film Co. was formed, also according to the laws of the State of New York.

Those two companies amalgamated in 1892, and became the Eastman Kodak Co., of Rochester.

The Eastman Co. and the Eastman Kodak Co. were distinct from the Eastman Photographic Materials Co., but the last-mentioned company purchased a considerable part of the goods which it dealt in from the Eastman Co.

On the 30th of September, 1898, an agreement was entered into between the Eastman Photographic Materials Co., of London, and George Eastman, of New York, for the sale to him of the property and undertaking of the company for the sum of £344,000.

On the 15th of November, 1898, Kodak (Limited) was registered in England under the Company Acts. In the prospectus the names of the places where business was carried on were set out as London, Paris, Berlin, and Rochester (United States of America).

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

There was a statement also that the French, German, and American companies were to be worked as subsidiary companies. It was also stated that the object of the company was to acquire, inter alia, and carry on the business of Eastman Photographic Materials Co., and to acquire and hold not less than 95 per cent. of the paid-up issued share capital of the Eastman Kodak Co., of New York; to carry on the business of dealers of photographic materials in England, the United States of America, and other countries, and to superintend and manage the business of any company of which the company held shares, debentures, or other interests.

The dividends were to be paid in London, but the directors had power to pay dividends or interest payable to any shareholders whose names were entered in the local register of any foreign country or colony, in such foreign country or colony.

Of the shares of the Eastman Kodak Co. 98 per cent. were transferred to and acquired by Kodak (Limited).

Among the other statements made in the case was one that Kodak (Limited), in fact, did not interfere in or control the management of the Eastman Kodak Co., and that it had dealt with Eastman Kodak Co. as an ordinary customer for goods purchased by it, and that the goods were invoiced in the ordinary way of business, and paid for by bank drafts.

The report of the directors of Kodak (Limited) of March, 1900, issued to the shareholders, showed the amount standing to the credit of the profit and loss account of the combined companies to be £345,778. Kodak (Limited) were assessed in respect of the whole of the profits made by the combined companies under section 100, Schedule D, case 1 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35.

Kodak (Limited) appealed against the assessment, contending that the business carried on by the Eastman Kodak Co. was carried on in America, and not in the United Kingdom, and, therefore, that no assessment could be made under the Income Tax Acts in respect of its profits upon Kodak (Limited), as they were not profits of Kodak (Limited); that the only interest Kodak (Limited) had in Eastman Kodak Co. was that of a shareholder; that the dividends to which Kodak (Limited) were entitled in respect of the shares in Eastman Kodak Co. were taxable only (if taxable at all) under case 4 or 5 of section 100, Schedule D, of the Act of 1842, and not otherwise, and only in respect and to the extent to which they were actually received in the United Kingdom, and that no part of such dividends had, in fact, been received in this country; that the Eastman Kodak (Limited) and Kodak (Limited) were distinct and separate entities.

Kodak (Limited) admitted their liability to be assessed for the year 1899-1900 in respect of the profits of the business carried on by Kodak (Limited), as the successors to Eastman Photographic Materials Co. (Limited), including therein the profits made by means of the French and German companies.

The commissioners were of opinion that: (1) The American company was carried on by and was the business of Kodak (Limited), and that the profits and business were technically the profits and business of Kodak (Limited); (2) that if the business at Rochester, and the profits made thereat, were technically the business and profits of the American company, the American company for all purposes were the agents of Kodak (Limited); (3) that Kodak (Limited) were successors to both the prior English and American companies; (4) that Kodak (Limited) were liable for the profits made in America under Schedule D, case 1.

Phillimore, J., held that the English company were not assessable under Schedule D, case 1, of the Income Tax Act, 1842, to income tax upon the amount of the profits of the foreign company, there being no evidence here upon which the commissioners could hold that the American company was carried on or controlled by the English company or was the agent of the English company.

The Crown appealed.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., Sir E. Carson, S.G., and Rowlatt, for the Crown.—Kodak (Limited), being an English company, is liable to pay income tax on all its profits, whether made here or abroad. Part of its profits are derived from the American company, which we say, following the rule laid down in San Paulo Railway Co. v. Carter, 44 W. R. 336, [1896] A. C. 31, is a company carried on in America by Kodak (Limited), which holds such a commanding number of its shares that it must be taken to be controlled and worked by and as being part of the English company. The question is simply, Whose is the American business? The determining factor in the answer is, By whom are the preponderating number of its shares held? There is evidence that Kodak (Limited) intended to treat the American business as their business from the terms of the prospectus, and the same inference is to be gathered from the memorandum and articles of association: Frank Jones Brewing Co. v. Apthorpe, 4 Tax Cas. 6; United States Brewing Co. v. Apthorpe, 4 Tax Cas. 17; St. Louis Breweries (Limited) v. Apthorpe, 47 W. R. 334, 4 Tax Cas. 111. It is not a question of degree. Therefore it can make no difference in principle whether one share or 2 per cent. of the shares are held by independent persons. As the evidence stands, the whole undertaking of the Eastman Kodak Co is owned by Kodak (Limited), except so far as it is subject to a charge in favour of the holders of 2 per cent. of the shares. In Apthorpe v. Peter Schoenhofen Brewing Co., 79 L. T. Rep. 98, 47 W. R. Dig. 75, Collins, L.J., in the course of his judgment, points this out, and says: "One central factor in this question is whether or not the ultimate tribunal of appeal, the ultimate controlling power, is in England." There is therefore ample evidence to support the finding of the commissioners.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Kerly, for Kodak (Limited).—We say that the American company and the respondent company are two distinct businesses and there is no relationship of principal and agent or of master and servant between them. Kodak (Limited) does not hold all the shares. Two per cent. of the shares—whatever number of shares that may amount to—they have no interest or concern in at all. The interest that Kodak (Limited) has in the success of the American company is limited to that merely of an ordinary shareholder. They participate in the American profits only to the extent of the dividends on the shares they hold, which are paid in this country. They have never suggested that on such dividends they are not liable to pay income tax. They admit they are. The contention of the Crown is wholly misconceived. The Crown is attempting to make Kodak (Limited) accountable for the profits made by the American company, the management of which they had not the control of. What was said by Lord Watson in his judgment in the San Paulo Railway Co. v. Carter, [1896] A. C., at p. 41, really decides this case. He said: "The decision does not involve any new controversy upon the construction of the Income Tax Acts," and goes on to point out that "the directors only can be said to manage and control the affairs of a company and that the shareholders in that sense have no control." Our point here is that, whatever interest Kodak (Limited) has in the American company, it is that of a shareholder only. [They were stopped.]

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., did not reply.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The argument of the company is—that whatever may have been true in other cases, the fact is that in this case there is a body of shareholders holding 2 per cent. of the shares of the American company in contradistinction to the 98 per cent. of the shares held by Kodak (Limited). That they appear upon the face of the case to be a body of independent shareholders, and that under these circumstances it is impossible for the holders of the 98 per cent. of the shares to claim 98 per cent. or any proportion of the profits. Their right is said to be a right only to receive dividends, and whatever amount of control they may exercise, it is the control of shareholders and of shareholders only—and they have no control either as masters or as principals. I think I may say, and that I ought to say, to save time, that this view is that which the court thinks to be the right view, and I do not think that anything would be gained by further repetition of the view that I take, the result of which is that the judgment of Phillimore, J., should be affirmed.

STIRLING and MATHEW, L.JJ., agreed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, The Solicitor of Inland Revenue; Kerly, Son, & Verden.

---

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Feb. 18.
Farwell, J. }

HART v. THE PORTHGAIN HARBOUR CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Contract—Construction of works—Plant and materials on ground—Mortgage by contractor—Default in completion of works—Rights of building owner.

The clause in an ordinary contract for the construction of works upon lands, that the plant and materials brought upon the land to be used for the purposes of construction shall be considered to be the property of the owner of the land, must, in the absence of any stipulation in the contract incompatible with such construction, be construed as immediately vesting in such owner all plant and materials so brought upon the land, subject to a right of the contractor, upon his completion of the works, to have the plant returned to him.

Action.

The defendant company had entered into an agreement with a contractor for the construction of harbour works. The contract contained clauses providing that all plant and materials brought upon the ground should be considered the property of the company till the completion of the works contracted for should have been certified in manner therein provided; also that the contractor should, at his own expense, erect all necessary temporary works and remove them when no longer required; also, that the company should be entitled to take possession and complete the works in case the contractor became bankrupt or upon certain specified defaults upon his part.

The contractor mortgaged certain plant and materials, including the materials of a temporary dam across the mouth of the harbour, to the plaintiff by a registered bill of sale. He never completed the works. He became bankrupt. The plaintiff purchased his equity of redemption in the plant and materials from the trustee in bankruptcy.

The company was insolvent and unable to complete the works. Trustees for the debenture-holders took possession of the works, plant and materials, and they were sold by order of the court in a debenture-holders' action.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover possession of the plant and materials comprised in the bill of sale.

Upjohn, K.C., and A. Beddall, for the plaintiff, relied on In re Keen & Keen, 50 W. R. 334, [1902] 1 K. B. 555.

Butcher, K.C. and Dunham, for the defendant company.

Ashton Cross, for the debenture-holders.

Herbert Jacobs, for the purchaser on the sale, cited Reeves v. Barlow, 32 W. R. 672, 12 Q. B. D. 436; Brown v. Bateman, 15 W. R. 350, L. R. 2 C. P. 272; and Sumpter v. Hedges, 46 W. R. 454, [1898] 1 Q. B. 673.

FARWELL, J., after stating the facts, said. The question I have to determine is the construction of the clause in the contract which provides that all plant and materials brought upon the ground shall, till a certain event which never happened, be considered the property of the company. I construe it as vesting them in the company subject to a right to reconveyance in certain events. In my opinion In re Keen & Keen was decided upon the terms of that particular contract in question, which, as Bigham, J., pointed out, contained clauses incompatible with the idea that the plant vested immediately in the company. It is therefore no authority upon this case. I am of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiff's claim fails, and the action must be dismissed.

Solicitors, Batchelor & Cousins; Busk, Mellor, & Norris, for P. A. A. Weston, Bristol; Nye, Moreton, & Clowes; W. H. Newton, for G. A. T. Tuckey, Bristol.

---

Chan. Div. } Feb. 6, 7, 11.
Farwell, J. }

WAUGH v. CRIPPS (a.)

Will—Construction—Devise to "B. and her heirs"—Gift over to collateral heirs—Rule of construction—Estate tail.

By his will a testator gave two houses to his daughter A. for life, and after her death as to one house "to her daughter B. and her heirs," and as to the other house "to her son C. and his heirs"; and, further, "if either the said B or C. should die without an heir their share is to go to the survivor's heir or heirs."

Held, that B. and C. took estates tail, and that the words "heirs" in the last phrase, "the survivor's heir or heirs," must be read as "heirs general" and not as "heirs of the body," although the word had that latter

(a.) Reported by GODFREY R. BENSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

signification throughout the other parts of the will, where there were gifts over.

Summons.

The testator in this case left two testamentary documents, both of which were admitted to probate, dated respectively the 30th of December, 1862, and the 13th of August, 1866, and he died on the 18th of August, 1866.

The questions to be determined arose on the construction of the second document, which was in these terms: "I leave to my daughter Mary Vine a freehold cottage in High-street, Mile Town, Sheerness, No. 195, and after her death it is to go to her daughter, Susan or Susannah Vine and her heirs; if the said Susannah Vine should have no heir the cottage is to go to her eldest brother, Edward Robert Vine, and his heirs; if he should die without an heir, it is to go to his surviving brothers or their heirs, to be equally divided between them. I also leave to my daughter Mary Vine two cottages in Chapel-street, Wards Town, Nos. 10 and 11, freehold, and after her death No. 10 is to be left to her son Thomas and his heirs, and No. 11 is to go to his surviving brothers or brother or their heirs, to be equally divided. I leave to my daughter Catherine Graham a freehold house, being No. 13, Victoria-terrace, Wards Town, Sheerness, during her life, and after her death to go to her eldest daughter, Mary Graham, and her heirs; if she should die without an heir it is to be divided equally between the survivors. I also leave to my daughter Catherine Graham two cottages in Chapel-street, Wards Town, Nos. 9 and 12; after her death No. 12 to go to her youngest daughter, Elizabeth Graham, and her heirs, and No. 9 to go to her son, William Graham, and his heirs; if either the said Elizabeth or William should die without an heir, their share is to go to the survivor's heir or heirs."

Elizabeth Graham, the daughter named in the last clause, died a spinster on the 25th of September, 1891, and William Graham, the son named in the last gift, died a bachelor in December, 1897. Catherine Graham, the tenant for life named in the last gift, died on the 23rd of April, 1902.

The question to be decided was what estates Elizabeth and William Graham took in the houses respectively devised to them.

Hon. Frank Russell, for the plaintiffs (the heirs of the testator), submitted that the gift to Elizabeth Graham and her heirs and to William Graham and his heirs created estates tail. The words "heirs" was used frequently in the will in the sense of "heirs of the body," and the court will assume that it was so used in this instance: Re Birks, Kenyon v. Birks, [1900] 1 Ch. 417, 48 W. R. Dig. 209.

Fischer Williams, for the defendants (the devisees of said William Graham, and those claiming through such devisees), referred to Fearne on Contingent Remainders (10th ed.), vol. 1, p. 466; Tilburgh v. Barbut, 1 Ves. sen. 89; and Doe d. Littledale v. Smeddle, 2 B. & Ald. 126.

Hon. F. Russell replied.

FARWELL, J., after stating the facts set out above, proceeded as follows: Under these circumstances the first question arises—What estate did Elizabeth and William Graham take in the houses respectively devised to them? I am of opinion that they took estates tail. The general rule of construction is well settled, and is thus stated in Fearne on Contingent Remainders (10th ed.), vol. 1, at p. 466: "But we are to remember, however, that although a devise over after a dying without heirs is in general void, yet this rule is not without exceptions; for if the person to whom the limitation over is made be a relation of, and capable of being collateral heir to, the first devisee, in that case the first devisee takes only an estate tail because the limitation over to the collateral heir plainly denotes that only lineal heirs could have been intended." But it is argued that the rule is confined to the case where the object of the gift over is or may be the collateral heir, and that in the present case it is obviously impossible that the children of a brother who survives his sister or of a sister who survives her brother can ever be heirs to the predecessor. But the rule is merely a rule of construction, not a rule of law, and has been established to give effect to the intention for reasons applicable to the present case. Thus in Nottingham v. Jennings, 1 P. Wms. 23, at p. 24, Holt, C.J., says: "I agree if the devise over had been to a stranger it had been void, and B. had taken a fee simple; but in the present case the word (heirs) can import nothing more than issue, for how could he possibly die without heir, living the other brother?"

In the present case I ask the same question. How could Elizabeth or William die without an heir if the other survived? But the gift over assumes the existence of the one at the death of the other, and the title of the heirs of the survivor is contingent on evidence of survivorship of their ancestor. If it is absurd to suppose that the testator meant heirs general in a gift to A. and his heirs, because he has given the property over in the event of the failure of heirs general to a person who may be such heir general, it is equally absurd to suppose that he meant heirs general when the gift over to a stranger is made to depend on the existence of one who is, or may be, heir general at or after the total failure of heirs general. In my opinion the rule as stated in Fearne may be amplified thus: If the person, to whom the limitation over is made, be capable of being collateral heir to the first devisee, or if the event on which the gift over is made necessarily depends on the existence of a collateral heir of the first devisee on such first devisee's death, the first devisee takes only an estate tail.

The next question is, What is the meaning of the words "the survivor's heir or heirs"? I do not feel at liberty to alter the meaning of the words, and to read them as if they were "heirs of the body." It is argued that the testator has throughout this document used the word "heirs" when he meant "heirs of the body," but this is by force of the several gifts over under the rule of construction to which I have already referred. In this case I have no gift over, and the word "heir" is not a flexible word like "issue," which was the word in In re Birks. The gift was contingent on the death of the survivor during the lifetime of the tenant for life, for nemo est heres viventis, and if the tenant for life had died first, the gift would have failed for want of a particular estate to support it. But in the event that happened it has taken effect, and I can find nothing to justify me in altering the plain meaning of the words. The alternative phrase "heir or heirs" is too narrow a foundation to build an argument upon. Mr. Russell relied upon Simpson v. Ashworth, 6 Beav. 412, but in my opinion the reason on which Lord Langdale's decision is based has no application to the present case. The will there contained divers gifts to the sons and daughters and their heirs, which, by virtue of the rule above-mentioned were held to be gifts in tail; and then there was a gift over of a daughter Catherine's share "to my son and daughters that have heirs, share and share alike." Lord Langdale held that the testator intended the same quantity of estate to go over which he had given in the first instance—that is, he inferred from the fact that all the original gifts were to the sons and daughters in tail that the intention was that the share of a daughter given over in the event of her death "without lawful issue" was given for a similar estate. But I have no such indication of intention in this case. The heirs of the survivor are not objects of any prior gift. In order to make Lord Langdale's decision apply, the gift here should have been to the survivor, his or her heirs or heir, instead of to the heirs or heir of the survivor.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Sismey & Cook, for Copland & Son, Sheerness.

Solicitors for the defendants, Crossman, Prichard, & Co., for Blome-Jones, Sheerness.

---

Chan. Div. } March 4.
Joyce, J. }

HARRINGTON v. SENDALL. (a)

Club—Absence of express power to alter rules—Power of majority to bind minority—"General purposes" of club—Power to increase subscription.

In the absence of an express power to alter its rules, a club has no inherent authority to increase the annual subscription provided for by the rules, against the wishes of a dissentient minority of its members.

The plaintiff in this action was, and had been since 1886, a member of the Oxford and Cambridge University Club, and he moved to restrain the defendants, who were the committee of the club, from interfering with his enjoyment as such member of the use and benefit of the club and its privileges and property, and from posting up his name as that of a member in default with his subscription, and from erasing his name from the list of members of the club.

The facts were as follows:

In 1886, when the plaintiff joined the club, the entrance fee was forty guineas and the annual subscription eight guineas.

At a general meeting held on the 28th of May, 1902, it was resolved, by a majority of the members present, that the annual subscription should be increased to nine guineas. The plaintiff was not present at the meeting and had previously expressed his dissent from the proposal, and after the passing of the resolution he gave notice to the secretary of his dissent from and objection to it.

In January, 1903, the plaintiff tendered £8 8s as his subscription for the year, but his cheque was, by the instructions of the defendants, returned to him as insufficient in amount.

On the 3rd of February he received notice that his subscription was still unpaid, and subsequently his name was posted in the manner complained of in this action.

The rules of the club contained no provision for making amendments or alterations thereto. The preamble recited that the club "was instituted for the association of gentlemen educated at Oxford and Cambridge Universities, and for promoting and continuing a mutual interest and fellowship between them. As every member will upon payment of his entrance fee and subscription become entitled to the benefits and privileges of the club, so such payment will be considered as a declaration of his submission to the following rules and regulations." Rule 14 provided that an annual subscription of £8 8s. should be due and payable from each member on the 1st of January. Rules 16 and 17 provided for the posting of names of defaulters and the erasion of their names from the list of members if the default continued. Rule 23 provided that an annual meeting of the club should be held for general purposes in the month of May in each year, of which due notice was to be given in the manner therein mentioned.

The evidence showed that the club was founded in 1830, since which date the rules had been altered, varied, or added to in over fifty different ways on more than thirty separate occasions by means of resolutions passed at the annual meetings. The subscription had on three several occasions, the latest being in 1881, been increased by various increments to its present amount. The rules had also been altered on several occasions since the plaintiff became a member, and he had made no objection to any such alteration. It further appeared that since 1881 the annual expenditure had increased by over £2,000, of which £1,000 was due to increased rating and taxation.

Hughes, K.C., and Simon, for the plaintiff.

Haldane, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the defendants.—By a long continued course of practice extending over many years the expression "general purposes" in rule 23 has been interpreted as involving a power to alter rules; apart from that there must be an inherent power to do so; the individual members are not liable for the club's debts, but only the committee, who have to look to members' subscriptions to indemnify them; if the club can, and do, authorize the committee to incur certain expenses, and can determine the amount of them, they can also increase the means for defraying them—i.e., raise the subscription; that follows almost as a corollary. But we rely chiefly on the interpretation accorded by usage to rule 23, and say that, if not generally, yet within reasonable limits, the members have power by a majority to effect alterations, and the plaintiff has always acquiesced in that view of the position.

JOYCE, J.—The question in this case is whether a majority of the members of the Oxford and Cambridge Club, assembled in general meeting, have power to alter the rule which regulates the amount of the annual subscription to the club in such a way as to bind a dissentient minority to pay a larger subscription in future years. When the plaintiff joined the club he became entitled, as a member, to the then benefits and privileges of the club, and must be taken to have submitted himself to then rules and regulations. I say the "then" rules and regulations because they had been from time to time modified in various ways. In other words, he agreed to be bound by the written contract contained in those rules and regulations. Now, those rules contained no express power to alter or amend the rules from time to time, but it is contended that there must be an inherent power in a majority of the members to do this, either in any way they may think fit, or at least within certain limits. No authority was cited to me for this proposition, and in my opinion there is no more power to alter the rules in this case than there is for any other association depending on express written contract to alter the regulations imposed by it. In my opinion there is no power in the members to alter the rules when such power forms no part of the written contract. With regard to rule 23, it is not alleged that the ordinary meaning of the phrase "general purposes" would include a power to alter the rules, but it is said that the rule has always been interpreted upon that footing. Now, in dealing with an ancient statute, you may no doubt appeal to continued usage as a means of interpreting, but not, in my opinion, when you are dealing with an altogether modern contract, as in the present case. Nor is the analogy of a partnership, where the articles can be amended, any guide to this case, which is quite dissimilar. If a majority can raise the subscription to nine guineas, why not to twenty guineas, or why can they not call upon individual members to discharge the liabilities of the club? Again, it is alleged that the plaintiff has acquiesced in the interpretation contended for of rule 23 by acquiescing in other alterations of rules. These, however, appear to have been of quite a minor character, and the plaintiff felt no objection to them; because he did not come and ask for an injunction in these matters, I cannot hold that he is not entitled to do so in a case where his pecuniary interest is indirectly affected. If he, therefore, insists upon his rights, I declare that he is entitled to the injunction he asks for.

(a.) Reported by ALAN C. NESBITT, Esq., Barrist-r-at-Law.

Solicitors, Lawford, Waterhouse, & Lawford; Walker, Martineau, & Co.

---

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Divorce. } Nov. 25.

WADE v. WADE.
BROOKE Intervening. (a.)

Divorce—Practice—Intervener's costs.

Where the respondent did not deny at the trial his adultery with a woman, who, on learning that he was not going to deny the charge, obtained leave to intervene, and the petition as against her was dismissed.

The Court held that the intervener ought to be placed in the best possible position to obtain the costs of her intervention, and that the costs of it ought to fall upon the respondent as well as the petitioner.

This was an application by an intervener for a first charge for her costs upon a fund paid into court by the respondent (the husband) for security for the petitioner's costs of the hearing under the following circumstances:

The wife petitioned for a dissolution of her marriage on the ground of adultery, cruelty, and desertion, the adultery alleged being with a woman or women unknown and with a woman named. The husband denied all the charges, but the woman who was named, being a governess in very poor circumstances, took no steps to intervene, as she relied upon the husband fighting the case.

When the case came on for hearing the husband stated that he was not in a position to contest the adultery and the desertion, but that he would contest the allegations of cruelty.

The intervener then applied for leave to intervene in the suit and defend herself against the particular charge of adultery which concerned her, and the case was thereupon adjourned to enable her to prepare her defence.

At the hearing the charge of adultery against her failed, and so far as she was concerned the petition was dismissed.

Newson, for the intervener, applied for a first charge for her costs upon the fund in court, as hereinbefore stated.

Barnard, for the petitioner, contended that the court had power to condemn the husband in the costs of the intervener.

Priestley raised no objection to the intervener's application.

BARNES, J., granted a decree of judicial separation on the ground of desertion, with costs against the respondent; and, dealing with the intervener's application, said that he thought that no case had been made out against her, and if any suspicion of a case attached to her, which he did not think really did, it had been entirely dispelled by her evidence. He thought he ought to place the intervener in the best possible position to obtain payment of the costs which she had incurred, and rightly incurred, in defending herself. It would not have been for her to have intervened if the husband had fought the case out as he ought to have done. The expense of her intervention ought to fall upon him as well as upon the petitioner, and an order would therefore be made against both the petitioner and the respondent to pay the costs of the intervener. Having regard to the conduct of the husband the petitioner ought to have an order for her costs, as her solicitor did not appear to have acted improperly in laying the case before the court, especially after the admission made in court on behalf of the husband.

Solicitors for petitioner, Sanders & Harding, for Tunnicliffe & Salthouse, Bradford.

Solicitors for respondent, Corbin, Greener, & Cook, for Beaumont, Wilson, & Croft, Leeds.

Solicitors for intervener, Jaques & Co., for Neill & Holland, Bradford.

---

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) April 7.

CARR v. HENRY AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Convict—Administrator of convict's property—Power of sale—Action by convict against administrator—Felony Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict c. 23), ss. 12, 17, 20.

The power of sale over the property of a convict conferred, by section 12 of the Felony Act, 1870, on his administrator, is absolute, and is not limited to a power of sale for the purpose of making the payments authorized by the Act. If in regard to any sale of such property the administrator has in fact exercised a discretion, and his conduct has been otherwise bonâ fide, there has been a bonâ fide sale by him within section 17, and the sale cannot be called in question by the convict.

Decision of Buckley, J. (ante p. 166, [1903] 1 Ch. 90), affirmed.

This was an appeal from the decision of Buckley, J. (reported sub. nom. Carr v. Anderson, ante, p. 166, [1903] 1 Ch. 90).

The facts were as follows:

On the 25th of July, 1895, Carr, the plaintiff in this action, was convicted of felony, and sentenced to six years' penal servitude. Sir Robert Anderson was appointed his administrator under the provisions of the Felony Act, 1870, and, as such, took possession of his property. This property consisted of, inter alia, jewellery, shares in the Louisville and Nashville Railway, and certain bonds. During the course of administration all the property was sold with the exception of four foreign bonds, which were alleged to be worthless. The sale of the Louisville and Nashville shares had been conducted by a subordinate official at Scotland Yard who subsequently turned out to be a dishonest person, and who in this particular case, instead of going to a stockbroker, negotiated the sale of the shares through a money-changer. The sale of the jewellery was made under a course of practice alleged to be universally followed at Scotland Yard, property of this sort of comparatively small value being sold without special directions given in respect of it.

In July, 1901, the plaintiff brought this action against Sir Robert Anderson, the late, and Mr. Henry, the present Assistant Commissioner of the Criminal Investigation Department, asking for an account of his property which had come into their hands, for delivery up of what might be found due to him, and for damages for wrongful conversion of his property.

Buckley, J., held that, the defendant, Sir Robert Anderson, having exercised a discretion in the sale of the property, and his conduct having been otherwise bonâ fide, was entitled to rely on the Felony Act, 1870.

The plaintiff appealed.

Astbury, K.C., and M. R. Emanuel used the same arguments in the court below.

Birrell, K.C., and T. T. Methold were not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of opinion that the decision of Buckley, J., was perfectly right. The learned judge had the opportunity of seeing and hearing Sir Robert Anderson, and came to the conclusion that he acted bonâ fide. He has carefully considered the allegations made by the plaintiff and the distinction urged in the case of the jewellery, and has found that the sale of those articles having been in accordance with a well-established practice, the fact that Sir Robert Anderson did not interfere with that practice does not affect him with liability. In my opinion, the mere fact that the defendant did not interfere with such a practice does not show that he exercised no discretion. In my opinion, moreover, such a sale is not unreasonable, and primâ facie is the proper course to be taken in such cases.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. I will only add a few words as to the jewellery. I am satisfied that Sir Robert Anderson knew of the sale, and exercised a certain amount of discretion in not interfering. But it is alleged that there is a practice at Scotland Yard, under which a convict's property is sold without having regard to whether a sale is advisable or not. All I can say is that, if there be such a practice, the sooner it is departed from the better, and if an administrator failed to exercise any discretion in such a sale, and caused someone else in the office to effect such a sale to the loss of a convict's estate, that administrator would probably find himself affected with liability for it if the matter came before this court.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—Under the Felony Act, 1870, an administrator is bound to exercise some discretion on the sale of a convict's property. If he does so exercise it, the sale is binding and cannot afterwards be impeached by the convict. To my mind it is perfectly clear that Sir Robert Anderson did authorize the sale, and exercise his discretion bonâ fide. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Emanuel, Round, & Nathan; Wontner & Sons.

---

From Registrar in Bankruptcy. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) April 3.

In re PILLING.
Ex parte THE BOARD OF TRADE. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Receiving order—Scheme of arrangement—Release of debts by majority of creditors on condition of court's approval of the scheme—Approval of scheme—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 3.

A debtor, who is anxious to obtain the court's approval of a scheme of composition, must lay before the court all the terms and arrangements of that scheme It is not sufficient for the debtor by himself to carry out part of the scheme, and then to come to the court to get its sanction as to the balance of the scheme.

In re E. A. B. (50 W. R. 229, [1902] 1 K. B. 457), and In re Baines (86 L. T. Rep. 691, 50 W. R. Dig. 17), discussed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Registrar Brougham.

The facts were as follows: On the 7th of September, 1898, a receiving order was made against J. R. Pilling. Subsequently the debtor applied for the approval of a composition of 7s. 6d. in the £, payable to those of his creditors who had not released their claims against the estate. At the date of the receiving order the claims against the estate, after various deductions had been made, amounted to £76,671. Creditors for £55,979 of this amount chose to rely on their securities. With regard to the balance of £20,692, creditors for £13,389 had executed releases, each of which releases contained a proviso that the release should have no force or operation unless the composition scheme obtained the sanction of the court.

(a.) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The registrar, on the matter coming before him, came to the conclusion that the composition ought to be approved, and he accordingly ordered the receiving order to be discharged.

The Board of Trade appealed.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., and Muir Mackenzie, for the Board of Trade.—The whole object of section 3 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, is to provide for a settlement under the control of the court. When you get, as here, a withdrawal by private arrangements of the majority of the creditors, the subsequent composition with the remaining creditors is not a scheme which should be sanctioned by the court. The releases here are not absolute, but conditional. It was never intended that such private arrangements as these should be made. The Acts of 1883 and 1890 restored the control of the court in these matters. If this scheme is sanctioned, it will mean that a debtor will practically be enabled to bargain for his discharge with creditors outside the court. The small minority of creditors which remains here, is a residue left for show: In re Dixon and Cardus, 37 W. R. 161, 5 Morr. 291.

Reed, K.C., and P. M. Francke, in support of the scheme.—It is difficult to consider a general principle of law without a separate knowledge of the facts. Here the official receiver, in accordance with the general practice, questioned not only the debtor but also the persons giving the releases to see whether it was a proper sort of arrangement. Moreover, the release is not conditional, it is an absolute release with a defeasance clause. [ROMER, L.J., referred to a passage in the judgment of Blackburn, J., in Newington v. Levy, 19 W. R. 473, L. R. 6, 50 W. R. 299, C. P. 180, at p. 191, as an authority for the proposition that release in this form simply amounted to a covenant not to sue except in a certain event.] It is not for the debtor to satisfy the court that everything is in order.

The following cases were also referred to: In re E. A. B., 50 W. R. 299, [1902] 1 K. B. 457; In re Baines, 86 L. T. Rep. 691, 50 W. R. Dig. 17.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Mr. Registrar Brougham approving of a certain scheme of composition by the debtor under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, s. 3, and the point taken by the Board of Trade is that on the details of the scheme they are left in complete ignorance as to how, under the releases, a large proportion of the debts have been withdrawn. They say that on the face of this scheme and on the face of the documents adduced as part of the scheme, there appear facts which, if unexplained, leave them in doubt as to whether or not this scheme can be a legitimate scheme, and that they ought not to be called upon to approve it. The scheme which is now put forward is this: The debtor says, "I propose to pay my creditors a composition; I pay into court a certain sum for costs, and I will pay in a sum sufficient to pay a composition of 7s. 6d. in the £," and he says in the fourth paragraph that such creditors as released their debts shall not be included in the payment of the composition. Now it turns out that a very considerable percentage of the creditors are said to have released their debts. I think the terms of the release are very important. They say, "Provided always, and it is hereby expressly agreed and declared that if the said proposed composition of 7s. 6d. in the £ or any other proposal for a composition involving payment of 7s. 6d. in the £ shall not be approved by the court, or the receiving order shall not in any other manner be rescinded, then these presents shall have no force or operation." Therefore that document, which is part of the scheme, shows on its face that there is not an absolute release; in fact, that there is only a release that takes place in a certain event which has not happened—namely, the approval of the scheme. The Board say, "This on its face is not a scheme that we can approve of. This agreement has been made simply for the purpose of assisting you in attempting to carry out this scheme; it is an agreement to hold in suspense the right in the creditor of proving for his debt until he finds whether or not you are going to get that scheme passed or not, reserving all his rights as a creditor in the event of your not getting that scheme passed." It seems to me that the Board of Trade are right in their contention, and I think it may be tested in this way. Can the debtor claim to put himself in a better position by keeping back from the official receiver the special terms upon which he has secured the assent of certain creditors; can he be in a better position than if he had averred at the outset as part of the scheme, and before he had carried out his arrangement with his creditors, what he proposed to do? It seems to me that he cannot, and that if he had come forward with a scheme stating on its face that he proposed to bring about an agreement with a given percentage of creditors on the terms that they should approve provisionally a release of their debts subject to the composition being approved, and had stated all the facts, I do not think the official receiver or the Board of Trade would have been justified in accepting such a scheme.

Now it is said here that the registrar who upheld this scheme really decided on the authority of another case—the case of In re E. A. B.—in this court. That appears to me to be the ground of his decision, but when one comes to criticize the case of In re E. A. B. it does not seem to support this view at all. It seems to me, with deference, that he has misapprehended the effect of that decision. There certain of the creditors of the debtor had arranged to release their debts, but they had made that arrangement, as the court held, without the knowledge or privity of the debtor. They had arranged with a third person acting entirely without his knowledge or consent, and in point of fact they had absolutely, not as part of the scheme, but absolutely and finally released their debts, with the result that the creditors—the only creditors left whose interests were to be considered—were the creditors whose debts had not been released. Now that case proceeded upon a totally different ground, and in point of fact it shows, by the grounds upon which it was put, that had the arrangement in question been made, not by a third party without the knowledge of the debtor, but by the debtor himself, the decision of the court would have been totally different. It was dealing with a case where another person entirely outside the debtor's knowledge had obtained releases from several of his creditors. That is not this case, and if the facts, as I have already said, were averred on the face of his scheme, I do not suppose for one moment the debtor could have asked the assent of the court. He would have had to show, if he had averred all the facts on the face of the scheme, the terms upon which he was securing the release provisionally of these persons, and he is in no better position because he has kept that back from the view of the court. There is another case that has been referred to as an authority for the proposition that this release is a complete release. That case—In re Baines—was decided by my brothers Wright and Phillimore, and is reported in 86 L. T. Rep. 691. The head-note is this: "In the absence of fraud the security required by the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, s. 3 sub-section 9, need not extend to debts, releases for which have been executed and delivered as escrows to take effect on the approval of the scheme by the court, but the creditors who have executed such releases have no interest entitling them to vote upon the scheme." That decision again, appears to me to have been arrived at on a misapprehension as to the decision in In re E. A. B. It purports to be decided upon the authority of that case, but against the judgment of the court. Wright, J., said: "I confess that but for the passage cited to us from the case of In re E. A. B., I should have thought that the requirement as to security being found for 7s. 6d. in the £ was inserted in the Bankruptcy Act of 1890 on the ground of public policy, for the very purpose of insuring that the debtor should not by means of private and piecemeal arrangements with friends escape the stigma and possible consequences of bankruptcy in a case where any misconduct was imputed to him, without securing 7s. 6d. in the £ on all the unsecured debts for which he was liable at the date of the receiving order;" and he then held himself bound, contrary to his own judgment, by what he considers the result of the decision in In re E. A. B. But when that case is looked at, and the grounds which I have referred to are considered, it is obvious that that case stands entirely outside the principle which the learned judge seems to think it established. It is not a decision that an escrow is equivalent to a release when it has been brought about by the operation of the debtor himself. It is not dealing with an escrow at all. It is dealing with an absolute release, and an absolute release promoted, not by the debtor, but by a person acting without his privity. It therefore does not justify the decision in In re Baines, and, but for the view that it did justify it, the learned judges who decided In re Baines would not have come to the decision that they did come to. For these reasons I think that the decision of the learned registrar must be reversed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Seeing that the case of In re E. A. B. has been misunderstood, I think it right to add a few words upon the point in addition to what has been said by the Master of the Rolls. In re E. A. B. decided two points. The first was that when you find releases of debts brought about by arrangements to which the debtor was neither a party nor privy, he is not prevented from having a composition, effected with the other creditors, sanctioned by the court merely because of these arrangements which he did not bring about directly or indirectly. The other point decided was this, that debts properly released before the date of the receiving order and the date of the composition, under circumstances which do not affect the bankrupt, need not be regarded in considering the scheme of composition. I should desire to add myself that I do not think it would be necessarily fatal to a scheme of composition that the debtor might have been party to such releases. The releases might have been obtained under circumstances and conditions which reflected in no way upon the debtor, and which might fairly be disregarded by the court in considering the question of the composition. What I do say is this, and this is what governs the present case, that if you find a debtor going about obtaining releases from a large body of his creditors under terms which are unexplained, and then you find he comes seeking to make a composition with the minority of his creditors who remain, then I do say that neither the court nor the official receiver are bound to inquire into or ascertain the circumstances under which those releases were obtained, and the court will not sanction the composition on the assumption that the releases were brought about without bargaining by the debtor or without some consideration or promise passing from him. The court under these circumstances, I think, ought, in the exercise of its discretion, to refuse to accede to the scheme of composition, and especially is that the case if you find the releases conditional on the scheme being approved by the court. That in itself is fatal to this case. There are also two other points which are fatal to the respondents in this appeal. One depends upon the form of release, which has been mentioned by the Master of the Rolls and which I need not repeat; and the other is the fact that it appears from the particular form of the releases that those releases were part, as it were, of the scheme of composition and that the circumstances under which those releases were obtained, or some of those releases, were not fully and properly brought to the consideration of the court as part of the scheme, as should have been done. In a case of this kind it is not sufficient for the debtor as part of a scheme for settling with his creditors to by himself carry out part of his scheme and get releases, and then come to the court and seek to obtain its sanction only with regard to the balance of the scheme. A scheme which is going to settle with the debtor's creditors ought to be brought before the court as a whole and considered by the court as a whole.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. It is not necessary to hold, and I do not hold, that an absolute unconditional release of a debt coupled with the withdrawal of a proof in no way dependent upon or connected with the composition scheme is a fatal objection to the scheme. But here it is apparent upon the face of the documents that there was no absolute unconditional release of the debts, and I think it is equally apparent that the debtor was desirous of making an arrangement with all his creditors; as to 65 per cent. of them in terms the details of which we do not know, and as to 35 per cent. upon terms of paying them 7s. 6d. in the £, and the court when asked to sanction the scheme ought to have before it not merely a proposal for the payment of the 7s. 6d. to the 35 per cent., but all the terms and arrangement as to dealing with the other 65 per cent. I only wish to add one sentence about the case of In re Baines. The decision in that case discharging the order approving of the scheme was, if I may say so, obviously right, but I cannot agree with the observations of Wright, J., and Phillimore, J., for with the greatest respect I think they misunderstood the decision of this court in the case of In re E. A. B. There is nothing in that case which in any way supports the view that releases executed as escrows to become operative only on approval of the scheme are to be put in any way on the same footing as absolute unconditional releases of debts obtained, not by the debtor, but by somebody else without the privity, knowledge, or consent of the debtor. For these reasons I think the appeal ought to be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, The Solicitor to the Board of Trade; Emanuel, Round, & Nathan.

From Chan. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) April 2.

In re EARL HOWE'S SETTLED ESTATES. (a.)

Inland revenue—Estate duty—Payment by instalments—Interest—Tenant for life and remainderman—Charge of interest upon inheritance—Interest properly incurred—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 9 (5).

Though a tenant for life may properly exercise the option given by sub-section 8 of section 6 of the Finance Act, 1894, of paying estate duty by instalments, and thereby incur the obligation of paying interest on the unpaid instalments, he is not, as between himself and the remainderman, relieved by the exercise of such option from his duty to keep down interest on charges, and cannot charge such interest on the inheritance as "interest properly incurred by him" under sub-section 5 of section 9 of the Act.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J.

The facts were as follow: On the death on the 25th of September, 1900, of the third Earl Howe, certain estates, settled by a deed of 1883, under which the third earl was tenant for life, devolved upon the plaintiff, the fourth Earl Howe, as tenant for life, the next tenant for life being Viscount Curzon, an infant, with remainders over.

Estate duty to the amount of £50,163 2s. 3d. became payable on the death of the third earl, and the plaintiff elected, as he was entitled to do under the Finance Act, 1894, to pay this duty by eight annual instalments of £6,270 7s. 9d. each.

The first instalment was paid on the 25th of September, 1901, no interest being payable under the Act on that instalment.

The second instalment fell due on the 25th of September, 1902, and the Commissioners of Inland Revenue applied to the plaintiff for the payment of the same, with interest, amounting to £1,316 15s. 8d., for one year from the 25th of September, 1901, at 3 per cent. on the whole of the unpaid duty.

The plaintiff took out an originating summons asking for a declaration that he was entitled to raise by sale or mortgage of or by charge on the settled estates the interest payable with the instalments as they fell due.

Buckley, J., on the general principle that primâ facie a tenant for life whose income was increased by postponement of the payment of duty ought to bear the interest as the price of the postponement, held that the plaintiff must himself pay the interest and was not entitled to raise it out of the inheritance.

The plaintiff appealed.

By sub-section 8 of section 6 of the Finance Act, 1894, " . . . the duty due upon an account of real property may, at the option of the person delivering the account, be paid by eight yearly instalments . . . with interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum from the date at which the first instalment is due . . . and the first instalment shall be due at the expiration of twelve months from the death, and the interest on the unpaid portion of the duty shall be added to each instalment and paid accordingly . . ."

By section 9, sub-section 5 of the same Act, "a person authorized or required to pay the estate duty in respect of any property shall, for the purpose of paying the duty, or raising the amount of the duty when already paid, have power, whether the property is or is not vested in him, to raise the amount of such duty and any interest and expenses properly paid or incurred by him in respect thereof, by the sale or mortgage of or a terminable charge on that property, or any part thereof."

R. J. Parker and Northcote, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is a person authorized or required to pay the estate duty. He has exercised an option, which it is open for him to exercise under the Act, and by reason of that proper exercise of his option, interest has been incurred by him. This is interest properly incurred by him in respect of the estate duty and may be raised by a mortgage of the inheritance under sub-section 5 of section 9. The object of that sub-section is not to confer a benefit on the tenant for life or on any particular person, but to enable the Crown to obtain payment of what is due. To hold that interest cannot be charged upon the inheritance will have practical results of the highest inconvenience, as insurance companies who now advance the whole sum which appears due on the account delivered by the commissioners, will henceforth be put on inquiry as to how much is due for principal and how much for interest.

Ashworth James, for the remainderman, was not called upon to argue.

Kenyon Parker, for the trustees of the settlement.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from Buckley, J., upon a question arising under the Finance Act, 1894. Counsel for the appellant say in effect that they will be satisfied with nothing short of a declaration that under section 9, sub-section 5, of the Act the tenant for life has the right to charge the inheritance with interest upon the sum payable as estate duty under the Act. Now I am certainly not prepared to go that length. It appears to me that the reasons given by Buckley, J., in his exhaustive judgment have settled the question, and that his decision is right. And when one comes to read the sub-section it appears to me that counsel's contention leaves out the most crucial part of it. No doubt the Finance Act does, under section 6, sub-section 8, allow estate duty to be raised and paid by instalments at the option of the person who has to pay it. Here the tenant for life has elected to pay it by instalments; and the particular point that now arises is whether the tenant for life, having power to raise the duty itself by a charge upon the inheritance, is entitled also to raise the interest payable on that duty, having regard to the fact that the duty is paid by instalments, the interest payable in the present case amounting to £1,316 15s. 8d. Now that question depends upon the construction of section 9, sub-section 5, which is in these terms: [His lordship read the sub-section, and continued:] Now it has not been disputed by counsel for the appellant that it is the duty of the tenant for life to keep down the interest on charges. Now, starting with that primary obligation upon him, has he under this Act to keep down the interest on the instalments, or is he entitled to charge that interest as well as the instalments upon the inheritance? According to the words at the end of the sub-section, the right conferred on him is to raise "any interest and expenses properly paid or incurred by him" in respect of this duty; and unless the tenant for life who comes to ask to be allowed to raise the interest and expenses can aver and prove that the same have been "properly paid or incurred" by him, he is not entitled to the benefit of the sub-section. Now, how can it be said that a tenant for life has power to impose on the persons entitled in remainder the obligation to pay money which he ought himself to pay? How can it be said that interest has been "properly incurred" by him when it has only been incurred by the fact he has not done that which he ought to do—that is, pay the money himself. This, shortly put, appears to be the principle upon which Buckley, J., has decided this case. It may be that the other persons who are authorized under the Act to pay duty by instalments stand on a different footing from a tenant for life. But when you come to the case of a tenant for life it is impossible for the court to dismiss from its mind this latter part of the sub-section and to declare without inquiry and as an abstract proposition that the tenant for life can be allowed to charge the inheritance with the amount of interest on estate duty. Counsel say that to hold that a tenant for life cannot charge the inheritance with interest will be inconvenient to the insurance companies or banks who are in the habit of making advances to tenants for life to enable them to pay the duty and interest. But it is a matter for inquiry as to whether in any particular case the tenant for life has brought himself within the powers given by the sub-section to charge the interest by showing that the interest has been "properly incurred." The interest to be chargeable must of necessity have been properly incurred, and the obligation is upon the tenant for life seeking to charge it upon the inheritance to show that it has been properly incurred. There is nothing before the court in the present case to show whether the interest has been properly incurred, and no special circumstances have been brought to the notice of the court as a reason for allowing the tenant for life to charge the interest. It is not necessary for us now to state what special circumstances would justify the court in allowing a tenant for life to charge the interest, but certainly it is impossible for us to make the declaration asked for here by this tenant for life, that he has an unqualified power of raising the interest by charging it upon the inheritance. I do not mean to say that there might not be cases of hardship in which the court would hold that interest had been properly incurred by the tenant for life within the sub-section, but no such case has been made here. I entirely agree with the reasoning of Buckley, J., and in my opinion the conclusion at which he has arrived is right. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. Under section 6, sub-section 8, a tenant for life has the option given him of paying the estate duty by instalments, and if he exercises that option he has on paying the first instalment of duty to pay also interest upon the unpaid portion of the duty. Now, in the absence of some very special circumstances, it is, in my opinion, the clear duty of the tenant for life as between himself and the remaindermen to keep down the interest which has to be paid on the unpaid portion of the duty, and he is not entitled to cast the duty of paying that interest upon the remaindermen. It is a clear obligation cast upon him alone, and one which, to my mind, he is bound to perform. I can find nothing in the Act which would justify the tenant for life, who is bound to pay the interest as between himself and the remaindermen, by exercising any of the general powers conferred upon him by the Act, to evade the obligation upon him to pay the interest, and enable him to cast that obligation upon the estate. Counsel say that section 9, sub-section 5, gives the tenant for life that power. In my opinion it does not. That sub-section is a general clause giving a general power to various persons, among whom, I agree, is included a tenant for life; but a general power so given would not in my opinion justify a tenant for life in exercising the power so as to unduly favour himself in the way he would do if he were allowed to do what he now asks. In my opinion both his duty and his obligation prevent him from exercising his power so as to give himself an undue advantage. There is nothing in the requirements or necessities of the Crown to induce us to give a tenant for life such a power as is now asked for—namely, a power to exercise the provisions of the sub-section in his favour so as to give himself something to which he is not entitled. Then there is this to be considered, that this application is an application coming from the tenant for life himself asking to be allowed to exercise this power for his own benefit. I think the court is entitled to say "We will not give you the direction you ask for because, although there is a general power given by the Act to various persons that does not justify you in asking us to give a direction which will enable you to exercise that general power for your own benefit." We are not concerned with the position of any person who can say he has advanced money without notice of any duty on the part of the tenant for life in respect of raising the interest. Such a person will be entitled to have his position considered, but all I say is that a tenant for life is not the person entitled to come and ask for it. It is said that our decision will cast doubts upon the title of banks or insurance companies who are in the habit of lending money for the payment of estate duty upon the security of the inheritance Now, I am by no means sure that a person can safely lend money to a tenant for life upon the security of a charge upon the inheritance to enable him to pay the interest on estate duty. If the tenant for life says to such a person, "I am tenant for life and I want to borrow the money upon the security of a charge made by me on the inheritance, which I am entitled to give as between tenant for life and remainderman," in my opinion the person lending the money upon such a security would not have a good title, and I should further say that if a person who had advanced money with such notice could say that he had a good charge for the amount of principal and interest on the inheritance, then the remainderman would be entitled to require the tenant for life, who had so improperly raised money which he ought himself to have paid, to at once indemnify the estate. The result, therefore, is that this tenant for life is asking us to decide that he is entitled to exercise the power in his own favour, while if he had so exercised it himself without coming to the court he would have had to indemnify the estate at the instance of the remainderman. He has no right to come here and ask for any such general direction as he seeks. In my opinion the decision of Buckley, J., was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and will only add a few words. The question is, what are the rights of a tenant for life who pays estate duty. They are defined by section 9, sub-section 6, which says that "a person having a limited interest in any property who pays the estate duty in respect of that property shall be entitled to the like charge as if the estate duty in respect of that property had been raised by means of a mortgage to him." In other words, he is to have a charge of the same nature and to the same extent as if a mortgage of the estate had been given him by the executor under sub-section 5. How can it be said that a tenant for life finding money for the payment of the instalments of estate duty could under sub-section 6 take a mortgage not only for capital but also for the interest which he ought to keep down himself? It seems to me that that reduces the contention of the appellant to an absurdity. The tenant for life cannot under that sub-section himself get a charge in respect of interest which he ought to have kept down. Can it be said, then, that he is able to give a stranger a charge greater than that which he himself would have been entitled to. I do not think so. The stress of the argument rests upon sub-section 5, which enables a tenant for life to raise by sale, mortgage, or charge, not only the duty, but also "any interest and expenses properly paid or incurred by him in respect thereof." It is suggested that those words would be well satisfied by treating them as referring to a person who, not being under a personal liability to pay, is authorized to pay the duty, and may therefore be well entitled to say "I have nothing to do with the limitations of the settlement. I have paid the Crown and insist on receiving back the whole money and interest." But it occurs to me also that the words "interest properly incurred" may have reference to two sub-sections of the Act of 1894 which have been amended by the Act of 1896. Looking at section 6 of the Act of 1894—the section providing for the collection and recovery of estate duty—we find it provides that "interest at the rate of 3 per cent. on the estate duty shall be paid from the date of the death up to the date of the delivery of the Inland Revenue affidavit or account or the expiration of six months after the death, whichever first happens," and shall form part of the estate duty. Those latter words were struck out by Part III. of the schedule to the Finance Act, 1896. I observe that North, J., held in In re Fish, Lea v. Fish, noted 103 Law Times, p. 267, that interest for that period formed part of the duty and was payable out of capital. Therefore, on the face of the Act, there is to be found at least one instance in which interest might become payable out of capital.

Then section 8, sub-section 10, says that "interest on arrears of estate duty shall be paid as if they were arrears of legacy duty." That, again, is repealed by section 16 of the later Act, which provides that simple interest at 3 per cent. shall be payable upon all estate duty from the date of the death, or where the duty is payable by instalments or becomes due at any date later than six months after the death, from the date at which the first instalment on the duty becomes due, and shall be recoverable in the same manner as if it were part of the duty. I am therefore of opinion that the view taken by Buckley, J., and by the Master of the Rolls and Romer, L.J., of sub-section 5 of section 9 is right. It seems to me to be contrary to all principle to allow a tenant for life to charge upon the estate interest which, by the language of the Act and by the policy of the law, is payable by him. If any case of hardship arises in consequence of a tenant for life being called upon to pay the interest on estate duty an appeal must be made, not to the language of the Act, but to the general jurisdiction of the court; but except in cases of that kind I am clearly of opinion that a tenant for life cannot avail himself of the general power of charging given by the Act by exercising it for his own benefit. I agree, therefore, in thinking that this appeal must be dismissed.

Solicitors, Trower, Still, Freeling, & Parkin.

---

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) } Feb. 2, 3, 4, 26.

CAPITAL AND COUNTIES BANK v. RHODES. (a.)

Merger—Lease—Mortgage by sub-demise—Purchase of freehold by lessee—Mortgage of freehold—Entry by mortgagee by sub-demise—Refusal to pay rent—Legal estate—Registered land—Unregistered deed—Land Transfer Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 87), s. 49—Land Transfer Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 65), s. 20—Land Transfer Rules, 1898, rr. 106, 107, 110.

The rule of equity that the question of merger must be decided by the intention of the parties applies to the merger of estates as well as to the merger of charges, and since the Judicature Act, 1873, if the circumstances are such that a court of equity would have held that there was no merger in equity, there is now no merger at law.

Accordingly, where a lessee mortgaged his leasehold interest by way of sub-demise; and subsequently purchased the freehold reversion, and then mortgaged to another both the freehold reversion and also the leasehold term, with the intention that the mortgagee of the freehold should have a security on the unincumbered freehold reversion subject to the lease; and afterwards registered himself under the Land Transfer Act, 1897, as proprietor of the premises with a possessory title, and gave a charge thereon to the last-mentioned mortgagee which was also registered,

Held, that there was no merger of the term in the freehold, and that, apart altogether from the registration, the legal estate was vested in the mortgagee of the freehold, who was entitled to re-enter upon the premises under the proviso to that effect in the original lease on non-payment by the mortgagee by sub-demise who had entered into possession of the premises of the rent reserved by the original lease.

The fact that land is on the Land Register does not prevent its being dealt with by unregistered deeds which have the same operation and effect as if the land were unregistered. The registered proprietor deals with the land by virtue of an overriding power, and not by virtue of any estate in him. Consequently, the register of proprietors is not material for the purpose of ascertaining where the legal estate in registered land is, and such legal estate may be transferred by unregistered deeds.

The special powers given to a registered proprietor to create charges in the prescribed manner do not enable him to pass the legal estate by such charges, nor do they exclude the operation and effect of a common law unregistered mortgage.

Quære, whether a conveyance of the legal estate is a "stipulation" that may properly be added to a statutory charge.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (71 L. J. Ch. 573, 50 W. R. Dig. 115) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported 71 L. J. Ch. 573, 50 W. R. Dig. 115).

The defendant Rhodes was the lessee of No. 10, Stafford-street, under a lease dated the 31st of January, 1871, for a term of ninety-nine years from the 24th of June, 1869, at a yearly rent of £100. The lease contained a proviso for re-entry in favour of the lessor in the event of non-payment of the rent.

On the 20th of May, 1897, Rhodes sub-demised the premises by way of mortgage to Messrs. Flower & Sons (Limited) for the residue of the term except the last day thereof, to secure to Messrs. Flower & Sons the repayment of £5,000 with interest. He appointed the mortgagees his attorneys to assign and transfer the last day of the term, and declared that if the premises were sold under the power of sale or foreclosure, he and the persons claiming under him would stand possessed of the last day of the term in trust for the purchaser or persons foreclosing.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 7th of June, 1899, the freehold reversion was purchased at auction by Rhodes for £3,650; and on the 27th of July, 1899, the freehold of the premises was conveyed to Rhodes subject to, but with the benefit of, the lease of the 31st of January, 1871. On the same day, the 27th of July, 1899, Rhodes mortgaged both the freehold and the leasehold term to the Capital and Counties Bank to secure £3,000, which had been advanced by the bank to enable Rhodes to complete the said purchase.

On the 28th of August, 1899, Rhodes applied to be registered as proprietor, with possessory title, of the freehold, under the Land Transfer Acts.

On the same day he executed a deed by which he charged the land with payment to the bank of the money due and interest under the mortgage of the 27th of July, 1899, and also thereby conveyed the land unto and to the use of the bank in fee simple subject to redemption. This was duly entered in the register of charges, and a certificate thereof was on the 18th of September, 1899, issued to the bank as proprietors of the charge.

On the 17th of April, 1901, Rhodes entered into a deed of arrangement with certain of his creditors. To this deed the Capital and Counties Bank was not a party.

Some time before the 24th of June, 1901, Flower & Sons (Limited) entered into possession of the premises under the powers contained in their mortgage. Shortly after the expiration of twenty-one days from that date the Capital and Counties Bank demanded payment of a quarter's rent due on that day, under the lease of the 31st of January, 1871, from Flower & Sons and from Rhodes's trustee. Flower & Sons refused to pay the rent demanded, on the grounds (1) that the term created by the lease of the 31st of January, 1871, merged in the freehold which had thereby under the provisions of the Real Property Act, 1845, become the reversion expectant on their underlease by way of mortgage under which no rent was payable; and (2) that if it had not merged, still that Rhodes, by acquiring the freehold, could not claim from them the rent reserved by the lease of the 31st of January, 1871, being precluded therefrom by his own contract with them contained in the underlease to them and particularly by the covenant for indemnity implied from his having demised the premises to them as beneficial owners, and that consequently the Capital and Counties Bank, who derived their title through Rhodes, could not claim payment of the rent either, from Flower & Sons (Limited).

This was an action by the Capital and Counties Bank, to which Flower & Sons and Rhodes and his trustee were made defendants. The plaintiffs contended that no merger had been intended by Rhodes and that therefore no merger had taken place; and claimed (1) an account of what was due to them under their mortgages and foreclosure or sale; (2) a declaration that there had been no merger; (3) that they were entitled to re-enter under the proviso for re-entry in the lease of the 31st of January, 1871; and (4) that Flower & Sons (Limited) and Rhodes's trustee ought to be ordered to give up possession.

Kekewich, J., held that whether there was merger or not, Rhodes could not by acquiring the freehold defeat the security he had given to Flower & Sons; that Rhodes could not avail himself as against Flower & Sons of the proviso for re-entry contained in the lease of 1871; and that the bank, having no better title than Rhodes, could not re-enter for non-payment of the rent.

The bank appealed.

Warrington, K.C., and Sampson, for the appellants.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Druce, for the respondents.

Warrington, K.C., replied.

The following cases were referred to in the course of the argument: Thorne v. Cann, [1895] A. C. 11, 43 W. R. Dig. 121; Ingle v. Vaughan Jenkins, 48 W. R. 684, [1900] 2 Ch. 368; Thellusson v. Liddard, [1900] 2 Ch. 635, 48 W. R. Dig. 119; Snow v. Boycott, 40 W. R 603, [1892] 3 Ch. 110; Brandon v. Brandon, 9 W. R. 825; Chambers v. Kingham, 27 W. R. 289, 10 Ch. D. 743.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 26.—COLLINS, M.R.—[His lordship stated the facts, and continued:] The principal question in this case is whether on the purchase by Rhodes of the fee his term was merged in the reversion, the result of which would be that the defendants, Flower & Sons, would hold directly under the owner of the fee (Real Property Act, 1845, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 9), without any obligation to pay rent, while the term held by Rhodes being extinguished, the rent of £100 a year would be no longer payable, and the security held by the bank would be land subject to a term not expiring until 1968, during which no rent could be recovered.

The bank accordingly in this action seek as their principal relief a declaration that there has been no merger of the term in the fee. They also claim a declaration that they are entitled to re-enter upon the premises under the proviso for re-entry in the lease of January, 1871, creating the term, and also demand possession. As to these two latter claims it is quite clear that the plaintiff bank cannot make them good unless the legal estate is vested in them. This, however, is a subordinate point so far as the ultimate rights of the parties are concerned, since the plaintiffs would have no difficulty in getting in the legal estate if they are right on the principal question. The question, therefore, in this view resolves itself into one of merger or no merger?

Now it seems to me quite clear that if the intention of the parties is that which determines this question, they certainly did not intend that a merger should take place. It is clear upon the facts that Rhodes could not have carried out his intention of purchasing the reversion without the co-operation of the bank, and that it was an essential condition of his getting that advance that he should be able to offer them the security of the rent of £100 per annum payable under the lease of the 31st of January, 1871. Apart from the terms of the instruments themselves by which the transactions were carried out, this is abundantly clear from the conditions of sale at the auction, which describe the property put up as "a freehold ground-rent," and refer to the value of the reversion and the substantial premiums likely to be paid for a renewal of the lease; and also from the document forwarded, by the bank managers with whom Rhodes opened negotiations, to the head office. This latter document contains the particulars of the advance demanded and the security offered, together with some observations as to the nature of the security. The security offered is described in terms similar to those in the conditions of sale as a freehold ground-rent of £100 per annum, and the value assigned to it is £3,650. The conveyance of the fee to Rhodes on the 27th of July is stated to be "subject to and with the benefit of the term," and in the mortgage of the same date from Rhodes to the security on the unincumbered freehold reversion, subject to the lease. This was the real bargain, and it was plainly to the interest of the bank. The money would not have been advanced to Rhodes except on the security of the freehold ground-rent. This being so, it follows that whatever forms were adopted, no merger which would destroy the ground-rent ought to be allowed, and it might be sufficient to leave the case there. But it is perhaps desirable to consider the various steps.

By reason of section 20 of the Land Transfer Act of 1897 the conveyance of the 27th of July, 1899, did not upon delivery pass the legal estate. It remained in the vendors until the 28th of August, when Rhodes was first registered as proprietor. Therefore on the execution of the conveyance Rhodes had the equitable fee and the legal term, and thus far there was no merger. The charge of the 27th of July in favour of the bank operated upon the equitable fee and also upon the legal term. Whether it made the bank assignee of the term or whether it gave the bank an interest short of the legal term is a question of some difficulty. In the former view there could have been no merger unless and until the bank acquired the legal fee by reason of the charge of the 28th of August. In the latter view there might be merger the instant the legal fee vested in Rhodes on the 28th of August upon his being entered on the register of proprietors. Upon the whole I think the latter view—i.e., that the bank did not become legal assignee of the term, is preferable and more in accordance with the language of the mortgage of the 27th of July.

But for my present purpose it is not material to consider which view is correct. The intention of the parties was clear that there should not be a merger. Moreover, the terms of the mortgage by way of sub-demise in favour of the respondents serve to support this conclusion. For by that mortgage Rhodes irrevocably appointed the respondents his attorneys to assign and transfer the last day of the term, and further declared that on a sale or foreclosure he would stand possessed of the last day in trust for the purchaser or persons foreclosing. It may well be argued that his position as trustee rendered it improper, if not impossible, for him to merge the term. But I prefer not to rely upon this argument. It is sufficient to say that the respondents have no right as against the appellants to something for which they never bargained with Rhodes, and which, if they get it at all, is due to a mere accident.

The result is that, in my opinion, there has been no merger of the term, and there must be a declaration to that effect.

The second question obliges me to consider carefully the scheme of the Land Transfer Act, 1875, as modified by the Land Transfer Act, 1897. It is to be observed that there is no compulsion under the Act of 1875, and with one exception there is no compulsion, direct or indirect, under the Act of 1897. The Acts establish a register of proprietors and a register of charges. The term "proprietors" is somewhat misleading, for persons entered on the register of proprietors need not have the legal fee vested in them, nor even any estate in the land. For example, a tenant for life may be the registered proprietor, or a trustee with power of sale but without any estate (section 6 of the Act of 1897), or the registered proprietor may be a mere nominee (section 5 of the Act of 1875). So far as I am aware no mention is made of "legal estate" except in section 20 of the Act of 1897 and in rule 59 of the Land Transfer Rules, 1898. The registered proprietor, whoever he may be, has a statutory power to transfer the property by a registered disposition, subject only, where the transfer is for value, to such incumbrances, restrictions, inhibitions, and notices as are inserted in the register or mentioned in the statutes (sections 29 and 30 of the Act of 1875), and subject also, where the land is registered with a possessory title, to the provisions of section 32 of the same Act. The registered proprietor has also a statutory power to create charges (section 22 of the Act of 1875). In short, the register of proprietors is not material for the purpose of ascertaining where the legal estate is. The transfer by registered disposition takes effect by virtue of an overriding power and not by virtue of any estate in the registered proprietor. By section 49 of the Act of 1875 the registered proprietor is the only person who can transfer or charge registered land by a registered disposition, but the section proceeds, "subject to the maintenance of the estate and right of such proprietor, any person, whether the registered proprietor or not of any registered land, having a sufficient estate or interest in such land, may create estates, rights, interests, and equities in the same manner as he might do if the land were not registered; and any person entitled to or interested in any unregistered estates, rights, interests, or equities in registered land may protect the same from being impaired by any act of the registered proprietor by entering on the register such notices, cautions, inhibitions, or other restrictions as are in this Act in that behalf mentioned." It is remarkable that the section does not say that any person not being the registered proprietor may create estates by unregistered deeds. It expressly includes the registered proprietor in the class of persons who may do so. There is nothing to suggest that all estates created by unregistered deeds must be equitable. Indeed it seems clear that a lease granted by an owner in fee or by a limited owner by an ordinary unregistered deed will pass the legal estate except in the case provided for by rule 59 of a lease for a term of forty years or more, or for two or more lives. The express provision that in this case the legal estate shall not pass until registration implies that in every other case the legal estate will pass. I can find nothing which prevents the passing of the legal estate by a mortgage created by an ordinary deed executed by an owner in fee, whether he is or is not a registered proprietor, and section 49 seems to me to assert the contrary. Notwithstanding that the land has become registered land, it may still be dealt with by deeds having the same operation and effect as they would have if the land were unregistered, subject only to the risk of the title being defeated, or in the language of section 49 the "estate" being "impaired," by the exercise of the statutory powers of disposition given to the registered proprietor, against which the mortgagee must protect himself by notice on the register. It is worthy of remark that section 20 of the Act of 1897, which provides that a person shall not under a conveyance on sale acquire the legal estate unless and until he is registered as proprietor is, by sub-section 2, limited to the first registration. In other words, it is merely a sort of indirect compulsion, a means of getting land on the register. It does not alter the general scheme of the Act after the land is once upon the register. The legal estate will pass on any subsequent conveyance on sale without registration. There is no penalty imposed for non-registration. Although the land cannot be removed from the register (section 17 of the Act of 1897), there is no necessity for any change to be made in the register of proprietors. Conveyancing may proceed just as if the Acts of 1875 and 1897 had not been passed. Self interest and the desire for security will doubtless induce persons, whether purchasers or mortgagees or lessees.

to make use of the registers. But the legal operation and effect of common law assurances will remain untouched by the want of registration. I have not forgotten that there are special powers conferred upon the registered proprietor to create charges in the prescribed manner which will not pass the legal estate, but which give a right of entry, a power of sale, and the right to foreclose, with an ultimate right after foreclosure absolute, to apply to be registered as proprietor of the land (sections 22-28 of the Act of 1875). But these provisions do not seem to me to negative or exclude the operation and effect of a common law unregistered mortgage. If it be urged that there is no express provision to enable a person claiming under or through an unregistered conveyance to procure himself to be registered as proprietor, I think the answer is supplied by sections 93, 95, and 96 of the Act of 1875: If the registered proprietor refuses to do what is right, the court has full power to direct the register to be rectified in such manner as it thinks just. I may add there is no express provision for the case of a nominee refusing on the request of the proper persons to execute a registered disposition. But I cannot doubt that the sections above referred to, suffice to enable the court in all cases for which no express provision is made in the Act or in the rules, to cause the register of proprietors to be rectified so as to confer the statutory benefits of registration upon any person who, in the opinion of the court, is entitled to claim those benefits. It is important to observe that a mortgagee who desires to take advantage of the special statutory privileges conferred by a registered charge, must take a charge in the prescribed manner (section 22 of the Act of 1875). Rule 106 gives by reference to the schedule a form (39) by which the legal estate does not pass, with certain optional variations and special stipulations; any departure from this form is attended with some risk. I think it is clear that a mortgagee could not insist upon the registration of a deed in the statutory form with a conveyance of the legal estate, which is the form adopted in the present case. But by rule 107, "In addition to or in substitution for the stipulation permitted by form 39, any other stipulations of which the registrar shall approve may be added to a charge." The registrar has in fact approved of this particular addition, treating it as a "stipulation," and has entered the deed on the register. It is not, however, material for the purpose of the present appeal to consider whether the entry of the deed on the register as a statutory charge was or was not authorized, for in either case the legal estate passed. The result is that in my opinion the legal estate is vested in the appellants by virtue of the mortgage deed of the 28th of August, and that they have a legal right of re-entry for non-payment of rent under the still subsisting lease, vested in Rhodes or persons claiming through him. It follows that the appeal must be allowed.

Solicitors, Cameron, Kemm, & Co.; Frank Osbaldeston, & Co.; Crossman, Prichard, & Bloch.

---

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Farwell, J. — March 28.

In re ERMEN.
TATHAM v. ERMEN. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Taxation—Instructions for originating summons—Discretion of taxing officer—Rules of the Supreme Court, Appendix N, No 65, ord. 65, rr. 8, 27, sub-rules 29, 37—Practice Notes on Taxation of Costs settled by the Masters in Hilary Sittings, 1902.

In taxing the costs for instructions for an originating summons the taxing officer is not bound by the limit of £1 1s. in R. S. C., Appendix N, No. 65, but has a discretion to allow a larger amount under ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rule 29.

McIver & Co. v. Tate Steamers (Limited), 50 W. R. 642, [1902] 2 K. B. 184, discussed and followed.

This was an application to review taxation of costs.

The proceedings out of which the application arose were commenced by originating summons for the purpose of determining certain questions under the will of F. J. Ermen, deceased.

By an order of the 15th of August, 1901, the costs of all parties were directed to be taxed as between solicitor and client.

The plaintiffs included in their costs the sum of £5 5s. for instructions for the originating summons. On taxation by the district registrar a sum of £4 4s. was disallowed.

The district registrar was of opinion that if he had any discretion to increase this item beyond £1 1s. he considered that the fee of £5 5s. charged was quite reasonable. But he held that he had no such discretion, and that under the Rules of the Supreme Court, Appendix N, No. 65, and the Practice Notes on Taxation of Costs settled by the Masters in Hilary Sittings, 1902, the maximum of £1 1s. was not to be exceeded.

The Rules of the Supreme Court, ord. 65, r. 8, provide: "In causes and matters commenced after these rules come into operation, solicitors shall be entitled to charge and be allowed the fees set forth in the column headed 'lower scale' in Appendix N in all causes and matters, and no higher fees shall be allowed in any case, except such as are by this order otherwise provided for. . . ."

Appendix N, No. 65: "For originating summons, 6s. 8d., or not to exceed £1 1s."

Ord. 65, r. 27: "Special allowances and general regulations." "The following special allowances and general regulations shall apply to all proceedings and all taxations in the Supreme Court of Judicature."

Sub-clause 29 provides: "On every taxation the taxing-master shall allow all such costs, charges, and expenses as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party . . ."

Sub-clause 37 provides: "The rules, orders, and practice of any court whose jurisdiction is transferred to the High Court of Justice or Court of Appeal, relating to costs, and the allowances of the fees of solicitors and attorneys, and the taxation of costs, existing prior to the commencement of the principal Act, shall, in so far as they are not inconsistent with the principal Act and these rules, remain in force and be applicable to costs of the same or analogous proceedings, and to the allowances of the fees of solicitors of the Supreme Court and the taxation of costs in the High Court of Justice and Court of Appeal. [But the taxing-masters shall have power to revise and regulate the practice in regard to taxation of costs, and to the allowance of fees so as to assimilate the allowances for costs, and to secure uniformity upon all taxations so far as may be practicable and expedient.]"

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Practice Notes on Taxation of Costs settled by the Masters in Hilary Sittings, 1902, termed the Blue Book, provide on p. 19 that under the heading "Instructions for Originating Summons, the maximum of £1 1s. under Appendix N, No. 65, will not be exceeded."

Haldane, K.C., and A. G. Roby, for the plaintiffs, cited McIver & Co. v. Tate Steamers (Limited), 50 W. R. 642, [1902] 2 K. B. 184; and In re Harrison, 33 Ch. D. 52.

G. Lawrence, for the defendants.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: In this case the learned registrar, after consulting the taxing-masters in London, has considered he has no jurisdiction or no discretion to allow more than the maximum of £1 1s. prescribed by Appendix N, No. 65, or by the "Blue Book"—which I will use as a short and convenient phrase—although if he had had such a discretion he considered that the fee of £5 5s. claimed was a proper and reasonable one to be allowed. In my opinion, on the construction of the rules, apart from any question of authority, the learned registrar or the taxing-master has not taken the right view.

Now, ord. 65, r. 8, is a rule of old standing, and contains negative words: "In causes and matters commenced after these rules come into operation, solicitors shall be entitled to charge and be allowed the fees set forth in the column headed 'lower scale' in Appendix N in all causes and matters, and no higher fees shall be allowed in any case, except such as are by this order provided for." Turning to find what are otherwise provided for, I find a fasciculus of clauses headed "Special allowances and general regulations," and rule 27 with, I think, fifty-eight sub-clauses. One of those sub-clauses is No. 29. In the old rules, before January, 1902, rule 29 was simply expressed in the negative form. You have in rule 8 a regulation commencing with the negative words that "no higher fees shall be allowed in any case except such as are by this order otherwise provided for." And by the old rule 29: "As to costs to be paid or borne by another party, no costs are to be allowed which do not appear to the taxing officer to have been necessary or proper," and so on. In January of last year it was thought fit to alter that rule, and the rule has now been put into the affirmative form. I think it is a fair statement to say that when eminent persons like the Rule Committee alter the phraseology of a rule they intend to alter the substance also. When you find that you are dealing with a set of sub-clauses under the head "special allowances and general regulations," which involve or may involve an exception to the negative words in rule 8, "No higher fees shall be allowed," and when you find only a negative clause that such and such a thing shall not be allowed, it is impossible to hold (and in fact the contrary was held) that you could under that exceed the maximum limit fixed in Appendix N. But when you alter those negative words into the affirmative and make it an express power, then, having regard to the collocation in which you find it, it appears to me that the Rule Committee did intend to give that general discretion which the words import: "On every taxation the taxing-master shall allow all such costs, charges, and expenses as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice," and so on, with certain exceptions which are not now material. If I am to adopt the taxing-master's view, I have to read in there, after "shall allow all such costs, charges, and expenses as shall appear to him," and so on, the words "not exceeding the limit fixed in Appendix N." But this in itself is one of the set of sub-clauses which are themselves the exceptions referred to in rule 8, "except such as are by this order otherwise provided for." I see no difficulty in giving the general discretion to the officers of the court, although it be coupled with the ordinary application of a maximum and minimum. I see no reason why the taxing-master should not have in effect what is a two-fold discretion; first of all to allow the maximum or minimum or something between, and, in addition to that, have in special cases a general discretion to allow "all such costs, charges, and expenses as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party." On these two clauses, that appears to me to be the true construction; nor do I find anything to my mind contrary to that in sub-rule 37. The object of the rule—I suppose one is entitled to state what one knows to have been the views of the mischief which was aimed at and intended to be abrogated by the rule—was this. It was said that the costs allowed in the King's Bench Division were allowed on a less liberal scale than in the Chancery Division, and it was desirable that both should be assimilated, so that the suitors should not have any particular preference for one division than another, and accordingly rule 37 having prescribed the old original rules and practice of the old courts, the new words were added: "But the taxing-masters shall have power to revise and regulate the practice in regard to taxation of costs and to the allowance of fees so as to assimilate the allowance for costs, and to secure uniformity upon all taxations as far as may be practicable and expedient."

In the first place there are no words there authorizing the taxing-masters to fix an absolute minimum or maximum so as to deprive themselves of the discretion which I have already held they have received under rule 29, and it would be somewhat extraordinary if this had given the taxing-master power beyond that, and in abrogation of that contained in the rule itself, and a greater power than contained in Appendix N. In my opinion the intention of that was to enable the taxing-masters, for the sake of uniformity, as a general rule to follow the same lines, to enable them to settle rules which would be the ordinary rules by which they would be guided, but leaving them in special cases the unfettered discretion given by regulation 29. That is my own opinion on the construction.

It was perhaps unnecessary for me to give this judgment, because I consider that I am bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal of McIver & Co. v. Tate Steamers (Limited), 50 W. R. 642, [1902] 2 K. B. 184. I am not sure that the decision is not open to some of the criticisms that Mr. Lawrence has bestowed upon it, but even if it were, the argument presented to the court there was exactly the same as the argument presented to me here. The question there turned on the allowance to a country solicitor for attending—it was No. 147, I think, in Appendix N—"Not to exceed £2 2s." The words were the same as the words relied on in the present case, and that was the point argued; whether or not other points were argued is not material for me to consider. Mathew L.J., says: "It is argued that under the rules the master had no discretion to allow these costs. According to the practice as to taxation of costs between party and party prior to the rules of January, 1902, the scale given in Appendix N was no doubt binding on the master and this allowance could not have been made. But, on consideration of the objections to this rule, it was thought desirable to modify it to some extent, and accordingly the new rule 10"—that is, regulation 29 that I have read, and which annulled the old regulation 29—"provides as follows"; then he read the new rule, and he goes on: "We are asked to construe this rule as meaning that the taxing-master shall allow no costs, charges, or expenses beyond those provided for by the scale given in Appendix N. The new regulation was framed with full knowledge of the terms of the old regulations and of the scale, and it cannot, I think, be doubted that it ought to be construed according to its terms—namely, as giving the master on 'every taxation' discretion to allow such costs, charges, and expenses as appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice," and so on. Mr. Lawrence seized on the words which are put in brackets—"every taxation." It is quite true that by the insertion of those words the old rule was altered, so that it extends now to every taxation and not merely to party and party taxations; but that is not to my mind the only part of the alteration in the rule, or, indeed, the gist of the alteration; the gist of the alteration was, as I have already said, making an affirmative power for the purpose of enabling the creation of an exception, within the exception of rule 8, in place of the old negative words which gave no such discretion at all. Then Cozens-Hardy, L.J., in the same case, gave judgment to the same effect.

I consider, in any case, I am bound by that decision. I do not follow the distinction which Master Baker has made. The result is that I allow the objection and the item, and there will be a declaration that the registrar had the discretion in question, and the item will be allowed.

Solicitors, Wheatly, Son, & Daniel; Bower, Cotton, & Bower.

---

K. B. Div. (Walton, J.) March 4, 11.

PRICE & CO. v. UNION LIGHTERAGE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Contract—Carrier—Lighterage—Negligence of lighterman—Barring clause—Duty of exercising reasonable skill and care—Loss or damage coverable by insurance.

A contract by the defendants to lighter a cargo contained the following clause: "The rates charged by us are for conveyance only, and we will not be liable for any loss of or damage to goods which can be covered by insurance. The terms of the marine or other policy should stipulate that insurance is effected without recourse to lighterman. We will not be responsible for any consequences arising from strikes or other labour disturbances."

A barge which was being used in carrying out the said contract was left moored to a jetty, and, owing to the negligence of the lighterman, became jammed under a projecting part of the jetty, resulting in a sinking of the barge and a loss of the plaintiffs' cargo.

Held, that although a carrier could by contract exempt himself and his servants from liability for negligence, yet he must use some express, plain, and unambiguous terms to express that intention, and that mere general words will not exempt a carrier from using reasonable skill and care.

Held, further, that the above clause meant that the defendants undertook no liability as insurers, but did not exempt them from the obligation of using reasonable care and skill; and consequently that the defendants were liable to the plaintiffs for the loss of the cargo.

Action tried in the Commercial Court.

The plaintiffs claimed damages for breach of contract.

The defendants agreed to carry in one of their barges a quantity of petroleum, belonging to the plaintiffs, from a wharf at Thames Haven to Belvedere.

Whilst moored to the wharf the barge sank, owing, as the plaintiffs alleged, to the negligence of the defendants' lightermen or to the unseaworthiness of the barge, or to both causes, whereby the oil was lost.

The defendants alleged that there was no negligence on their servants' part, and further that the loss caused was such as came within the exemption of the terms of the contract.

The contract was subject to a clause printed on the stationery used by the defendants in their business, which was as follows:

"The rates charged by us are for conveyance only, and we will not be liable for any loss of or damage to goods which can be covered by insurance. The terms of the marine or other policy should stipulate that insurance is effected without recourse to lighterman. We will not be responsible for any consequences arising from strikes or other labour disturbances."

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Bailhache, for the plaintiffs.

Scrutton, K.C., and Lochnis, for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 11.—WALTON, J.—In this case the plaintiffs seek to recover damages from the defendants for the loss of a quantity of oil which was shipped at a jetty at Thames Haven in a barge of the defendants, under a contract between them and the plaintiffs, by which the defendants agreed to receive and lighter the oil for the plaintiffs to Belvedere, up the River Thames. The oil was shipped about high water, early in the afternoon of the 31st of October, 1902, and the barge when loaded was allowed to remain moored to the jetty until after low water. As the barge rose with the rising tide its gunwale caught under a projecting part of the face of the jetty, against which it was lying, and as the tide rose the barge was held down, and so was submerged and sunk.

The plaintiffs allege that the loss was caused by the negligence of the defendants' lighterman in leaving the barge unattended during the rise of the tide, or by the unseaworthiness of the barge, or by both causes. In my opinion the plaintiffs have failed to prove that the barge was unseaworthy, and it follows that if they are entitled to succeed at all it must be on the ground that the loss was caused by the negligence of the defendants' servant. As to this, the defendants say that by the terms of the contract they are exempt from liability for a loss so caused, and they say further that there was no negligence. It is necessary, therefore, to ascertain what the terms of the contract were. The contract was not contained in any written document, but it is admitted that by the course of dealing between the parties the lighterage was subject to the terms of a clause which was printed on the forms of stationery used by the defendants in their business, and is as follows: "The rates charged by us are for conveyance only, and we will not be liable for any loss of or damage to goods which can be covered by insurance. The terms of the marine or other policy should stipulate that insurance is effected without recourse to lighterman. We will not be responsible for any consequences arising from strikes or other labour disturbances."

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In dealing with the question of construction I shall assume that the loss was brought about by the negligence of the defendants' lighterman Upon the question of construction the controversy between the parties is as to whether the clause in question exempts the lighterage company from liability for a loss caused by the negligence of their servants. It is plain that such a loss as occurred in the present case is covered by an ordinary marine policy. The loss of cargo by the accidental sinking of a barge is a loss by perils of the sea, and is recoverable from underwriters as such whether brought about by the negligence of the lighterman or not. It may be, and probably is, true that when the clause speaks of losses which can be covered by insurance it means losses which can be covered by insurance in the ordinary course of business. Negligence of lightermen is not one of the risks named in the common forms of policies on goods; but there is no doubt it can be insured against specifically without any difficulty, and, as I have said, a loss such as occurred in the present case is covered even by the ordinary form of a marine policy on goods, whether the loss was brought about by negligence or not. It follows that the words of the clause, "loss of goods which can be covered by insurance," are wide enough to include the loss which occurred in this case, even assuming that it was caused by negligence. And if it were right or permissible to deal with this case without regard to the rules of construction which have been laid down in a well-known series of cases, and looking only at the language used, it might very well be said that its meaning was that the defendants were to be exempt from liability for insurable losses caused by negligence or not.

But there is, I think, a well-established rule of construction applicable to the present case. The law of England, unlike in this respect to the law of the United States of America, does not forbid the carrier to exempt himself by contract from liability for the negligence of himself and his servants; but if the carrier desires so to exempt himself it requires that he shall do so in express, plain, and unambiguous terms. In Phillips v. Clark, 5 W. R. 582, 2 C. B. N. S. 156, the damage was by leakage and breakage, and by the bill of lading the shipowner was not to be "accountable for leakage and breakage," but it was held that if the leakage and breakage were due to the negligence of the servants of the shipowner he was not protected from liability by the exemption in the bill of lading. In that case Willes, J., said at p. 163, "The introduction of the words in the margin of the bill of lading is sufficiently accounted for by the fact that without them the defendant would have been bound to the strictest care, so as to deliver the goods at the end of the voyage in the same state and condition as they were in when he received them, without reference to the negligence. It appears from the observations of Lord Wensleydale in Walker v. Jackson, 10 M. & W. 161, that, in the absence of fraud, the carrier is bound as an insurer to carry and deliver the goods as they are when he receives them—as is pointed out by some members of the court in Wyld v. Pickford, 8 M. & W. 443. The defendant gets rid of that liability in the present case by the introduction of the words 'not accountable for leakage or breakage,' but not of the obligation which the law imposes upon him of taking reasonable care of the goods intrusted to him. . . . (2 C. B. N. S., p. 164). The true meaning of the contract is, 'I will take all reasonable care of the goods, but will not be accountable for a loss arising from leakage or breakage such as usually happens without the exercise of extraordinary care.' The owner engages only to abstain from negligence."

In Steinman v. Angler Line, 39 W. R. 392, [1891] 1 Q. B. 619, the exemption in the bill of lading was from liability for losses caused by "thieves of whatever kind whether on board or not," but the court held that this did not protect the shipowner from liability for a theft committed by his servants. The general rule is stated by Bowen, L.J., in his judgment as follows: "This question of construction must be decided on the broad principle which has been so long and so constantly invoked in the interpretation of contracts with carriers by sea as well as land—viz., that words of general exemption from liability are only intended (unless the words are clear) to relieve the carrier from liability where there has been no misconduct or default on his part or that of his servants. The exceptions in a bill of lading are not intended to excuse the carrier from the obligation of bringing due skill and care on the part of himself and his servants to bear both upon the stowing and upon the carrying of the cargo. Even in cases within the exceptions the shipowner is not protected if default or negligence on his part or that of his servants has contributed to the loss. Accordingly, in Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co. (Limited), 14 W. R. 893, L. R. 1 C. P. 600, on appeal, 16 W. R. 796, L. R. 3 C. P. 476, an exception in a bill of lading of 'accidents of whatever nature or kind soever' was held not to cover a collision caused by the negligence of master and crew: see also Phillips v. Clark; Czech v. General Steam Navigation Co., 16 W. R. 130, L. R. 3 C. P. 14. It is the duty of the shipowner by himself and his servants to do all he can to avoid the excepted perils; the exception, in other words, limits the liability, and not the duty."

I understand the meaning of this to be that an exemption in general words, not expressly relating to negligence, even though the words are wide enough to include loss by the negligence or default of the carrier's servants, must be construed as limiting the liability of the carrier as insurer, and not as relieving him from the duty of exercising reasonable skill and care. If the carrier desires to relieve himself from the duty of using by himself and his servants reasonable skill and care in the carriage of goods, he must do so in plain language and explicitly, and not by general words. I may refer to Mitchell v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., 23 W. R. 853, L. R. 10 Q. B. 256, as another illustration of this rule. There the carriers, who were the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., after the goods had arrived at their destination, gave notice to the consignees that the railway company held the goods to the order of the consignees "not as carriers but as warehousemen." But it was held that the words "at owners' sole risk" amounted to no more than a notice that the railway company after giving such notice undertook no liability as insurers, and did not relieve them from liability for a loss arising from the negligence of their servants.

It really comes to this—that if a carrier wishes to exempt himself from liability for the negligence of his servants, he must insert in his contract in one form or another something equivalent to what is well known as a negligence clause. I think that this view of the law as applicable to the present case is, at all events, supported by the judgment of the House of Lords in Ciceri v. Sutton, 15 App. Cas. 144, 38 W. R. Dig. 38. And I may point out, as Lord Herschell did in that case, that the clause in question in this case, as in that, seems to refer to conveyance in contradistinction to insurance. I think that, in obedience to the rule laid down in the cases which I have cited, the clause must be read as meaning "I will use reasonable skill and care in the conveyance of the goods, but I will not undertake any liability as insurer for loss or damage which can be covered by insurance with underwriters." In my opinion, therefore, if the loss was in fact caused by the negligence of the lighterman, the defendants are liable. It may be convenient to add a reference to the case of Compania de Navigacion La Flecha v. Brauer, 168 U. S. S. C. Rep. 104, in which the Supreme Court had to consider the effect of the English authorities upon this question.

I have now to consider whether there was negligence in fact. I have considered the evidence given on each side and have arrived at the following conclusions. There were projections from the face of the jetty against which the barge was moored which in my opinion made it dangerous to leave the barge unattended after low water to rise with the tide. I think the danger was apparent. It is true that there was a floating boom attached to the jetty which was intended to act as a fender to prevent barges whilst loading from striking against the wood work of the jetty. But it is clear that this boom was insufficient to prevent barges, if unattended, from getting caught as they rose with the tide under the projecting parts of the jetty. I am satisfied from the evidence that it was not reasonable or proper to leave the barge unattended, relying on the boom to prevent such an accident as in fact occurred. It is said that no such accident had occurred before. But there is no evidence to show that it was usual to leave loaded barges unattended and moored to the jetty to rise with the tide. On the contrary there were buoys provided just above and just below the jetty for loaded barges to moor at whilst waiting for their tugs. And in the present case after the barge was loaded the lighterman was told to take the barge to one of the buoys, but he neglected to do so because, in my opinion, he did not care to take the trouble to move the barge and thought that his tug might perhaps come at or about low-water.

I am satisfied also upon the evidence that the lighterman did leave the barge without sufficient or proper attendance. He says that after leaving the jetty in the afternoon he returned two or three times to look after the barge. I cannot accept his evidence as to these visits as accurate. And I have no doubt that he neglected to attend to the barge reasonably and properly under the circumstances. I agree that it is not in all cases necessary that a lighterman shall be in attendance upon a barge moored in the river. If, for instance, this barge had been moored at one of the buoys it might, I think, have been left unattended without danger. But I am satisfied that it was not reasonably safe or proper, at all events after the tide began to rise, to leave this barge moored as she was without attendance. In consequence of the barge being so left her gunwale caught under a projection of the jetty and she sank. I think that the defendants are liable for the loss thereby occasioned. There will be judgment for the plaintiffs for £370 3s. 7d., with costs, except costs of issue of unseaworthiness, which are to be paid by plaintiffs.

Judgment for plaintiffs.

Solicitor for plaintiffs, Farnfield.

Solicitor for defendants, E. C. Harvey.

---

K. B. Div. (Walton, J.) March 4, 9.

SHILLITO v. BIGGART & FULTON. (a.)

Ship — Mortgage of ship — Assignment of freight — Freight due and payable before possession taken — Interpleader.

Balance of freight was earned and became due and payable on the 17th of June, 1902, in respect of a cargo carried by a vessel. The sum so due was assigned by the shipowners to the plaintiff. The defendants, who were mortgagees of the vessel under a mortgage deed dated the 11th of October, 1900, took possession of the vessel on the 14th of August, 1902. The freight, which had become due on the 17th of June, 1902, remained unpaid at the date when the defendants, as mortgagees, took possession of the vessel.

Held, that as the freight became due and payable before the defendants, as mortgagees, took possession, the plaintiffs were entitled to the sum so due.

Interpleader issue tried in the Commercial Court.

The plaintiff claimed as assignee of the shipowners a sum of £527 9s. 11d., balance of freight which became due from the Brazilian Coal Co. (Limited) to Messrs. Woodruff, Shillito, & Co., the owners of the steamship Craigearn, in respect of a cargo carried by the said vessel.

The defendants were the mortgagees of the vessel under a mortgage deed dated 11th of October, 1900, and claimed the sum due as such.

The sum in question was earned, and became due and payable on the 17th of June, 1902.

After discharging a cargo at Santos the steamship Craigearn loaded another cargo in the River Plate for Hull, and arrived at the latter place on the 14th of August, 1902.

On arrival the defendants, as mortgagees, took possession of the vessel. In fact, the freight which was due and payable on the 17th of June had not been paid when the defendants took possession.

For the plaintiff it was contended that though the defendants were entitled to freight which became due after they had taken possession, they could not claim freight which became due and payable before they took possession, even though it had not been paid until after possession was taken.

For the defendants it was contended that all freight earned by the ship and unpaid at the time when possession was taken could be claimed.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Lochnis, for the plaintiff.

Pickford, K.C., and Joseph Hurst, for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 9.—WALTON, J.—In this interpleader issue the question is whether a sum of £527 9s. 11d., which is in court, is the property of the plaintiff or of the defendants. The sum in question is a balance of freight which became due from the Brazilian Coal Co. (Limited) to Messrs. Woodruff, Shillito, & Co., who were the owners of the steamship Craigearn, in respect of the carriage of a cargo of coals to Santos by such steamship. This balance of freight was earned and became due and payable on the 17th of June, 1902. The plaintiff claims it as the assignee of the shipowners, Messrs. Woodruff, Shillito, & Co. The defendants dispute his claim and contend that they are entitled to the money in question as mortgagees of the steamship by a mortgage dated the 11th of October, 1900.

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

After discharging her cargo of coals at Santos the steamer loaded a cargo in the River Plate for Hull, where she arrived on the 14th of August, 1902, and on her arrival the defendants entered into possession of the steamship as mortgagees. Although the freight in question had become due on the 17th of June, it had not been paid when the mortgagees entered into possession on or about the 14th of August, 1902. The defendants contend that they are entitled to all freight earned by the vessel and unpaid at the time when they entered into possession. The plaintiff, on the other hand, contends that, although the defendants are entitled to freight which became due after they took possession, they are not entitled to freight which became due and payable before, although it may not have been paid until after they took possession. It is somewhat surprising to find that the question which arises in the present case has not been settled by an express decision in some reported case. I am not satisfied that Chinnery v. Blackburne, 1 H. Bl. 117*n*, is precisely in point. The judgment of Parker, V.C., in Cato v. Irving, 5 De G. & Sm. 210, proceeds upon the assumption that the mortgagee of a ship is not entitled to freight unless he takes possession before the freight has accrued due. The Vice-Chancellor there says (p. 224): "The authorities referred to in the argument establish that the mortgagee of a ship, who takes possession before the conclusion of the voyage, is entitled to the then accruing freight. It was contended by the defendants that the present case does not come within this rule because the plaintiffs did not take possession until the ship was in the docks, and the voyage therefore concluded. I consider that a mortgagee who takes possession of the ship at any time before the cargo is discharged comes within the rule. The right to the freight does not accrue until the goods are not only conveyed to their destination, but are also delivered; and a mortgagee who takes lawful possession of the ship while the goods are still on board, and is thereby entitled to deliver the goods and receive the freight, to the exclusion of the mortgagor, must be as much within the reason of the rule when the ship is in the docks as when she is only on her way to the docks at the time when possession is taken." This was in the year 1852

In Brown v. Tanner, 16 W. R. 882, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 597, the Lords Justices in the year 1868 had to deal with a question as to a mortgagee's right to freight In delivering the judgment of the court, Page-Wood, L.J., said: "But it appears to us that this case must be determined in the appellant's favour on the ground of his having taken possession of the ship before the freight under the charter-party had become due. It is now settled beyond all dispute that the mortgagee of a ship becomes entitled to all the rights and liable to all the duties of an owner from the time of his taking possession. Amongst the rights so accruing to him is that of receiving all freight remaining due when possession is taken."

The defendants rely upon the last sentence in this passage of the judgment as indicating that in the opinion of the Lord Justice the mortgagee on taking possession became entitled to all freights then due and unpaid. I think, however, that the Lord Justice meant no more than that the mortgagee on taking possession became entitled to all unpaid freight which the ship was then in the course of earning. This seems clear from what follows in the judgment At p. 603, 2 L. R. 3 Ch. App., the Lord Justice says: "The only question then really is, had the freight become due when the appellant took possession? and this point we wished to have re-argued, the matter not appearing to have been fully discussed either in the court below or at the first hearing before us." And the Lord Justice proceeds to consider this question, and comes to the conclusion that the freight had not been earned before the mortgagee took possession, and that therefore the mortgagee was entitled to it.

In Liverpool Marine Credit Co v. Wilson, 20 W. R. 665, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 507, at p. 511, James, L.J., in delivering the judgment of himself and Mellish, L.J., stated the law upon the subject as follows: "He (the mortgagee) had no absolute right to the freight as an incident to his mortgage; he could not intercept the freight by giving notice to the charterer before payment; but if he took actual possession or, according to a recent decision in the Court of Exchequer, if he took constructive possession of the ship before the freight was actually earned, he thus became entitled to the freight as an incident of his legal possessory right, just as a mortgagee of land taking actual possession of the land before severance of the growing crops would have the right to sever and take the crops."

In Keith v. Burrows, 25 W. R. 831, 2 App. Cas. 636, at p. 646, Lord Cairns, as I understand him, states the law to the same effect, and also Lord Blackburn at 2 App. Cas., p. 660; and in Anderson v. Butler's Wharf Co. (Limited), 48 L. J. Ch. 824, Hall, V.C., stated the result of the decisions as follows: "In the case of the mortgagee of a ship, which was referred to in the argument, the mortgagee is not entitled to the earnings of the ship, except the earnings thereof after the time of his taking possession."

The defendants relied upon certain dicta of Malins, V.C., in Wilson v. Wilson, 20 W. R. 436, L. R. 14 Eq. 32, but when carefully considered the language of the Vice-Chancellor does not appear to me to be really inconsistent with the statements of the law to which I have already referred. In the present case it is admitted that the freight in question became due and payable before the defendants entered into possession and for this reason I think the defendants' claim fails and that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

Solicitors for plaintiff, Botterell & Roche, for Vaughan & Roche, Cardiff.

Solicitors for defendants, E. F. Turner & Son.

Court of Appeal.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.) May 4.

SHARPE v. MIDLAND RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—"Earnings"—Lodging allowance for goods guard—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), *Schedule I., par.*1 (a) (i.).

A goods guard in the employment of a railway company received, in addition to his ordinary wages, a certain sum per night for "lodging allowance" when he was obliged to sleep away from home on the company's business. The object of the allowance was to cover out-of-pocket expenses to which the guard was put through having to sleep away from home, and the amount of the allowance was about equal to the reasonable cost of board and lodging for the time covered by the allowance. No inquiry was ever made by the company as to the actual expenses incurred by a guard for board and lodging, and if he boarded and lodged with a friend he would still be entitled to the allowance, and would thus make a profit out of it; but there was no evidence that any guard ever did in fact make any such profit. A guard having been killed by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, his widow claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, as being wholly dependent on his earnings.

Held, that in assessing the amount of compensation the "lodging allowance" must be taken as part of the "earnings" of the deceased man, within the meaning of Schedule I., par. 1 (a) (i.), to the Act.

Appeal from an award of his Honour Judge Lindley, the county court judge of Derby, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The following facts are taken from the judgment of the county court judge: The applicant for compensation was the widow and administratrix of a man named Sharpe, who at the time of the accident causing his death was in the employment of the Midland Railway Co. as a goods guard. It was admitted that Sharpe was killed by an accident on the 9th of September, 1902, in such circumstances that the company were liable to pay compensation, and that his widow and children were wholly dependent upon his earnings. His wages for the three years immediately preceding his fatal injury amounted to £236 9s. 10d., and during those three years he also received from the company in addition to his wages various sums amounting in the whole to £23 2s. for what was termed "lodging allowance." The only question was whether these latter sums formed part of the deceased man's "earnings" within the meaning of Schedule I., par. 1 (a) (i.), to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The terms of the employment of a goods guard in the service of the Midland Railway Co. were as follows: The regular day's work for a guard was ten hours a day and sixty hours a week, and for this he was paid a fixed wage. If his week's work exceeded sixty hours he was entitled to extra pay. After being on duty for ten hours a guard was entitled to nine hours' rest, and this was the regular rest time between long outward and return journeys. Guards in the course of their duty frequently had to lodge away from home, and on those occasions they were entitled, under the terms of their employment, to receive a lodging allowance. The scale of allowance was as follows: 1s. per night in the provinces and 1s. 6d. in London, if the company's lodging-house was used; 3s. in London and 2s. elsewhere for private lodgings. The minimum time for which a lodging allowance might be drawn was nine hours. In exceptionally long periods of rest for the company's convenience—i.e., where a guard could not return at the end of nine hours and had to remain longer—where the guard had to lodge over fifteen hours, an extra 1s. was allowed, and 2s. where over twenty hours' rest had to be taken, except in London, where the extra allowances were 1s. and 1s. 6d. respectively. This extra allowance was not given unless the time occupied on the outward and return journeys together equalled twenty hours. For the purpose of ascertaining the time during which a guard was on duty with his train and during which he was off duty and entitled to lodging allowances, a guard when he took his train from a home station "signed on." When he rejoined his train for the return journey he "signed on" again, and "signed off" on his arrival home. At the end of his journey he made a return of the hours during which he had been at work—that is, during which he had been "signed on"—and his wages were regulated by those hours. He also separately made a claim for lodging allowance in respect of the hours during which he had been "signed off." The object of this allowance was to cover out-of-pocket expenses to which a guard was put through having to sleep away from home, and the county court judge found as a fact that the amount of the allowance was about equal to the reasonable cost of board and lodging (or board only if the company's lodgings were used) for the time covered by the allowance. It was, however, proved that no inquiry was ever made as to the actual expenses incurred by a guard for board and lodgings; and it was admitted that, if a guard boarded and lodged with a friend and at the friend's expense, or if he took his own food with him, he would nevertheless be entitled to his lodging allowance. A guard might, therefore, make a distinct profit out of his allowance; but there was no evidence before the county court judge that the deceased or any other guard ever did, in fact, make any such profit; and the guards who gave evidence stated that at times the cost of their board and lodgings exceeded the allowance, and always was as much as it, and that they made no profit, and that they never stayed with friends. The deceased man never lodged in the company's lodgings, but always found his own lodgings; and during the three years previous to his death he lodged out on 214 occasions, and drew for his lodging allowance on these occasions various sums amounting to £23 2s. No witnesses were called on behalf of the applicant.

The county court judge, in giving judgment, said that in his opinion the sum in question formed part of the deceased's earnings within the meaning of the Act. The nature of a guard's duties rendered it necessary for him to be away from home from time to time, and such absences could not be fairly regarded as unusual or exceptional. They were, in his opinion, of the incidents of the service. This was shown by the number of occasions on which the deceased guard was absent from home during the three years preceding his death—viz., 214 times, or, on an average, between five and six times a week. Further, he did not think that the allowance in this case could be regarded as a mere repayment of out-of-pocket expenses. It was not so in fact, for the allowance was fixed, and the expenses doubtless varied, and the payment of the allowance was independent of what (if anything) the guard had actually expended on his board and lodging. Moreover, the guard must sleep and eat whether at home or away from home, and whether he had a special allowance for this purpose or not, and the fact that he did this when away from home at the expense of his employers was some pecuniary benefit to the guard himself and indirectly also to his family, if he had one. Though in one sense it was true that the lodging allowance was paid in respect of the time during which the guard was off duty and was rendering no active service to the company, yet the guard when off duty was still in the service of the company, and by the very terms of his employment, so long as he was in that service, he was as clearly entitled as of right to this allowance when the occasion arose as he was to his regular wages. He (the county court judge) also thought it material to observe that the allowance in fact made a very substantial addition to a guard's wages. The deceased man drew on an average about 3s. a week for lodging allowance, and if guards had no lodging allowance the expenses incurred by them in providing their board and lodging when absent from home could not be deducted from their wages in calculating their earnings: see Houghton v. Sutton Heath and Lea Green Collieries Co., 49 W. R. 196, [1901] 1 K. B. 93. Without, therefore, attempting to define the word "earnings," in his opinion this allowance came within the meaning of the word, and he found as a fact that the deceased's earnings during the three years preceding his injury amounted to £259 11s. 10d., and he ordered the company to pay this sum to the deceased man's dependants.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The railway company appealed.

Hugo Young, K.C., and J. D. Crawford, for the appellants.—The "lodging allowance" is not "earnings" within the meaning of Schedule I., par. 1 (a) (i.), to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The allowance is given to a goods guard who is obliged to sleep away from home, and it is given merely to cover the out-of-pocket expenses to which he is thereby put. The evidence of the guards who were called on behalf of the railway company—and their evidence was uncontradicted, the applicant calling no witnesses—showed that no profit was ever made out of this allowance, and the county court judge found as a fact that the object of the allowance was to cover out-of-pocket expenses, and that the amount of the allowance was about equal to the reasonable cost of board and lodging for the time covered by the allowance. It is a misnomer to call it "earnings" upon which his family were dependent, and therefore it should be struck out of the calculation.

S. T. Evans, K.C., and Clement Edwards, for the respondent.—This sum is an allowance to the guard, and the mode in which he spends it is immaterial. The court will not enter upon an inquiry as to how he spent it. If a guard boards and lodges with a friend he saves the allowance, and it becomes a source of profit to him, and no inquiry is ever made by the railway company as to the actual expenses incurred by a guard for board and lodging. It is quite clear that the allowance, so far as it represents board, is a source of profit, because the food which the guard would otherwise eat at home is saved. So, too, the court cannot say that the lodging allowance may not be profit. It must therefore be reckoned as part of his "earnings."

They referred to Noel v. Redruth Foundry Co., 44 W. R. 407, [1896] 1 Q. B. 453; Pomphrey v. Southwark Press, [1901] 1 K. B. 86, 49 W. R. Dig. 114; Houghton v. Sutton Heath and Lea Green Collieries Co., 49 W. R. 196, [1901] 1 K. B. 93; Nelson v. Kerr, 3 Ct. Sess. Cas. (5th ser.) 893.

Hugo Young, K.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 4.—STIRLING, L.J., read the following judgment: This is an appeal by the Midland Railway Co. from the decision of his Honour Judge Lindley as arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, holding that the earnings of a deceased railway guard in the employment of that company included certain sums paid to him in addition to his ordinary wages under the name of "lodging allowance." The facts are very clearly stated in an excellent written judgment of the learned judge, and it is unnecessary to state them in detail. It appears that railway guards in the course of their duty have frequently to lodge away from home, and on these occasions are, under the terms of their employment by the Midland Railway Co., entitled to receive the allowances in question, which are made on the following scale: If the guard lodges in lodgings provided by the company he is allowed 1s. in the country or 1s. 6d. in London. If he finds his own lodgings he is allowed 2s. in the country or 3s. in London. The object of the allowance is to cover out-of-pocket expenses to which a guard is put through having to sleep away from home; and the judge finds as a fact that the amount of the allowance is about equal to the reasonable cost of board and lodging (or board only if the company's lodgings are used) for the time covered by the allowance. But it also appears that no inquiry is ever made by the railway company as to the actual expenses incurred by a guard, and it was admitted that, if a guard lodged with and was boarded by a friend or relative without incurring any expense, he would be entitled to the lodging allowance. The question whether in these circumstances the allowance is to be treated as a repayment of out-of-pocket expenses or as an addition to wages is one of some nicety, but I find myself unable to differ from the reasoning and conclusions of the learned judge. The allowance is a payment to which the guard becomes entitled (no less than to his weekly wages) upon the happening of certain events, whether he has incurred out-of-pocket expenses or not. He is in no way liable to account to the company in respect of the money he receives, which is as much his own as his weekly wages. The bargain between the guard and the company is that the former is at his own expense to provide himself with the ordinary necessaries of life, and, so far as the allowance is made in respect of food, it constitutes an addition to his resources; for, as I understand the finding of the judge, the amount of allowance covers the whole of the reasonable cost of board while the guard is away from home, and not merely any extra cost occasioned to him during that period, so that the domestic establishment is thus relieved from the expense of providing food for the guard in his absence. The allowance, therefore, appears to me to form part of the workman's earnings, although the amount of it may have been calculated by reference to the probable amount of his expenditure on board and lodging. It was strongly urged upon us that the whole of the allowance ought not to be treated as earnings, but only so much as might be shown to constitute profit in the hands of the workman; but to give effect to this contention would be to embark on an inquiry not contemplated by the Act, which prescribes that the compensation shall be assessed simply by reference to the amount of the workman's earnings at the time of his death, without any investigation as to the mode in which he applied them when received. For these reasons, and also for those given by the learned judge, I think that the appeal fails and ought to be dismissed. The Master of the Rolls agrees with this judgment.

MATHEW, L.J.—I have had an opportunity of reading the judgment of Stirling, L.J., and I entirely agree with it.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the applicant, A. Toovey, for Flint & Son, Derby.

Solicitors for the railway company, Beale & Co.

---

From K. B. Div. (In Bkcy.) (Vaughan Williams, Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) May 1.

In re POLLARD. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Administration action—Order on executor to pay money into court—Non-compliance—Writ of sequestration—Bankruptcy of executor—Title of trustee in bankruptcy to property sequestered—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 9, 45, 54.

An order of sequestration directing certain moneys to be paid into court to the credit of the sequestrator's account does not create a charge on the property sequestered, and the trustee in bankruptcy of the person against whom the sequestration order was made has, accordingly, a good title to such property.

Judgment of Wright, J. (ante, p. 432), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Wright, J. (reported ante, p. 432).

The question involved was whether a trustee in bankruptcy could claim property of the bankrupt which had been sequestered by an order of the court in consequence of the bankrupt's refusal to pay a judgment debt.

The facts were as follows:

In 1899 Mrs. Pollard died, leaving three sons, one of whom was the bankrupt. She left the residue of her estate to these three sons and appointed them her executors. The bankrupt was indebted to the estate, and in 1900 an administration action in the Chancery Division was begun, in which the first two brothers were the plaintiffs and the bankrupt the sole defendant.

On the 10th of March, 1902, an order was made in the action that the defendant—viz., the bankrupt, was to bear two-thirds of the plaintiffs' costs and was to bring into court within seven days the sum of £136 13*s*.

On the 18th of April, 1902, the bankrupt committed an act of bankruptcy by failure to comply with the terms of a bankruptcy notice.

On the 20th of May, 1902, the plaintiffs issued a writ of sequestration, and on the 5th of July an order was made thereon directing the London and County Bank (with whom the bankrupt had a banking account) to pay into court to the credit of the sequestrators' account the sum of £137 7*s*. 5*d*.

On the 16th of July a bankruptcy petition was filed against the bankrupt; and a receiving order was made thereon on the 6th of August. Upon the same day, but prior in time to the making of the receiving order, the London and County Bank complied with the order of the court by paying into court the sum of £98 9*s*. 9*d*., which was all the money of the bankrupt then in their possession.

The trustee now brought a motion claiming a declaration that the sum of £98 9*s*. 9*d*. standing in the books of the Paymaster-General to the credit of the sequestrators' account in the action of In re Pollard, Pollard v. Pollard, in the Chancery Division, formed part of the property of the bankrupt divisible among his creditors; and an order that the respondents, B. Pollard and S. R. Pollard, be restrained from proceeding further under the writ of sequestration or from dealing with the said sum of £98 9*s*. 9*d*. otherwise than by procuring the same to be paid to the trustee; and for an order directing the respondents to take all steps necessary to procure the payment of the said sum to the trustee.

Wright, J., held that the case was governed by In re Hastings, Ex parte Brown, 9 Morr. 234, 41 W. R. Dig. 18, and that the trustee was entitled to the money.

The respondents (the sequestrators) appealed.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the appellants. — Apart from any provisions in the Bankruptcy Act, the trustee has no greater right than the bankrupt to these moneys, and the right of the bankrupt is nil; he cannot get the money out of court. The trustee's title depends on the relating back section—viz., section 54. But the appellants at the date of the receiving order were secured creditors by reason of the sequestration order. On the 6th of August a receiving order was made, but not an adjudication of bankruptcy. But even though the appellants did not obtain a charge on the property by reason of the sequestration order, still they come within section 45. They have completed their execution, they have seized a chose in action, and the property has passed away from the bankrupt just as it passes from the debtor when a sheriff has "seized and sold."

Hansell, for the trustee, was not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—It cannot be denied that in the state of circumstances we find here this money was money still in the pockets of the sequestrators. The money was in court standing to the credit of the account which the sequestrators had opened. It had been paid to the sequestrators' account. Mr. Danckwerts has failed to make out that in this state of things his clients became secured creditors either within the 9th or 45th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. A receiving order having been made the result is that no creditor has any remedy against the person or property of the debtor unless he is secured. In my judgment the present plaintiffs are not secured creditors, and have no ground for saying that the debtor's property has been seized or sold, or that anything has happened whereby the property has been appropriated by them.

ROMER, L.J.—With regard to the argument we have just heard, it may be useful if I make a few points obvious. As a rule a sequestration order is only issued as a process against some person who has been guilty of contempt in order that he may purge his contempt. In special cases, no doubt, when the contempt consists in non-payment to a judgment creditor, the creditor may get an order of sequestration against the debtor. But where a sequestration issues and the sequestrator seizes property, what result follows? Even though the sequestration issues at the instance of the creditor, the seizure does not turn the property seized into property of the creditor. Does a mere sequestration give a charge to the creditor upon each part of the property sequestrated? Clearly not. In order for a creditor to get a special charge, he must get some order which will give him a special right. Here the creditor could only have got a special charge by filing a special order. Did the payment into court give the creditors a special right to the moneys paid in? For the reasons I am about to state the order did not turn those moneys into the property of the creditors or give them any special charge. The order was to pay the moneys into court, not to the credit of the action, but to a special account—namely, the account of the sequestrators. That did no more than leave the money, as part of the debtor's property, at the disposal of the sequestrators. Had the order gone on that after payment of the sequestrators' costs the balance should have been paid to the credit of the action, it is possible that the appellants might have succeeded. As it was, no special charge was obtained. Under these circumstances, the funds remained the property of the debtor, and upon his bankruptcy vested in his trustee.

(a) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. It is settled that a sequestration of this kind does not of itself create a charge upon property. That sequestration was a process of contempt, and did not create a charge in favour of the person who obtained it, was, I think, settled even before the case of In re Hastings. That being so, there is an end of the case. I may add that it is mere accident that the money happened to be paid to the credit of the sequestrators' account and not to the credit of the action; that it is mere accident, again, that the money paid in corresponded to the debt owed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, S. R. Pollard; Hicks, Arnold, & Co.

---

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) March 30.

THOMSON AND ANOTHER v. GILL. (a.)

Practice—Judgment—Scotch decreet—Registration in England—Enforcement—"Execution"—Appointment of receiver—Judgments Extension Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 54), ss. 3, 4.

Where the certificate of an extracted decreet of the Court of Session in Scotland has been registered in the High Court of Justice in England under section 3 of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, it can be enforced in England by the appointment of a receiver, as being a mode of "execution" within the meaning of section 4 of the Act.

Appeal from an order by Bigham, J., at chambers, appointing a receiver by way of equitable execution upon a decreet recovered in Scotland, a certificate of which was registered in England. On the 7th of August, 1902, the plaintiffs, who were resident in Scotland, obtained a decreet against the defendant, who was a domiciled Scotchman, in the Court of Session in Scotland for £205 13s. 3d., and on the 22nd of January, 1903, a certificate of the extracted decreet was registered in England under the Judgments Extension Act, 1868. The defendant, who was now resident in England, was entitled under a Scotch marriage settlement dated the 17th of March, 1858, to a life interest in a sum of money, which was assigned to trustees to hold upon trust to pay the annual income thereof to him during his life. The present trustees of the settlement were resident in England. Upon the application of the plaintiffs, Bigham, J., at chambers made an order for the appointment of a receiver of the annual income of this sum of money for the purpose of satisfying the judgment.

The defendant appealed.

By the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, s. 3, on production to the senior master of the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster of the certificate of any extracted decreet of the Court of Session in Scotland which shall hereafter be obtained for the payment of any debt, damages, or expenses, such certificate shall be registered by such master in a register, "and such certificate, when so registered, shall from the date of such registration be of the same force and effect as a judgment obtained or entered up in the court in which it is so registered, and all proceedings shall and may be had and taken on such certificate as if the decreet of which it is a certificate had been a judgment originally obtained or entered up on the date of such registration as aforesaid in the court in which it is so registered. . . ." By section 4, "the Courts of Common Pleas at Westminster and at Dublin, and the Court of Session in Scotland, shall have and exercise the same control and jurisdiction over any judgment or decreet and over any certificate of such judgment or decreet, registered under this Act in such courts respectively, as they now have and exercise over any judgment or decreet in their own courts, but in so far only as relates to execution under this Act."

E. M. Pollock, for the defendant.—The court has no power to appoint a receiver in respect of a Scotch or Irish judgment registered in England under the Judgments Extension Act, 1868. The wide language of sections 1 and 3 is to be read as limited by section 4 of the Act: In re Watson, 41 W. R. 34, [1893] 1 Q. B. 21; In re A Bankruptcy Notice, 46 W. R. 325, [1898] 1 Q. B. 383. By section 4 the court has the same control over a decreet when registered as over its own judgments, "but only in so far as relates to execution under this Act." The appointment of a receiver is not "execution." It has been commonly called equitable execution, but as all the Lords Justices pointed out in In re Shephard, 38 W. R. 133, 43 Ch. D. 131, it is not execution, but merely equitable relief, which is given where there is an impediment to the issuing of execution at law. [Norburn v. Norburn, 42 W. R. 127, [1894] 1 Q. B. 448; Harris v. Beauchamp Brothers, 42 W. R. 451, [1894] 1 Q. B. 801; Anglo-Italian Bank v. Davies, 27 W. R. 3, 9 Ch. D. 275, and Ex parte Evans, 28 W. R. 127, 13 Ch. D. 252, were also referred to upon this point.] Secondly, even if the appointment of a receiver is "execution," section 4 of the Act of 1868 only gives the court the same control and jurisdiction which the Court of Common Pleas "now," that is, in 1868, had and exercised over a judgment in its own court, but only in so far as relates to execution "under this Act." In 1868 the Court of Common Pleas could not have appointed a receiver, nor could the Court of Chancery have appointed a receiver upon a bill being filed for that purpose in execution of a registered judgment, because the execution could only be such as could be granted under the Act of 1868. Section 25, sub-section 8, of the Judicature Act, 1873, does not extend the power of the court to appoint a receiver to a case in which, before the Judicature Act, it could not do so: Holmes v. Millage, 41 W. R. 354, [1893] 1 Q. B. 551; Harris v. Beauchamp Brothers. It merely enables the court to appoint a receiver in the original action, whereas before then it was necessary to file an independent bill in Chancery for that purpose: Smith v. Cowell, 29 W. R. 227, 6 Q. B. D. 75. The order was therefore wrong.

Colam, for the plaintiffs, was not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my opinion this appeal fails. The real question which we have to decide is, what is the meaning of the word "execution" as used in the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, and in particular the meaning of that word at the end of section 4 of the Act? With regard to section 3, it is not denied that if a judgment is registered under the Act it becomes an English judgment for purposes of execution. Under the Act the judgment has to be registered in the Court of Common Pleas, but is admitted that the High Court has now succeeded to the position formerly occupied by the Court of Common Pleas. We have to consider the meaning of the word "execution" in section 4 of the Act. What is sought for here by the appointment of a receiver is, at all events in popular language, to obtain execution, and to obtain execution by receiving certain moneys coming to the judgment debtor in satisfaction of the judgment debt. Certain objections have been taken to the appointment of a receiver. First of all, two cases have been cited, In re Watson and In re A Bankruptcy Notice. In the first of those cases it was held that a judgment creditor who had registered in England an Irish judgment under the Act of 1868 (and the Act draws no distinction between an Irish and a Scotch judgment) could not obtain a judgment debtor's summons upon a judgment so registered. Why? Because the object of a judgment debtor's summons is not execution—that is to say, it is not a mode of enforcing payment of the debt out of the judgment debtor's goods or otherwise, but it is a proceeding to punish the judgment debtor for his contumacy in not having paid the debt when he was able to do so. It is in its nature a punitive proceeding, and does not operate as a satisfaction of the debt. By the express provision of section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, imprisonment under that section is not to operate as a satisfaction of the debt, or to deprive the judgment creditor of the right to take out execution. In the second case, In re A Bankruptcy Notice, the issue of a bankruptcy notice founded on a Scotch judgment which had been registered in England under the Act of 1868, it being a step towards making the judgment debtor bankrupt, was held not to be "execution" within the meaning of section 4. There is nothing in either of those two cases to prevent us from giving a wide meaning to the word "execution" in section 4 of the Act. It is then said that the court could not give a wide meaning to the word so as to make it include what has been called equitable execution because of the decision in In re Shephard. I do not think so. I do not think that In re Shephard prevents us from giving a wide meaning to the word "execution" as used in the Act. That case decides primarily this, that there is nothing in ord. 42, r. 23, which enables the court to apply that rule to the appointment of a receiver by way of equitable execution. When one looks at rule 23 one sees that it is limited to the cases of execution which have been mentioned in the earlier rules of the order; and on looking back at rule 8 I find it there stated that "in these rules the term 'writ of execution' shall include writs of fieri facias, capias, elegit, sequestration, and attachment, and all subsequent writs that may issue for giving effect thereto." On looking back at the preceding rules, one finds the forms of execution referred to. It is sufficient to say, as I understand that case, that the decision was that the case did not come within rule 23. But apart from form, there is a substantial difference between that case and the present. In that case after judgment the judgment debtor had died, and this court, in considering the mode in which the appointment of a receiver by way of equitable execution was obtained before the Judicature Act, pointed out that a receiver was only granted in aid of a legal judgment where there was a hindrance to execution at law, and after due notice to the parties. It was contended in that case that the court ought to follow the analogy of legal execution, and that legal execution could be issued ex parte after the death of the judgment debtor. In that case no notice of the application for a receiver had been served on the personal representatives of the judgment debtor, and it was held that a receiver could not be appointed ex parte over property which belonged to the judgment debtor in his lifetime, but which vested on his death in another person. Cotton, L.J., in dealing with the question whether there was any jurisdiction to make an order affecting the estate of a dead man, when no person interested in it was before the court, said that it was urged that there was, for that this was equitable execution and must follow the analogy of legal execution, that legal execution could be issued ex parte after the death of the judgment debtor, and that therefore there was no reason why equitable execution should not. He then asked whether this was to be considered as equitable execution, and as subject to the same rules as legal execution, and assuming that legal execution could be issued against the estate of a dead man ex parte, could equitable execution be so issued. In his opinion it could not. He went on to state that the judgment creditor who obtained the appointment of a receiver did not get execution, but equitable relief, which was granted on the ground that there was no remedy by execution at law, and that the obtaining a receivership order was not taking out execution, but was obtaining equitable relief by a subsequent order, which must be made against someone against whom the court had jurisdiction to make an order. He entered into that question for the purpose of showing that, having regard to the nature of the proceedings, upon the death of the judgment debtor it is impossible to get equitable execution without bringing before the court his personal representative in whom the estate is vested. It seems to me, therefore, that, if that case is properly looked at, there is nothing in it which prevents us from giving a wide meaning to the word "execution" in section 4 of the Act of 1868.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-Law.

It is next said that there is something in the judgment of this court delivered by Lord (then Lord Justice) Davey in Harris v. Beauchamp Brothers. There again I do not myself find anything in it which compels us to give a narrow meaning to the word "execution" in section 4 which would have the effect of excluding equitable execution. It is quite true that Lord Davey in that case cites with approval the observations in In re Shephard, but he does so for the purpose of showing that upon an application for the appointment of a receiver the court must have regard to the mode in which an order for the appointment of a receiver would have been obtained in the Court of Chancery before the Judicature Act. In Ex parte Evans James, L.J., said "Beyond all question it was held in Hatton v. Haywood, 22 W. R. 356, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 229, and Anglo-Italian Bank v. Davies, that an order appointing a receiver amounted to equitable execution. A judgment creditor, not being able to obtain relief at law under the old system, because his debtor had nothing but an equitable interest in the land, came into a court of equity to obtain that relief which he could not obtain at law; and the moment he established the difficulty in his way at law, and the court made the order giving the right to the possession of the land to the receiver, appointed on his behalf; that order giving the right to possession to the creditor through the receiver was as much a delivery in execution of land in which the debtor had only an equitable interest, as was the sheriff's return to the writ of elegit at law, that he had extended the land, a delivery in execution of land in which the debtor had a legal interest." James, L.J., there regarded the appointment of a receiver as equitable execution. I am not saying one word contrary to what was said in In re Shephard and Harris v.

Beauchamp Brothers as to regulating the manner and form of obtaining equitable execution. What I do say is that James, L.J., regarded the appointment of a receiver as in reality equitable execution. It is execution which a court of equity enables a judgment creditor to obtain, and which could not have been obtained at law. I do not see why the word "execution" in section 4 of the Act of 1868 should not be so construed as to include this kind of execution. With regard to the argument founded upon the word "now" in section 4, I am not satisfied that the plaintiff could not at that date have taken proceedings in a court of equity upon a Scotch or Irish judgment registered in England and obtained the appointment of a receiver, just as in the case of an ordinary English judgment. Indeed, upon looking at section 6—which enacts that in any action brought in any court in England, Scotland, or Ireland on any judgment or decreet which might be registered under this Act in the country in which such action is brought, the party bringing such action shall not recover or be entitled to any costs or expenses of suit unless the court in which such action shall be brought, or some judge thereof, shall otherwise order—the intention of the Act seems to me to be to place a Scotch or Irish judgment registered in England in the same position, speaking generally, as a judgment obtained in England. For these reasons I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is an appeal from an order appointing a receiver in respect of a judgment obtained in Scotland, and registered in England under the Judgments Extension Act, 1868. The facts of the case are such that if the judgment had been originally obtained in England the making of the order for a receiver would be almost a matter of course. In one sense the appointment of receiver by way of equitable execution is not a matter of course, because facts must be shown to justify the appointment. Facts, however, exist which would entitle an English judgment creditor to the appointment of a receiver. It is said, however, that the Act of 1868, as interpreted by the courts, does not enable a plaintiff to get the appointment of a receiver. Section 3 of that Act is framed in as wide terms as possible. It provides for the registration (inter alia) of the certificate of an extracted decreet of the Court of Session in Scotland in the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, "and such certificate when so registered shall from the date of such registration be of the same force and effect as a judgment obtained or entered up in the court in which it is so registered, and all proceedings shall and may be had and taken on such certificate as if the decreet of which it is a certificate had been a judgment originally obtained or entered up on the date of such registration as aforesaid in the court in which it is so registered." If that section stood alone no question could possibly have arisen as to the right of the plaintiff to have a receiver appointed. But regard must be had to section 4, which provides that "the Courts of Common Pleas at Westminster and at Dublin and the Court of Session in Scotland shall have and exercise the same control and jurisdiction over any judgment or decreet, and over any certificate of such judgment or decreet, registered under this Act in such courts respectively as they now have and exercise over any judgment or decreet in their own courts, but in so far only as relates to execution under this Act." It is said, and truly said, that in two cases—In re Watson and In re A Bankruptcy Notice—it has been held by this court that the effect of section 4 is to limit the wide words of section 3 to proceedings which relate to execution. In the first case it was held that a judgment summons under the Debtors Act, 1869, was not such a proceeding, and in the second case it was held that the issue of a bankruptcy was not such a proceeding. The question we have to determine is whether the words "but in so far only as relates to execution under this Act" are to be construed so as to exclude the power of appointing a receiver by way of equitable execution. The effect of so holding would be to confine the words to proceedings by way of legal execution. Having regard to the authorities, I do not think that we ought so to restrict the meaning. In 1874 the question arose whether the appointment of a receiver over land was a delivery of the land in execution under section 1 of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112, and this court in Hatton v. Haywood, held that it was; and later on in Anglo-Italian Bank v. Davies, Sir George Jessel, M.R., said that the result of the decision in Hatton v. Haywood was that the words "or other lawful authority" in section 1 of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112, referred to the order of a court having authority to give that which amounted to delivery in execution, although not technically a delivery in execution—in other words, to what was commonly called equitable execution, which was putting the land in the possession of a receiver. A construction was thus placed upon the words "delivery in execution" in that statute, and as the words received a wide interpretation there, I can see no reason why we should place a narrow construction upon the word "execution" here. Again, in Blackman v. Fysh, [1892] 3 Ch. 209, 41 W. R. Dig. 274, it was held by Kekewich, J., that the appointment of a receiver of the rents of certain property on behalf of a judgment creditor was a taking of the property in execution within the meaning of a forfeiture clause in a will. Considering those authorities, I think that we should read the word "execution" in the Act of 1868 as including the appointment of a receiver. I am not saying anything that is contrary to what is laid down in In re Shephard. All that the court there said was merely for the purpose of showing that so-called equitable execution, which they said was really equitable relief, is not governed by the same rules as govern legal execution. Our attention has also been called to the word "now" in section 4 of the Act of 1868, and the argument founded upon it is that at that time no equitable execution could have been obtained upon a Scotch judgment registered in England. I do not know whether it is necessary for us to decide that question, but I may say that I do not agree with it. It is admitted that if an action had been brought in England upon a Scotch judgment, and judgment recovered, the judgment creditor might have obtained the appointment of a receiver by bringing an independent suit in Chancery. It seems to me that the Act places the judgment creditor, who has registered his judgment in England, in the same position, speaking generally, as if he had originally obtained his judgment here. Section 6, which has been already read, supports this view. The object is to discourage the bringing of actions in this country upon Scotch or Irish judgments, instead of proceeding under the Act of 1868. I do not see why effect should not have been given by the Court of Chancery to such a judgment so registered, in the same way as effect would have been given by the court to an ordinary judgment obtained in England. I wish to add that the case of Norburn v. Norburn was decided entirely upon order 42 and does not affect our decision.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is said that the right to apply for the appointment of a receiver by way of equitable execution 'does not extend to an Irish or Scotch judgment which has been registered in England under the Judgments Extension Act, 1868. That contention seems to me to give the go-by to section 3 of the Act. The High Court is now the successor of the old Court of Common Pleas. It seems to me that before the Judicature Act the execution creditor in such a case could have obtained equitable execution by the appointment of a receiver in the Court of Chancery, and, the Judicature Act having now assimilated the proceedings, the King's Bench Division now gives all the relief which could formerly have been obtained in the Court of Chancery.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Emanuel & Simmonds, for Robert Stewart, Edinburgh.

Solicitors for the defendant, Balfour Allan & North.

---

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) March 14.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. JOHNSON. (a.)

*Inland revenue—Estate duty—Succession duty—Gift in lieu of legacy to charitable society—Agreement for payment of annuity to donor—Donation with reservation—*Bonâ fide purchase—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 2, sub-section 1 (c); s. 3, sub-section 2—Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), s. 7.

An unincorporated charitable society, in consideration of the payment by B. of the sum of £500 in lieu of a legacy, agreed to pay an annuity of £25 to B. during his life and to his wife during her life if she survived him. The commercial value of the annuity was £210. The annuity was not charged on the funds of the society, but was paid by the directors as one of the ordinary outgoings of the society to B. during his life and after his death to his widow during her life. B. died in 1895, and his widow in 1900.

Held, that the society were liable to pay estate duty on the whole sum of £500 on the death of B. under section 2, sub-section 1 (c) of the Finance Act, 1894, and were also liable to pay succession duty on the same sum on the death of the widow, under section 7 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853.

Judgment of Phillimore, J. (50 W. R. 366, [1902] 1 K. B. 416) varied.

Appeal from the judgment of Phillimore, J., on an information by the Attorney-General claiming estate duty and succession duty from the London Missionary Society (50 W. R. 366, [1902] 1 K. B. 416).

The information stated as follows: "(1) The London Missionary Society is a body of persons not incorporated, but associated for certain charitable purposes of a religious character and possessed of considerable invested funds, which are held by trustees appointed by the society, and are dealt with and disposed of by directors, in whom the management of the affairs of the society is from time to time vested. (2) In the year 1889 the said society accepted from Mr. Charles Thomas Munday Burton, a director of the society, an offer of a sum of £500 in lieu of a legacy, subject to a contract of reservation for the payment of £25 per annum to the said Charles Thomas Munday Burton during his life, and after his death to his wife, Mrs. Martha Burton, during her life, in case she should survive him. (3) The said arrangement was confirmed and carried out by the following resolution passed at a meeting of the directors of the society on the 11th of February, 1889: 'That in consideration of the payment to the London Missionary Society of £500 in lieu of a legacy by a director (Charles Munday Burton, Esq.), who does not wish his name to appear in any published or announced list of subscriptions, the present trustees and their successors in the trusteeship of the society be and hereby are authorized to pay the sum of £25 per annum in quarterly payments . . . during the life of the said Charles Munday Burton, Esq., and a like payment to his present wife, Mrs. Martha Burton, during her life should she survive him.' (4) The said sum of £500 was given and paid by the said Charles Thomas Munday Burton to the society, and the funds of the society held by their trustees became and were, pursuant to the said arrangement, charged with the payment of the annual sum of £25 during the lives of the said Charles Thomas Munday Burton and his wife and the life of the survivor of them, and the said annual sum was duly paid thereout by the trustees accordingly. (5) Charles Thomas Munday Burton died on the 12th of May, 1895. His widow, Martha Burton, died on the 5th of May, 1900. (6) Upon the death of Charles Thomas Munday Burton estate duty became payable by the society and its trustees under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c), incorporating section 38 (1) and (2) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, and section 11 (1) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, on the said sum of £500, being a gift to the society of which bonâ fide possession and enjoyment were not assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the donor or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise. (7) Upon the death of Martha Burton succession duty at the rate of 11½ per cent. became payable by the society and its trustees upon the said sum of £500, in respect of the determination of the said payment of £25 per annum to Mrs. Burton, under the Succession Duty Act, 1853, s. 7, and the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, s. 21. (8) The Commissioners of Inland Revenue have caused application to be made to the society and their trustees and to the defendant to deliver proper accounts in respect of the said sum of £500, and to pay the duties which ought to be paid in respect thereof as aforesaid, but they have refused and still refuse to deliver such accounts and pay such duties, and contend that no such duties are payable. (9) The defendant is the secretary of the society."

The society, in their answer to the information, pleaded as follows: The said sum of £500 was not given, but was paid by Mr. Burton to the society. None of the funds of the society became, pursuant to any arrangement, charged with the payment of the annual sum of £25. The said annual sum was in fact never paid by the trustees out of the funds of the society. It was paid by the directors as one of the ordinary outgoings of the society. Upon the death of Mr. Burton estate duty did not become payable by the society. If, contrary to the contention of the society, the sum of £500 passed on the death of Mr. Burton, it so passed by reason only of a bonâ fide purchase from him within the meaning of section 3 of the Finance Act, 1894, and is therefore exempted from taxation. The only property (if any) which passed on the death of Mr. Burton in reference to the arrangement between him and the society was the annual sum of £25, which is exempted from taxation by section 15 of the Finance Act, 1894. Alternatively, only such part of the said sum of £500 is to be deemed to have passed on the death of Mr. Burton as remained after deducting such sum as when invested would satisfy the instalments of the annual sum of £25. Upon the death of Mrs. Burton no succession duty became payable by the society. The annuity was bonâ fide purchased by Mr. Burton from the society by payment of £500. If, contrary to this contention, there is any succession, it is taxable under the Succession Duty Act, 1853, s. 16, and therefore the rate of duty is 10 per cent. and not 11½ per cent. The actual commercial value of the annuity of £25, having regard to the respective ages of Mr. and Mrs. Burton in 1889, was £210.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Phillimore, J., found that the annuity of £25 was not charged on the funds of the society, but was paid by the directors as one of the ordinary outgoings of the society, and he accordingly held that the sum of £500 was a gift taken by the society without any reservation. But he held, on the authority of Attorney-General v. Worrall, 43 W. R. 118, [1895] 1 Q. B. 99, that the gift, being accompanied by an agreement to make an annual payment to the donor for life, was not exempt from taxation, and that the Crown was entitled to estate duty on the sum of £290, the amount of the benefit to the society from the transaction after deducting £210, the value of the annuity. With regard to succession duty, he gave judgment against the Crown.

The Crown appealed.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., Sir Edward Carson, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.

Micklem, K.C., and Harman, for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 14.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read the judgment of the court as follows: In 1889 Mr. C. M. Burton, a director of the London Missionary Society, paid to that society a sum of £500 upon the terms stated in a resolution of the directors, which is as follows: [His lordship read the resolution as set out above.] It was admitted by the Attorney-General that the payment was made in pursuance of a binding legal contract; and the case was argued, and is to be decided, on that footing. Mr. Burton died on the 12th of May, 1895; Mrs. Burton on the 5th of May, 1900; and the annual sum of £25 mentioned in the resolution was regularly paid out of the funds of the society, first to Mr. Burton during his life, and afterwards to Mrs. Burton during hers.

The Attorney-General, on behalf of the Crown, claimed that estate duty became payable on the death of Burton under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2, sub-section 1 (c): and, further, that succession duty became payable upon the death of Mrs. Burton under the Succession Duty Act, 1853, s. 7. Phillimore, J., has held that estate duty was payable, but that under section 3, sub-section 2, of the Finance Act, 1894, the value in 1889 of an annuity of £25 for the lives of Mr. and Mrs. Burton and the life of the survivor of them (which value was admitted to be £210) was to be deducted, and consequently estate duty was only payable on £290. The learned judge further held that no succession duty was payable. From this decision the Attorney-General has appealed.

Section 2, sub-section 1, of the Finance Act, 1894, provides that "property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include" (amongst other property) "(c) property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, if those sections were herein enacted and extended to real property as well as personal property and the words 'voluntary' and 'voluntarily' and a reference to a 'volunteer' were omitted therefrom." Amongst the property required by section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, to be included in an account is "property taken under any gift, whenever made, of which property bonâ fide possession and enjoyment shall not have been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the donor or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise." In Crossman v. The Queen, 35 W. R. 303, 18 Q. B. D. 256, a case decided with reference to section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, Hawkins, J., in delivering the judgment of a Divisional Court (consisting of Denman, J., and himself), says: "In considering the question whether a settlement is voluntary or not according to the true construction of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, we think it incumbent upon us to look at the real substance of the transaction and its object; and if so looking at it we come to the conclusion that in its origin it was intended to be a free gift to the transferees, but only upon the condition that the settlor should substantially retain to himself the interest in the property for his life, we ought to find the settlement to be voluntary within the meaning of the Act, even though on the face of the deed and in fact we may find that there was sufficient consideration to support a contract between the parties and to take it out of the operation of the statute of 27 Eliz. as regards a subsequent purchaser." In Attorney-General v. Worrall, decided on section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, this view was in substance adopted by the Court of Appeal. It was there held that an assignment of a mortgage debt of £23,924 by a father to his son was a "gift" within the meaning of the enactment, although it purported to be made in consideration of a covenant by the son to pay to the father during his life the yearly sum of £735.

Having regard to the terms of section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 (which speaks of a benefit to the donor by contract), and to the language of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2, sub-section 1 (c), which incorporates the provisions of section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, as if the words "voluntary" and "voluntarily" and "volunteer" were omitted, and to the decisions in Crossman The Queen, and Attorney-General v. Worrall, we come to the conclusion that the Legislature intended that property shall be treated as taken under a "gift," although such gift may have been made under a contract by which the donor takes a benefit. If, then, the substance of the transaction between Mr. Burton and the missionary society be looked at, it seems to us that it was intended not to be a matter of pure business, but one of bounty on the part of Mr. Burton. The facts that the payment was made "in lieu of a legacy" and that the amount paid largely exceeded the market value of the annuities agreed to be paid to Mr. and Mrs. Burton are sufficient to establish this. Consequently, the transaction must, in our opinion, be held to be a gift within the meaning of section 2, sub-section 1 (c), of the Finance Act, 1894. In truth this was not seriously disputed by the learned counsel for the missionary society, who urged that the gift ought not to be treated as consisting of £500, but of that amount less the deduction of £210. This contention was based partly on the language of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, s. 11, sub-section 1, and partly on the terms of section 3 of the Finance Act, 1894. As to the first of these grounds, it is to be observed that by the terms of the Finance Act, 1894, property passing on the death of the deceased is to be deemed to include the property in question as being property which would be required "on the death of the deceased" to be included in an account.

The point of time to which regard must be paid is that of the death of the deceased—in this case Mr. Burton. If at that moment the £500 had remained in the hands of the society undiminished, then (subject to any question arising as to the effect of the annuity which was to be paid to Mrs. Burton) it would seem that the whole sum must be taken to have passed and to be subject to estate duty. This is in accordance with the decisions in Attorney-General v. Worrall, where no deduction was allowed in respect of the yearly sum of £735 covenanted to be paid by the donee to the donor during his life, and Earl Grey v. Attorney-General, 48 W. R. 383, [1900] A. C. 124, where no deduction was made in respect of an annual rent-charge reserved to the donor during his life. What the society actually did with the £500 does not appear; but it is contended that they ought not to be treated as having the whole of that sum in their hands at Mr. Burton's death, because no investment of that sum, proper to be made by trustees, would at the present time yield £25 (that is, 5 per cent. on £500) per annum; and consequently that for the purpose of paying the annuity the capital originally placed in their hands must be treated as having been encroached upon to a certain extent. We do not think that this contention ought to prevail, for if one looks at the real substance of the transaction and its object it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that it was intended to be a testamentary gift of £500. Suppose the transaction in this case had been that in consideration or upon the condition of the society paying to the donor the interest on £500 for his life he would make a present gift of £500. It seems to us that such a case would clearly have fallen within the operation of section 11 of the Act of 1889. Now what is the difference between that case and the present? It seems to be that, instead of the consideration being the interest on £500, it is an arbitrary annuity of £25 for the lives of the donor and his wife, and it is said that interest at this rate could not be obtained on an investment of trust moneys, which we assume to be true. This difference does not in our judgment convert the transaction into a purchase of an annuity. A consideration is given, whether the promise is to pay interest at the rate obtainable on trust investments or to grant an annuity exceeding that rate, and in either case the substance of the transaction is a testamentary gift. The donor gives the £500, less the profits to be made thereout, until his death and that of his wife. The fact that by the condition of the gift which the transferee accepts the rate of profit is fixed above the rate of interest which might be reasonably expected upon a trust investment does not seem to us to divest the transaction of its character as a gift, nor does the fact that the gift is subject to a life interest at the fixed rate in favour of the wife. The corpus of the gift is in no way encroached upon. It seems to us that to hold the contrary would be to disregard the decision in Attorney-General v. Worrall, for we do not think that consistently with that case one can take into account the quantum of the profits of the subject-matter of the gift which are retained by the donor. The profit retained in respect of the £500 presently paid may, of course, be so large that one cannot regard the £500 as a gift, and must regard that which is retained or reserved as an annuity for two lives purchased at the price of £500. But then there would be no gift and only a sale, and the section would have no application, but that does not seem to be the case here.

It remains to consider if the incorporation of section 11 of the Act of 1889, somewhat modified, into the Finance Act makes any difference. Is that which would have been payable as account duty under the Act of 1889 not payable as estate duty under the Finance Act? We do not think the Finance Act in this respect alters the account duty. Property passing on the death of the deceased is, by virtue of section 2, sub-section 1 (c), of the Finance Act, 1894, to include property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under section 38 of the Act of 1881 as amended by section 11 of the Act of 1889, and really the only question, as pointed out by Phillimore, J., is whether the transaction in this case amounts to the purchase of an annuity, and is, therefore, exempt from estate duty under the provisions of section 3, sub-section 1, of the Finance Act, 1894, or to the grant of an annuity "for partial consideration in money or money's worth paid to the vendor or grantor or for his own use or benefit," so that the value of the consideration ought to be allowed as a deduction from the value of the property for the purpose of estate duty under sub-section 2 of section 3. Phillimore, J., has held that the whole £500 is, in the first instance, taxable, a conclusion in which we agree, but has further held that in this case £210, the value of an annuity of £25 a year for two lives, ought to be deducted from the £500, and that, therefore, only £290 remains to be taxed. This is a conclusion in which we cannot agree, because, in our judgment, this is not a case of a bonâ fide purchase of an annuity at all; it is a case of a testamentary gift effected by the machinery of a present donation, subject to a reservation of something intended to be the equivalent of a life interest in the subject-matter of the donation. The conclusions at which we arrive really dispose also of the question raised under section 7 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, and dispose of that question in favour of the Crown. The case, we agree with Phillimore, J., comes within section 7, unless it is excepted therefrom as being a disposition of property by bonâ fide sale; but, for reasons which we have already given, we think that the case is not one of bonâ fide sale. We think that this appeal ought to be allowed and judgment on all points entered for the Crown.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the Crown, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Solicitors for the defendant, Leonard & Pilditch.

---

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Feb. 18.

HUNTER v. THE KING. (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—Deductions—Premium on life insurance—Advance by insurance company of half premium—Income Tax Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 54, Schedules D and E.

By the terms of a policy of life insurance it was provided that, if the assured should so desire, a portion of the premium—viz., £33, should in each year be advanced by the insurance company, and that the money so advanced should, with interest thereon, be a first charge on the policy. The premium was expressed to be £66 17*s.* 6*d. The assured paid in respect of premium each year* £33 17*s.* 6*d., and obtained a receipt for* £66 17*s.* 6*d., the balance of* £33 being advanced as provided for by the policy.

Held, that, under section 54 of the Income Tax Act, 1853, the assured was not entitled to deduct from his assessment to income tax the sum of £66 17s. 6d., as the amount of the annual premium paid by him for life insurance, but only the sum of £33 17s. 6d.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Judgment of Phillimore, J. (50 W. R. 618, [1902] 2 K. B. 255), reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of Phillimore, J., on a special case stated by consent in a petition of right (50 W. R. 618, [1902] 2 K. B. 255).

The suppliant, R. L. Hunter, by a policy of insurance dated the 30th of June, 1896, effected an insurance on his life with the London Life Association (Limited) for the sum of £1,500. The policy recited that the sum of £66 17s. 6d. (including an advance of £33), being the premium for such insurance until the 30th of June, 1897, had been paid to the association. By clause 1 of the policy it was provided that if the renewal premium was regularly paid, the sum assured would be paid on the death of the assured, and that a portion of the renewal premium—viz., £33—should, if the assured should so desire, be advanced by the association and should be, with the recited advance of £33, a first charge on the policy. Clause 4 of the policy provided that the association might at any time advance moneys for payment of any sum necessary to prevent the lapsing or avoidance of the policy, and that any such advances should bear interest at 6 per cent. per annum, reducible to 4 per cent. on punctual payment, and that any such advances and interest should be a first charge on the policy and the sum assured.

The form of receipt received by Mr. Hunter on the 30th of June, 1896, was as follows: "Received this 30th day of June, 1896, the sum of £66 17s. 6d. (including £33 advanced by the association), being the first premium on an insurance of £1,500 effected on the life of Mr. R. L. Hunter, for which a policy, numbered 30,540, and dated as above, will be issued in due course." The receipt for the next and following year acknowledged the receipt of "£66 17s. 6d., being the amount of one year's premium."

On the 19th of July, 1897, the suppliant entered into an agreement with the association, whereby, in consideration of the loan to him in the previous year of £33, and in consideration of five further sums of the same amount to be advanced to him under the terms of the policy of assurance, the suppliant charged the policy and all money and benefits thereby assured as security for repayment to the association of the principal sums advanced and to be advanced with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, reducible to 4 per cent. on punctual payment, and also covenanted to pay the premium and all other moneys required for keeping up the policy as the same should become payable.

No advance in cash was made by the association to the suppliant, and save so far as the same could be gathered from the suppliant having made a proposal for a half premium policy, from his having accepted the same, and from the terms of the charge, no specific request was made by the suppliant that the association would make an advance, and no receipt in respect of any alleged advance was given by the suppliant to the association.

The suppliant in each year paid interest at 4 per cent. upon the amount of the principal sums for the time being outstanding on the security of the charge.

The only money which passed from the suppliant to the association in respect of payment of premium was a payment in cash of £33 17s. 6d. in each year, and no other moneys were received by the association in respect of the same beyond those sums. The suppliant was debited in the loan register of the association with the amount of the principal sums secured by the charge, and credited in the renewal premium register with the full amount of the premium separately entered in two sums of £33 17s. 6d. and £33 respectively, the sum of £33 having against it the remark "On credit." The premiums were treated as having been paid in full under the heading "premiums" in the revenue account of the association published each year pursuant to the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, and in the calculation made for the reduction of the premiums subsequent to the seventh; and the principal sums secured by the charge were included in the balance-sheet published pursuant to the Act under the head "loans on the association's policies (with their surrender value)."

Section 54 of the Income Tax Act, 1853, provides that "any person who shall have made insurance on his life . . . shall be entitled to deduct the amount of the annual premium paid by him for such insurance from any profits or gains in respect of which he shall be liable to be assessed under either of the Schedules D or E of this Act."

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the suppliant was entitled in each of the three years from 1896 to 1899 to deduct from his assessment to income tax the sum of £66 17s. 6d. as being the annual sum paid by him in respect of premium within the meaning of section 54 of the Income Tax Act, 1853, the Income Tax Commissioners having allowed him to deduct only the sum of £33 17s. 6d. in each year.

The suppliant by his petition of right claimed repayment of the sum of £3 6s., being the income tax charged on the sum of £33 for the three years in question.

The Attorney-General consented, in order to obtain the decision of the court in the promptest way, to waive any objection that might be raised as a matter of law that a petition of right did not lie, but such waiver was not to be taken as a precedent in other cases.

Phillimore, J., gave judgment for the suppliant.

The Crown appealed.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., Sir Edward Carson, S.G., and S. A. T. Rowlatt, for the Crown.

Sir Edward Clarke, K.C., Danckwerts, K.C., and R. B. D. Acland, for the suppliant.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This case raises a short and simple point. Section 54 of the Income Tax Act, 1853, says that any person who has made an insurance on his life shall be entitled to deduct the amount of the annual premium paid by him for such insurance from the amount of any profits or gains in respect of which he shall be liable to be assessed to income tax under Schedules D or E. We have to say whether in the circumstances of the present case a sum of £33 has been paid or not, that £33 being the half of the total amount of the annual premium on a policy of insurance. One half of the total premium has been paid in cash, and as to that no question arises. The question is as to the other half, whether it is true to say that that has been paid by the assured. In my opinion it has not been paid within the meaning of the Act. I think that the true nature of the transaction was that one half of the premium should remain unpaid on the terms that the assured should pay interest upon it. In my judgment such a transaction does not fall within section 54 of the Income Tax Act so as to constitute the sum left unpaid an annual premium paid by the assured. I therefore think the appeal must be allowed.

STIRLING and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the Crown, The Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Solicitors for the suppliant, Hunter & Haynes.

---

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Byrne, J. } April 29.

In re WALKER & SMITH (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Reduction of capital—Certificate of registrar—"Conclusive"—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), ss. 9, 15.

The certificate of the registrar that the order of the court sanctioning a reduction of capital and the accompanying minute has been registered is conclusive evidence that the reduction has been duly carried out, behind which the court will not go even in a case where the company had no power in its articles of association to reduce its capital.

Ladies' Dress Association v. Pulbrook, 49 W. R. 6, [1900] 2 Q. B. 376, followed.

This company had no power by its articles of association as originally framed to reduce its capital, and no special resolution had ever been passed altering the articles by giving it this power.

In 1882 special resolutions were passed purporting to reduce the capital, and these resolutions were duly confirmed by the court.

The order confirming the reduction was produced to the registrar and, together with the usual minute, was registered by him.

The registrar certified this registration under section 15 of the Companies Act, 1867, which provides that: "The registrar shall certify under his hand the registration of the order and minute, and his certificate shall be conclusive evidence that all the requisitions of this Act with respect to the reduction of capital have been complied with, and that the capital of the company is such as is stated in the minute."

The reduction had always been treated as duly carried out until 1898, when the company went into voluntary liquidation.

This was a summons taken out by the liquidator raising the question whether the reduction was valid. The main point in question was the meaning of the word "conclusive" in section 15 of the Companies Act, 1867.

Whinney, for the liquidator.

Vernon, for one class of shareholders, argued that the court could not go behind the registrar's certificate.

Peterson, for another class, contended that there had been no valid reduction, and that he was entitled to raise this contention notwithstanding the certificate.

BYRNE, J., held that the case was governed by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ladies' Dress Association v. Pulbrook, 49 W. R. 6, [1900] 2 Q. B. 376, which could not be distinguished from the present case, and decided that the registrar's certificate was conclusive evidence, behind which the court could not go, that the reduction had been duly carried out.

(a.) Reported by L. W. BYRNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The contention had been raised that it was ultra vires the company to reduce its capital in this manner, and the case of In re National Debenture and Assets Corporation, 39 W. R. 707, [1891] 2 Ch. 505, was relied on. That case was decided under a different section and was distinguishable from the present. There the question discussed was whether a certificate of incorporation was conclusive when there were only six signatories to the memorandum of association; a company could not under any circumstances have acquired power so to register, and the defect could not possibly have been cured by any resolution of the company. In the present case there was no statutory prohibition against the reduction of capital, and if the company's constitution were defective in containing no power to reduce, that defect could be cured in the manner laid down in the Companies Act, 1867.

Under the circumstances it became unnecessary to consider either the effect of the conduct of all parties in treating the reduction as valid for upwards of fifteen years, or the result of the decision in Ho Tung v. Man On Insurance Co. (Limited), [1902] A. C. 232, 50 W. R. Dig. 68.

Solicitors, Geare & Pease, for Champney & Forward, Hull.

---

Chan. Div. } Buckley, J. } Feb. 21, 25.

In re WHITEFORD.
INGLIS v. WHITEFORD. (a.)

Will — Advancement — Hotchpot — Annuity — Period of distribution—Rate of interest—Simple or compound interest—Method of computation.

The period of distribution is, for the purposes of calculation, the date from which interest is to be charged upon advances made by a testator in his lifetime to one of his residuary legatees; and such period of distribution is not the less the death of the testator because he has given to his widow an annuity which has prevented a large part of the residue from being divided during her lifetime.

In calculating the interest to be charged upon advances from time to time made residuary legatees between the testator's death and the time of division of the fund, simple interest is to be charged upon the advances from the dates of payment, and it is not proper to distinguish between the capital and income of the sums advanced and charge interest upon the capital only with annual rests.

The rate of interest to be charged upon advances should now be three, and not four per cent. per annum.

In re Lambert, 45 W. R. 661, 17 Ch. D. 169, followed.

Originating summons.

The questions raised in this summons were as to the interest to be charged upon advances made to residuary legatees of part of their shares before the period of final division.

By his will made in 1889 C. C. Whiteford, after bequeathing certain legacies, and an annuity of £250 (which was increased to £350 by a codicil) to his wife during her life, gave his real and residuary personal estate to trustees upon trust for sale and conversion, and as to one third part (referred to as "Hamilton's portion") upon the trust thereinafter mentioned. As to another third part upon trust for his son Sidney Whiteford, and as to the remaining third part for his son Baldwin Whiteford. And the testator directed that, subject as thereinafter mentioned, "Hamilton's portion" should be held upon trust to pay the same to the trustees of the marriage settlement of his son Hamilton Whiteford upon the trusts of the settlement, and reciting that upon the marriage of Hamilton Whiteford he had settled a freehold estate and dwelling house (subject to the life interests of himself and his wife therein) upon trusts for the benefit of Hamilton Whiteford, his wife, and children, and that the property so settled was estimated to be of the value of £4,000, and that upon the marriage he (the testator) covenanted to pay within six calendar months after the decease of the survivor of himself and his (then) late wife £6,000 to the trustees of the settlement, the testator declared that after payment of the £6,000 the sum of £10,000 should be considered to have been received and advanced out of his residuary estate in respect of "Hamilton's portion," and should for the purpose only of ascertaining the amount of that portion be considered as forming part thereof, and should be accounted for by way of hotchpot accordingly.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The testator died in June, 1893, leaving his widow and sons Sidney and Baldwin surviving. Hamilton had died in his lifetime, Baldwin died in August, 1893. Under Baldwin's will his widow was entitled to the income of his estate for her life.

On the 6th of December, 1893, the trustees of the testator paid the £6,000 to the trustees of the settlement of Hamilton Whiteford. A sum was set apart to produce the annuity payable to the widow of the testator, but no division of the residuary estate was made.

In the years 1894 and 1895 respectively, the trustees of the testator began to make advances to Sidney Whiteford and to the trustees of Baldwin Whiteford, which were continued from time to time, and which amounted in the aggregate in each case to £6,555 5s. 8d. In making these payments the trustees considered the sum of £5,770 5s. 8d. as derived from capital and £785 as derived from income in each case, the income of the share of Baldwin Whiteford being paid to his widow.

The widow of the testator died in September, 1902, and thereupon the capital sum set apart to produce her annuity became divisible among the residuary legatees, and the trustees had accordingly in their hands sufficient funds to bring the advances made to Sidney Whiteford and Baldwin Whiteford up to an equality with those to Hamilton's trustees.

The present summons was taken out by one of the trustees of the testator against Sidney Whiteford, who was the other trustee, and the trustees of Baldwin's will and Hamilton's settlement, for a declaration (1) whether in distributing the residue of the estate interest was to be charged upon the various advances, and if so from what dates; and (2) whether the interest charged was to be calculated at the rate of three per cent. or of four per cent. per annum.

H. M. Humphry, for the trustee of the testator, the plaintiff in the summons.

F. B. Fuller, for Sidney Whiteford and the trustees of Baldwin Whiteford.—The division of the residue must be made so as to produce equality between the legatees, and consequently interest must be charged upon the advances. Interest should be charged upon the £4,000 advanced to Hamilton as from the death of the testator, and upon the £6,000 as from the date of its payment: Hilton v. Hilton, L. R. 14 Eq. 468, 21 W. R. Dig. 281; In re Rees, 29 W. R. 301, 17 Ch. D. 701; In re Lambert, 45 W. R. 661, [1897] 2 Ch. D. 169. The gift of the annuity makes no difference: In re Lambert. The interest charged should be four per cent. and not three: In re Rees. Stirling, J., did not in In re Lambert intend to decide the contrary: per Joyce, J., in Hargreaves v. Hargreaves, 86 L. T. Rep. 43, 50 W. R. Dig. 189.

Harman, for the trustees of the marriage settlement of Hamilton Whiteford.—The period of distribution is not the death of the testator, but that of the widow (In re Dallmeyer, 44 W. R. 375, [1896] 1 Ch. 372), and interest is only payable upon the advances as from that date. In any case no interest is payable upon the sum of £4,000 until the 6th of December, 1893, when the sum of £6,000 was paid, as the testator directs that only after then should the sum of £10,000 be considered as advanced. The rate of interest should now be not four but three per cent: In re Goodenough, 44 W. R. 44, [1895] 2 Ch. 537; In re Barclay, [1899] 1 Ch. 674, 47 W. R. Dig. 195; Rowlls v. Bebb, 48 W. R. 562, [1900] 2 Ch. 107; In re Lambert.

BUCKLEY, J.—The question is, what is the proper amount of interest to be charged so as to produce equality between the shares of the three sons? Ought Hamilton's share to be charged with interest upon the £4,000 advanced him from the date of the death of testator, or ought that sum, together with the £6,000, to be charged with interest only as from the 6th of December, 1893? It is clear that the former date is the right one unless the will provides otherwise. I do not, however, think that it does provide otherwise. The testator did not intend that any direction which he gave should operate to affect the method adopted by the court to produce equality between the residuary legatees. He did not mean that the £4,000 was not to be taken as received until the £6,000 was paid, but only that when the £6,000 was paid it also should be considered an advance to be brought into hotchpot. I hold that Hamilton's share is to be charged with interest upon the footing that he received the £4,000 in the lifetime of the testator, and that he must consequently pay interest upon that sum as from the death of the testator.

Next, assuming that Hamilton's share is treated in this way, what interest is to be charged upon the sums paid in respect of the shares of Sidney and Baldwin? It has been contended that, each having received certain sums of money, I ought to ascertain what parts of these sums are capital and what parts are income, and that interest should be charged only upon the corpus. This is not the right way of working out the matter. The principle to be followed is shown in three cases—In re Rees, In re Dallmeyer, and In re Lambert. It is, first to ascertain the date of distribution, which is here the death of the testator; and not the less so because there is a gift of an annuity taking effect immediately upon the testator's death, and the estate is increased when the annuity falls in. Then, taking the date of distribution, not for the purpose of payment, but for that of calculation, you charge interest from that date upon advances made in the lifetime of the testator, and upon advances made subsequently you charge interest from the dates when they were made. By so doing you work out equality amongst the children. If the calculation were to be worked out with technical accuracy, I agree that on each occasion of a payment to a child you ought to distinguish capital from income and charge interest with annual rests. This method was suggested by Rigby, L.J., in In re Dallmeyer. But Stirling, J., in In re Lambert did not follow that suggestion. He says, referring to the above suggestion: "I have come to the conclusion that that is not the fair mode of working equality according to the rule laid down in In re Rees." That is to say, you do not according to the decision of the Court of Appeal condescend upon details and calculate exactly, with compound interest, but you employ a rough and ready method. You treat each payment as made on account of the share, and charge interest on that; and that is considered sufficient equality. Consequently here you debit Hamilton's share with interest on the £4,000 from the testator's death, on the £6,000 from the 6th of December, 1893, and you debit the shares of Sidney and Baldwin with interest upon the advances from the respective days of payment.

The question then arises, what is the proper rate at which interest is to be charged? The principle in determining the rate is that when one person has received an advance before another you charge him with the return of so much money as he may reasonably be expected to have obtained if he had invested the money advanced, and in doing so had acted with prudence and caution. You consider what interest the money would have commanded if invested without undue risk. The person advanced is not to be treated as a malefactor, and charged with more interest than he could have got if he acted with reasonable prudence. That amount is now, I think, to be taken as three per cent. This rate has been adopted in analogous cases, as in In re Goodenough, In re Barclay, and in Rowlls v. Bebb. In In re Rees the rate adopted was four per cent. But Stirling, J., in In re Lambert, after referring to the rate of interest payable on debts, says: "But as regards other applications of the rule charging four per cent. it has in recent times been thought excessive, inasmuch as in these days trust investments do not yield anything like four per cent." It is true that in that case there was no desire on the part of the residuary legatees that more than three per cent. should be charged, but I think that the learned judge intended to lay down the principle upon which interest should be charged. In Hargreaves v. Hargreaves, Joyce, J., commenting upon this judgment of Stirling, J., says, 86 L. T. Rep. at p. 46: "Nor do I think that Stirling, J., did decide, or intended to decide, that the rate of interest intended to be debited between the death of the testator and the period of actual distribution, was to be three instead of four per cent. as formerly." I cannot agree with that view. I think that Stirling, J., did in that case intend to decide upon the general principle to be followed in determining the rate of interest. I hold, therefore, that interest at the rate of three per cent. is to be charged upon the sums advanced. My attention has been called to Hilton v. Hilton, where Malins, V.C., is reported as saying that interest should be charged upon sums received by children by way of maintenance or advancement, but the order as drawn up only charges interest on the sums advanced, and not on those given by way of maintenance. I think that the explanation must be that the order discriminates between sums allowed to a child solely for maintenance, which must, as regards the child's share, be taken as paid out of income, and sums paid in respect of the corpus of the estate so as to operate by way of advancement. I do not think that that case decides anything inconsistent with what I have now decided.

Solicitors, Gribble, Oddie, Sinclair, & Johnson, for Whiteford & Bennett, Plymouth.

---

Chan. Div. Buckley, J. — Feb. 5, 6.

KIRBY SMITH v. PARNELL. (a.)

Will—Construction—Residuary gift and bequest—Subsequent trusts—Real estate—Resulting trust.

A testator gave and bequeathed the residue of his estate and effects to trustees on certain trusts. There was no express trust for sale and conversion of real estate, and primâ facie the trusts were applicable to personal estate.

Held, (1) on the principle of D'Almaine v. Moseley, 1 W. R. 475, 1 Drew. 629, that the words of bequest were sufficient to pass real estate; and (2) on the principle of Saumarez v. Saumarez, 4 My. & Cr. 331, that, inasmuch as the testator had shown an intention to dispose of all his property, and the succeeding trusts did not show an intention only to deal with his personal estate, there was no resulting trust of the real estate.

Dunnage v. White, 1 Jac. & W. 583; Coard v. Holderness, 3 W. R. 311, 20 Beav. 147; and Longley v. Longley, 20 W. R. 227, L. R. 13 Eq. 133, distinguished.

Action without witnesses.

The question to be determined in this case was whether certain real estate belonging to a testator at the date of his death passed under his will, or whether, in respect of it, he died intestate.

By his will, dated the 19th of December, 1839, George Smith, as to all his ready money, securities for moneys, stock in any of the public funds of Great Britain, and all the rest, residue, and remainder of his estate and effects, whatsoever and wheresoever, gave and bequeathed the same to trustees, their executors, administrators, and assigns, upon trust to pay the interest, dividends, and annual proceeds of the said trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities to his widow during her life, and after her death he directed that the said trust moneys should be upon trust for all his children by her who should attain twenty-one. There was a power of maintenance out of the interest, dividends, and annual produce of each child's expectant share, and a power to advance to each child any part of his presumptive portion or share. In case the widow remarried, there was a provision directing the settlement of the "interest, dividends, and annual produce of the said trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities" to accrue during her coverture. He ultimately bequeathed "the said trust moneys" to his brother, "his executors, administrators, and assigns." The will contained a power to "change and vary the securities of the trust money," and a power in the case of the death of a trustee or of his becoming incapable of acting "in the trusts aforesaid" to appoint new trustees, with a direction that "the said trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities shall be transferred, so as to be vested in the names of the trustees for the time being."

The testator died on the 14th of June, 1878, without having altered his will, except by a codicil (not material to be here stated) bearing date the 5th of March, 1873.

The real estate in question was conveyed to the testator in 1860, and the several conveyances each contained a declaration to bar dower.

The widow remained in possession until her death on the 12th of July, 1901, having had one child only, who attained the age of twenty-one years, but died intestate on the 11th of May, 1884, without issue.

By her will dated the 23rd of January, 1890, the widow appointed the defendant her sole executor and trustee, and after making certain specific bequests, devised and bequeathed to him all the residue of her real and personal estate.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff, as the heir-at-law of the testator's son, claimed the real estate. The defendant, on the other hand, who was in possession, claimed that the testator died intestate as to the real estate, that the widow had acquired (as against the son) a title by adverse possession, and that it therefore passed under her will.

The questions argued were whether, on the construction of the will of the testator, the real estate passed to his trustees, and if it did so pass, whether the succeeding trusts showed such an intention to deal only with personal estate as that there ought to be inferred a resulting trust in favour of the testator.

Astbury, K.C., and W. A. Peck, for the plaintiff.—The words "estate and effects" are sufficient to pass real estate; Theobald on Wills, p. 192. There is no resulting trust in favour of the heir of testator. Dunnage v. White, 1 Jac. & W. 583, the case most against us on that point, is no longer law. In the present case there would be no doubt on the subject had not the usual trust for sale and conversion of real estate been accidentally omitted. In any case an implied trust for sale is conferred by the power to vary investments: In re Garnett Orme and Hargreaves' Contract, 32 W. R. 313, 25 Ch. D. 595, at p. 599. Apart from that, even though the trusts are more applicable to personalty than to realty, there is no resulting trust: D'Almaine v. Moseley, 1 W. R. 475, 1 Drew. 629; Lloyd v. Lloyd, 17 W. R. 702, L. R. 7 Eq. 458. Longley v. Longley, 20 W. R. 227, L. R. 13 Eq. 133, to the contrary effect, is wrong.

They also referred to Fullerton v. Martin, 1 W. R. 379, 22 L. J. Ch. 892.

Buckmaster, K.C., and J. M. Gover, for the defendant.—The real estate did not pass to the trustees at all; first, because there is no word or phrase exclusively applicable to real estate; secondly, because there is no trust for sale. A power to vary investments, such as there is here, is not such a direction as will imply a trust for sale: In re Holloway, 37 W. R. 77, 60 L. T. Rep. 46. There are no words like "collect and call in" (D'Almaine v. Moseley), "call in" (In re Garnett Orme), or "invest" (Fullerton v. Martin). Such words are consistent only with a power of sale or a trust for sale, and therefore their presence shows that such a power or trust will be implied. Those cases are distinguishable on that ground. The old cases which are still regarded as binding (Theobald on Wills, p. 193) are in my favour: Doe v. Buckner, 6 T. R. 610; Pogson v. Thomas, 6 Bing. N. C. 337; Coard v. Holderness, 3 W. R. 311, 20 Beav. 147. [BUCKLEY, J.—D'Almaine v. Moseley gives me a principle; those cases do not] The principle of D'Almaine v. Moseley cannot be applied where the subsequent words of the will are applicable only to personal estate. The power to appoint new trustees does not help the plaintiff, because they are to act on the trusts "aforesaid," and none of the trusts aforesaid are applicable to real estate. Even if the real property passed to the trustees, there are no words showing that the succeeding trusts are applicable to it, and therefore, on the principle of Dunnage v. White and Longley v. Longley, there must be a resulting trust of it in favour of the heir of the testator. [BUCKLEY, J.—If you find that the testator meant to pass the real estate, then the fact that the trusts are applicable to personal estate is immaterial: Saumarez v. Saumarez, 4 My. & Cr. 331.] That case was considered in Coard v. Holderness, 20 Beav. 147, at p. 155

BUCKLEY, J., after stating the facts, continued: The principle to be applied is this. In the first place, I ought to read the whole of the will, and from it ascertain the testator's intention. Secondly, on so reading the will, and ascertaining his intention, I ought to a certain extent to lean against an intestacy. Thirdly, where the testator uses technical words, it is a true rule of construction to say that I must give them their due effect, unless I find that, in the mouth of this testator, he uses them in some other sense. Fourthly, I must apply any established rules of construction which I find have been adopted by the court.

Now, as regards that last head, it seems to me that the relevant rules of construction, or some of them, are to be found in what was said by Kindersley, V.C., in D'Almaine v. Moseley. The Vice-Chancellor (1 Drew., at p. 632) says this: "The general principles applicable to cases of this sort are well established; the difficulty is not in ascertaining the principles, but in their application. One rule is, that the word estate simply, is sufficient to pass real estate; but in most cases the word estate is not used simply; and another rule is, that supposing that there is nothing in other parts of the will to control the meaning of the gift, the effect of the word estate, coupled with other words, is this: If the other words would without the word estate not be sufficient to pass the whole personal estate, the word estate will be considered as used to effect a complete passing of the personal estate, but if the other words are sufficient to pass all the personal estate, then the word estate must be read as intended to apply to real estate. It is equally clear that, consistently with the general principles, there may be words in the will which show that the language used may have an interpretation different from their ordinary and proper interpretation; but the rule being that the word estate is sufficient to pass real estate, and the other word used in this case being effects, which is sufficient to pass all the personal estate, so far as the language is considered primâ facie the word estate here would comprise the real estate; and unless there is something in the will to show a clear indication of intention to use the word estate in a sense different from its ordinary legal sense, it must be read in that sense. The cases on this subject are very numerous and not very easy to be reconciled, but the tendency of modern decision is to give less effect to minute and trivial matters than was attributed to them in former times." And a little further down he says: "The next point made is that in the language used for giving the residuary property the word devise does not occur. I think that also is no indication of intention, the word give is quite as efficient as the word devise to pass real estate, and is of quite as frequent use. Next it is said that there are no words of limitation to the heirs, but neither are there to the executors, so that no particular intention can be gathered. It can no more be said that it was intended by omitting a limitation to heirs to exclude real estate than that by the omission of a gift to executors it was intended to exclude personal estate." When I come to the will before me it will be found that several of the observations there will be applicable to this case.

The other passage which I want to read is addressed rather to the second argument of the defendant—namely, that assuming that the word "estate" in the will passes the real estate, the succeeding trusts only apply to the personal estate, and that there is a resulting trust of the real estate. For that I wish to read an extract from Lord Cottenham's judgment in Saumarez v. Saumarez. At 4 My. & Cr., p. 339, he says: "In considering gifts of residue, whether of real or of personal estate, it is not necessary to ascertain whether the testator had any particular property in contemplation at the moment. Indeed, such gifts may be introduced to guard against the testator having overlooked some property or interest in the gifts particularly described. If he meant to give the residue of his property, be it what it may, it is immaterial whether he did or did not know what would be included in it; and if so, it cannot make any difference that such ignorance is manifested upon the face of the will, unless the expressions manifesting it are sufficient to prove that the testator did not intend to use the words of gift in their ordinary, extended, and technical sense." And at p. 340 he says: "The circumstances of his using expressions and giving directions applicable only to the personal estate may prove that he did not at the time consider, or was not aware, that this fee would be part of his residue; but if such knowledge be not necessary, as it certainly is not, to give validity to the devise, the absence of it, though so manifested, cannot destroy the operation of the general intent of passing all the residue of the property."

Now, with those general statements of the principles, I turn to this will before going to the other cases which are said to have a bearing on it. The will is one by which the testator "as to all his ready money, securities for money, stock in any of the public funds of Great Britain, and all the rest, residue, and remainder of his estate and effects, whatsoever and wheresoever," gives and bequeaths the same to trustees. Pausing there, and without going on to the trusts at all, those words would certainly be sufficient to pass the real estate. Referring to the passage I have just read, you will find that without the word "estate" you have sufficient to pass all the personal estate. Then you find the word "estate." You do not find the verb "devise," but you do find the verb "give," and therefore you find a gift of "all my estate whatsoever and wheresoever." Unless the testator shows somewhere that he does not use the technical word "estate" in its proper meaning, that, I conceive, on what I have read from the judgment of Kindersley, V.C., shows that he has devised all his real estate. But that may be cut down by what follows. We have got to see. So far that is a devise of all his real estate. I am not going to read the trusts at length, for the moment. The words of the description of the trust property vary from time to time. [His lordship then read the will with reference to this point, and continued:] I want to make this general observation on the will. I cannot read this will without arriving at the conclusion that this testator meant (whether he has done it or not is another question) to dispose of everything he had to dispose of. It seems to me that the dominant intention of this will is to dispose of everything. If so, then applying the true principles of construction, I have to see whether, upon the language of his will, he has given effect to that intention or not. Now it is said that he has not given effect to it, by reason of the fact that in the description, or definition, of the subsequent trusts he has not used words wide enough. On the language of this will it appears to me that he has used words wide enough. I wish to make one other observation on the terms of the will as a whole. If the testator has, by his original gift, given his real estate to his trustees, then when he comes to the clause dealing with the appointment of new trustees, and the transfer of the trust property to the new trustees, you would expect that he would use words by which he would say "transfer to the new trustees all that was held by the old trustees." When you come to that clause you find that what he directs shall be transferred are "all the said trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities." If, therefore, the trustees ever took the real estate, he must have intended there should be a transfer of the real estate, and the thing to be transferred he calls "trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities." That is a reason for saying that, in this testator's mouth, those words were understood to mean, not personal estate only, but real estate also. Let me say one other word on the will. There is power to change and vary the securities of the trust money. That applies to trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities. It is not confined to money, and, that being the case, why should it not extend to everything included in the disposition? If I am right in saying that it includes the real estate, it includes that.

Now I pass to some of the other cases which were cited. The two cases most bearing on the subject are two decisions of Kindersley, V.C., in 1853. The first case is Fullerton v. Martin. In that case the verbs used were "give and bequeath," and the gift was of "all the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate and effects, whatsoever and wheresoever, upon trust to invest." It was held that the real estate passed under that residuary gift. The Vice-Chancellor, after making some general observations on such a gift as this, and commenting on Doe v. Buckner, says of that case: "I apprehend that the case of Doe v. Buckner would be decided differently at the present day, and the grounds of Lord Kenyon's decision would not now be sufficient to warrant such a conclusion." Then in the last paragraph of the judgment he deals with the word "invest," and he says: "It has been argued that this shows an intention of giving only the personal estate, because real estate cannot be invested, and there is no power of sale contained in the will. I confess there does not seem to me to be any weight contained in this argument. It is quite true that you cannot invest real estate without first selling it, nor could you invest leaseholds without doing something to convert them into money, nor could you invest an annuity in the funds without doing the same thing. So, also, there are many other species of personal property which could not at once be invested without previously being sold. The true meaning of these words must therefore be considered as a direction to invest, and to take all proper and necessary means for effecting that object by first selling it and then investing the proceeds according to the trusts of the will. For these reasons I do not think there is anything on the face of the will to show an intention of confining the meaning of the word 'estate,' and I think that the real estate passed under the will." It is to be noticed there that the Vice-Chancellor sets himself to look for a reason why the word "estate" is cut down from what it primâ facie would mean, and the passage I read is material to this case when you consider this clause as to the variation of investments at the end of the will; because if one once attributes to the testator, by implication, that the real estate, if he has real estate, is to be, or may be, converted into money, of course the whole thing becomes simple. The other decision of Kindersley, V.C., is D'Almaine v. Moseley. The gift there was "as to all the rest and residue of my estate and effects, I give and bequeath the same" to trustees on trust to "collect, get in, and receive the same and to invest the same and every part thereof" in various stock, with power to vary and transfer the same at their discretion, and to pay the "interest and dividends" to certain beneficiaries. It was held that the real estate passed. At the foot of p. 633, after stating that the words no doubt would be strictly applicable to personal estate, the Vice-Chancellor goes on to say "but in strictness also they are not applicable to certain portions of personal estate, which beyond all question would pass. If the testator had had leaseholds for years, or even for lives, they would be personal estate; and can I say that the use of words not properly applicable to real estate is an indication of an intention that real estate should not pass, when the very same words are applied to personal estate of a certain character, which clearly was intended to pass." It appears to me that this case falls within the considerations to which Kindersley, V.C., called attention in Fullerton v. Martin and D'Almaine v. Moseley. But on the other side Dunnage v. White, a decision of Sir T. Plumer, M.R., is cited. In that case it was held that the real estate passed, but that there were resulting trusts. The gift was this: "All the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate or effects, whatsoever and wheresoever, of what nature or kind soever, I give, devise, and bequeath unto my said trustees and executors." That plainly passed the real estate. Then the trusts were these—to make sale of "my household goods and stock-in-trade," and to collect all "debts due to me" and all "moneys" owing on mortgage, and when the same were collected, to divide the same and to "pay" the proceeds among certain people. All that the Master of the Rolls held was that the testator had specifically said "what I give away is what my household goods sell for, and what can be got in by collecting my debts and moneys owing on mortgage." That is the true explanation of Dunnage v. White, as it appears to me. From Coard v. Holderness I can get nothing, except that you must read the will all through, and if you find by the words which the testator has used he meant a particular thing, then you must give effect to it. The head-note substantially represents what Lord Romilly held. "The court, in this case, principally relied on the absence of the words 'heir,' 'devise,' and 'rent,' and the use of the expressions 'possession,' 'executors and administrators,' 'principal,' the 'balance,' 'the principal of the said legacies,' 'the direction to claim a share from his personal representatives,' and the power to appoint new trustees applicable to 'executors' and not to 'heirs.'" In other words, in that particular instrument, reading it all through, there were so many indications of an intention to deal only with personal estate that the court gave effect to it. No general principle is laid down in that case.

Then I may refer to Lloyd v. Lloyd, where Lord Romilly comments on his decision in Coard v. Holderness, and says he does not "use the words 'executors and administrators' which were relied on in Coard v. Holderness, and not only that, but he speaks of the income of his residuary estate." So that Lord Romilly takes the view that he only decided Coard v. Holderness on the particular expression there used. Then in Longley v. Longley he followed Dunnage v. White. He held from the use of the words "devise" and "heirs" that the real estate passed, but that the trusts were rigidly and exclusively applicable to personal estate, and therefore he followed Dunnage v. White; that is to say, he finds in the instrument that the trusts were confined, as in Dunnage v. White, to the trusts of particular property, which was personal property, and then nobody would dispute that the real estate would be undisposed of. I disclaim all intention to overrule any case. But Coard v. Holderness and Longley v. Longley were decided on the particular facts, while D'Almaine v. Moseley and Fullerton v. Martin were decided according to a principle perfectly well founded, and which binds me.

I think on the construction of this will that this testator did intend to pass his real estate, and I think he has used language which is capable of passing the real estate, and that the gift of the real estate takes effect, and therefore the plaintiff is entitled to succeed.

Solicitors, Griffith & Gardiner, for Bignold & Pollard, Norwich; Crowders, Vizard, & Oldham, for Dennis & Faulkner, Northampton.

---

K. B. Div. (Wright, J.) — Jan. 12.

In re LAKE.
Ex parte HOWE. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Proof—Security—Breach of trust—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), Schedule II.

Where a trustee of a settlement has invested funds of the settlement upon an unauthorized security and subsequently becomes bankrupt, a proof against his estate for the amount of the funds so invested will not be admitted, unless the creditor proving is in a position to hand over the security on which they were invested to the trustee.

In re Salmon, Priest v. Uppleby, 38 W. R. 150, 42 Ch. D. 351, followed and applied.

Semble, a proof for damages for breach of trust may be admitted.

Appeal of creditors against the rejection of proofs by the trustee in the bankruptcy.

The appellant creditors were the trustees of a settlement under which the firm of Lake & Lake had acted as solicitors, and of which B. G. Lake, one of the partners in the firm, had been a trustee. On the 18th of September, 1899, B. G. Lake dealt with a sum of £5,500 belonging to the trust fund in a way which the creditors alleged to amount to a misappropriation of the money, but which was held upon the evidence to have been merely an investment on an unauthorized security—namely, a loan to one Cavendish on a contributory mortgage.

A receiving order was made against Lake & Lake on the 27th of June, 1900, and in July of the same year the appellants, Mr. and Mrs. Howe, were appointed trustees of the settlement.

In 1902 Cavendish brought an action against the trustees of the Howe settlement to set aside the mortgage to which they had contributed. The trustees, being under the impression that they would have a difficulty in proving that the £5,500 ever got beyond the hands of Lake & Lake into those of Cavendish, compromised the action and gave up their claim as contributories to the mortgage on payment of £500. They then presented proofs against the estate of Lake & Lake, and alternatively against the separate estate of B. G. Lake, for the whole sum of £5,500. These proofs were rejected by the trustee and from his decision this appeal was brought.

Muir Mackenzie and Champernowne, for the appellants, contended that on the facts the sum of £5,500 had never been invested on the mortgage but had been misappropriated by Lake & Lake, and that in law they were entitled to have their proof admitted for the full amount without deducting the £500 obtained from Cavendish, as that sum was not derived from any security on the property of the bankrupt: Ex parte West Riding Union Banking Co., In re Turner, 30 W. R. 239, 19 Ch. D. 105; In re Blakely, 9 Morr. 173; Ex parte Biddulph, 3 De G. & Sm. 587.

Younger, K.C., and Northcote, for the trustee, contended on the facts that the money had been actually invested by loan to Cavendish on contributory mortgage, and on this point they were stopped by the court. On the law they contended that the investment being upon an unauthorized security, the appellants were bound either to accept it or reject it. If they accept the security they cannot ask for the fund to be replaced; if they reject it and claim that the fund be replaced, they must give up the security. Here the appellants by their compromise with Cavendish had elected to take the security, and having given it to Cavendish were no longer in a position to hand it over to Lake's estate. Consequently they could not be allowed to prove for the fund so invested: In re Salmon, Priest v. Uppleby, 38 W. R. 150, 42 Ch. D. 351; Head v. Gould, 46 W. R. 597, [1898] 2 Ch. 250.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

WRIGHT, J.—I agree with Mr. Muir Mackenzie that securities which are not on the property of the debtor need not be valued in presenting a proof against the debtor's estate, but the real substance of this case is whether the £5,500 was ever invested at all or was simply misappropriated, and it seems to me quite clear that all the evidence goes to show that it was actually invested, though on a security not authorized by the terms of the trust. That being so, have not the Howe trustees so dealt with the security as to preclude themselves from proving. The law is indicated by the Court of Appeal in In re Salmon, Priest v. Uppleby, that where a trustee has invested on an unauthorized security he is entitled to take over that security if he has to make good the sum invested. I cannot see why the trustee in bankruptcy here should not be entitled to the same rights. Primâ facie when the Howe trustees compromised the action brought by Cavendish they disentitled themselves from proving against the estate of Lake. Whether they did it on perfect or imperfect information they took their chance and must abide by the result, which is that their proofs must be rejected. I think that a good proof might possibly be lodged against the separate estate of B. G. Lake for damages for breach of trust, as he was personally a trustee, but even then it might be necessary to go into the question of whether the compromise was reasonable or not. This application must be dismissed without prejudice to the presentation of a proof upon the lines I have indicated.

Solicitors for the appellants, Wigan, Champernowne, & Prescott.

Solicitors for the trustee, Lee & Pembertons.

---

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div.
(Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) April 28.

In re BRYDONE'S SETTLEMENT.
COBB v. BLACKBURNE. (a.)

Settlement—Marriage settlement—Wife's property—"Die without having been married."

By a marriage settlement, made in 1870, certain property (the wife's) was settled on the usual trusts for the wife and husband and children of the marriage, and in the event (which happened) of the wife dying in the lifetime of the husband, upon such trusts in favour of the children as the wife should by will or codicil appoint, and in default of appointment and on failure of any child attaining the age of twenty-one or marrying, upon trust for such person or persons as under the Statutes of Distribution would have been entitled thereto if the wife had died intestate "and without having been married." The wife died intestate in the lifetime of her husband, without having exercised her power of appointment, and leaving two children, who died in their infancy. On the husband's death his executor claimed the property, as representing the deceased children.

Held, that there was nothing to prevent the court giving to the words "without having been married" their natural meaning, and that consequently the wife's next-of-kin (excluding the infant children) were entitled to the property.

Wilson v. Atkinson, 4 De G. J. & S. 455, 13 W. R. Ch. Dig. 77, considered.

Originating summons.

By a marriage settlement dated the 8th of June, 1870, made between Henry Gray Brydone, the intended husband, of the first part, Sophia Marianne Crofton, the intended wife, then a spinster, of the second part, and trustees of the third and fourth parts, certain personalty belonging to the intended wife was settled upon trust during the joint lives of the husband and wife to pay the income to the wife for life for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after the decease of either of them upon trust to pay the income to the survivor for his or her life, and after the decease of the survivor in trust for the child or for all or any such one or more of the children of the marriage as the wife and husband should by deed jointly appoint, and in default of such appointment, and so far as no such appointment should extend, in trust for all the children or any the child of the said intended marriage who being sons or a son should attain the age of twenty-one years or being daughters or a daughter should attain that age or marry, and if more than one in equal shares, with the usual hotchpot clause. After the usual clauses for advancement, maintenance, and education, and accumulation of surplus income for the benefit of the children or child of the said intended marriage, the indenture proceeded as follows: "It is hereby declared that if there shall be no child of the said intended marriage, who being a son shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter shall attain that age or marry, then (without prejudice to the trusts hereinbefore declared) and from and after the decease of the said Sophia Marianne Crofton and such default or failure of children as aforesaid, the trustees or trustee for the time being of these presents do and shall hold the Crofton Trust Fund and the investments for the time being representing the same, or so much thereof respectively as shall not have become vested or been applied under any of the trusts, powers, or provisions herein contained, upon the trusts following—that is to say, if the said Sophia Marianne Crofton shall survive the said Henry Gray Brydone, then after his decease and such default or failure of children as aforesaid, in trust for the said Sophia Marianne Crofton, but if the said Sophia Marianne Crofton shall die in the lifetime of the said Henry Gray Brydone, then after her decease and such default or failure of children as aforesaid upon and for such trusts, intents, and purposes as the said Sophia Marianne Crofton shall, notwithstanding coverture, by will or codicil appoint, and in default of such appointment and so far as no such appointment shall extend, in trust for such person or persons as under the statutes for the distribution of the effects of intestates would have become entitled thereto at the decease of the said Sophia Marianne Crofton if she had died possessed thereof intestate and without having been married."

The marriage was solemnized in June, 1870, and on the 22nd of April, 1871, Mrs. Brydone died intestate, leaving two infant children (twins) surviving.

(a.) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

These children died about eight months after Mrs. Brydone's death.

In 1872 Mr. Brydone married again, and settled his life interest in the above fund on his second wife.

He died in December, 1901.

No appointment had been made under any of the powers contained in the settlement, and the trustees of the settlement now took out an originating summons for the determination of the question as to who were entitled to the fund under the ultimate trust, whether the wife's statutory next-of-kin (excluding the infant children) or the executor of the husband as representing the infant children.

Kekewich, J., on counsel admitting that the facts in this case were the same as In re Mare, Mare v. Howey, [1902] 2 Ch. 112, 50 W. R. Dig. 157, declined to have the question in dispute re-argued before him, and held that the representative of the deceased children was entitled to the fund. Under these circumstances the defendant, Elizabeth Susanna Blackburne, the sole next-of-kin of the wife, brought this appeal.

Warrington, K.C., and Joseph Tanner, for next-of-kin of the wife.—There is nothing to induce the court to put an unnatural meaning upon these words. Wilson v. Atkinson, 4 De G. J. & S. 455, 13 W. R. Ch. Dig. 77, did not lay down any general rule, and all the authorities cited against us proceed on a mistaken view of the decision in Wilson v. Atkinson. In Clarke v. Colls, 9 H. L. Cas. 601, the words were "unmarried" and not "without having been married." In In re Ball's Trust, 27 W. R. 409, 11 Ch. D. 270, and Upton v. Brown, 28 W. R. 38, 12 Ch. D. 872, Fry, J., felt himself constrained to decide according to the supposed rule in Wilson v. Atkinson; but in Emmins v. Bradford, 28 W. R. 531, 13 Ch. D 493, Jessel, M.R., came to the conclusion that Wilson v. Atkinson had not laid down a general rule. Hardman v. Maffett, 13 L. R. Ir. 499, was a case on all fours with ours, and there the Irish Master of the Rolls followed the view of Jessel, M.R. In Stoddart v. Saville, 42 W. R. 361, [1894] 1 Ch. 480, Chitty, J., followed Fry, J., but in that case there was no trust for the issue of the marriage. In re Arden's Settlement, [1890] W. N. 204, was a very peculiar case. In In re Deane's Trusts, [1900] 1 Ir. R. 332, the Irish Master of the Rolls followed his former decision.

Haldane, K.C., and D. Pollock, for the representative of the infant children.—In the case of a marriage settlement there is a strong presumption that you intend to benefit the issue of the marriage. In Clarke v. Colls that presumption was taken account of. The rule is this: Take the words as they stand, but if you find an intention, either written or presumed by law, you must take that into account. There is here a presumption of an intention to benefit the issue of a marriage rather than remote collaterals. This was the ground of the decision in Wilson v. Atkinson, which lays down a general rule of construction binding on this court. The principle laid down in Wilson v. Atkinson was the law at the time when this settlement was made. In this case the power of appointment is only in favour of children and not remoter issue, and no provision is made for the child of a son who might have married and died before attaining the age of twenty-one. In all the cases cited against us there was a general power of appointment.

They referred also to In re Watson's Trusts, 55 L. T. Rep. 316, 35 W. R. Dig. 220.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think that in this case we must give to the words "without having been married" their natural meaning. It is argued that we ought not to do this, because, it is said, when you are dealing with a marriage settlement there is a presumption that the intending husband and wife intended to benefit the children of the marriage, and this presumption is so strong that it compels us to construe these words in a non-natural manner; so strong that it binds us to construe nunquam nupta as innupta. It is to my mind quite clear that Lord Cranworth did not recognize the existence of any such powerful presumption in the case of Clarke v. Colls, and the passage I am going to refer to is on p. 612 of the report (9 H. L. Cas.). The phrase which appeared in that case, it is true, was "unmarried" and not "without having been married," but he says this: "What is the meaning of the 'unmarried'? It may, without any violence to language, mean either 'without ever having been married,' or 'not having a husband living at death.' If the former construction be adopted, then, if the wife should survive her husband and afterwards marry and have children, her collateral relatives would take the fund to the exclusion of her own issue." That presumption, then, was not recognized by Lord Cranworth. But it is said that, although this may be so, the presumption is recognized in Wilson v. Atkinson. Now, firstly, as a matter of fact, there were special circumstances in that case which would have justified the decision without having recourse to any such principle. Of course if it could be clearly shown that the Court of Appeal did recognize that presumption, and, that in all cases of a marriage settlement where there is a clause, like the present, for the distribution of property in favour of the next-of-kin of the wife, such clause ought not to exclude issue of the marriage, we should be bound by the decision. And I am not forgetting that in Stoddart v. Saville, Chitty, J., did recognize Wilson v. Atkinson as laying down such a general rule and as having been acted on as an authority. Yet, notwithstanding that view, which was more or less shared by Fry, J., I do not think we ought to regard Wilson v. Atkinson as a decision by the Court of Appeal in which such a principle is recognized. It was unnecessary for the court to go that length. The circumstances in that case, in particular the declaration as to the illegitimate child, fully justified the conclusion arrived at by the court. It seems to me that we are left at large and are not bound to say that there is any presumption which compels us never to give any construction to these words which would result in the exclusion of issue. On the contrary, in each case one must look at what there is within the four corners of the settlement, and then see whether there is anything in the context which would justify us in departing from the natural meaning of the words used. I do not mean that in construing a marriage settlement the court will not more readily arrive at a conclusion which gives the husband and wife and children a benefit than at one which excludes them. But I cannot admit that there is a presumption powerful enough to override the natural meaning of words. I am not sure that in this particular case there is any need to go into Wilson v. Atkinson, because in this particular case not only do we not find anything which would assist us in coming to a conclusion which would not exclude the children, but there is everything to lead us to the conclusion that in this particular case there was no intention that the issue should take any benefit other than that expressly provided for them. If the cases are looked at, whatever may have been said in the judgments, there were always circumstances which of themselves would naturally lead to the conclusion that in the particular case it could not have been intended to exclude children. Under these circumstances I do not propose to go through the cases one after another. It is sufficient for me to say that there are the cases of Emmins v. Bradford, Hardman v. Maffett, and In re Deane's Trusts, in which Jessel, M.R., and the Irish Master of the Rolls took the same view as that contained in my judgment. Kekewich, J., having regard to the previous decisions of Chitty, J., and Fry, J., did not feel himself justified in arriving at a conclusion in conflict with those decisions. In my judgment there is nothing in this case which prevents us giving these words their natural meaning, and herein I am following the almost express decision of Lord Cranworth.

ROMER, L.J.—I come to the same conclusion. I feel bound to say that I can find no ambiguity in the words of this particular clause. To my mind it is clear that the words should receive their natural meaning, unless there is anything in the instrument as a whole which would justify us in departing from that natural meaning. In my opinion there is nothing which would so justify us. It may be conceded that in the ordinary marriage settlement the children of the marriage are primâ facie the proper beneficiaries thereunder. It may very well be, and I do not doubt that where no provisions are made for the children of the marriage, or provisions obviously inadequate, we might be called on to say it would be unreasonable to give such words their ordinary meaning. But in this particular case I find a clear and adequate and proper provision for the children. There is no sufficient reason to justify the court in this particular case in failing to give these words their natural meaning. In my opinion there is no necessity binding this court to say that in all marriage settlements the clause "without having been married" must receive an artificial or special construction. In fact, in the present settlement, if you do not give those words their simple meaning, you will not be carrying out the intention of the parties to that settlement. It could not have been intended, when such careful provisions were made in the interests of children, that, in default of any child attaining a vested interest, the father should have been able to claim in form for them, in reality for himself.

There is only one possible state of circumstances which can be suggested as tending to show that the provisions in this settlement were not wholly reasonable. It was said that if a son married under twenty-one, had a son, and then died under twenty-one, his son would have been unprovided for. Well, the first thing I have to say is that such a state of circumstances is not very likely to occur, and the fact that such a contingency was not fully provided for is no sufficient argument to induce us not to give the words their proper natural meaning. In any case if another child obtained a vested interest under the settlement, the son who died under twenty-one would not be entitled to take a share. It appears to me that it was not intended that a son should attain a vested interest in such a case. The authorities on the matter were well dealt with by Swinfen Eady, J., in the case of In re Smith's Settlement, ante, p. 217, [1903] 1 Ch. 373, recently before him, and all I need say is that in Wilson v. Atkinson the learned Lords Justices decided on a settlement of a peculiar character.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This case is important, because it raises the construction of a clause in a marriage settlement which is in almost common form. I doubt whether on perusing this particular clause any person could entertain a doubt as to its meaning. But it is argued that certain principles have been laid down by a series of cases which bind us to put a non-natural construction on these words. I can, however, find no rule laid down either by the Court of Appeal or the House of Lords which prevents us from giving these words their ordinary natural meaning. On the contrary, I think Clarke v. Colls a strong decision in favour of the appellants. It was pointed out in that case that the term "unmarried" was a word of dubious import, and might mean either "spinster" or "widow." Lord Cranworth expressly said that if the words used here, "without ever having been married," had been used, the decision in that case would have been different. In Wilson v. Atkinson the decision is plainly correct, but the case was decided on the context of a particular instrument. I adopt the judgment of Sir George Jessel, M.R., in Emmins v. Bradford, the judgments of the Irish Master of the Rolls in Hardman v. Maffett and In re Deane's Trusts, and the recent judgment of Swinfen Eady, J., in In re Smith's Settlement. No doubt there may be sometimes a context sufficient to justify the court in coming to another conclusion, as in Wilson v. Atkinson. I do not wish to decide what would be the effect if no provisions for children had been made in a settlement at all. Here a provision for children was made, and the ultimate trust only took effect in the event of no children attaining the age of twenty-one or marrying. The appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Bower, Colton, & Bower, for Mayo & Son, Yeovil; Quayle & Davey; Williamson, Hill, & Co, for Charlewood & Chesney, Manchester.

---

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) — March 31.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. WANDSWORTH BOROUGH COUNCIL. (a.)

Metropolis—Management Acts—Street—New street—Paving expenses—Owners—Open space abutting on new street—Public body—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 250—Metropolis Management Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 77.

An open space, which had been dedicated to the public as a common or recreation ground, was, under the provisions of certain statutes, regulated and managed by the London County Council, as the successors of the Metropolitan Board of Works. The effect of the county council's statutory powers was that they could not use the common for any purposes except such as were subordinate to the public purposes to which it had been dedicated. They received rent for a refreshment-house which was erected on the common, and they also received yearly sums in respect of grazing rights and of licences to have gateways opening on the common; but the expenses of regulating and managing the common far exceeded the receipts.

Held, that the county council were not the owners of the common within the definition of "owner" in section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, so as to make them liable to contribute to the expenses of paving a new street on which the common abutted.

Vestry of Fulham v. Minter, 49 W. R. 415, [1901] 1 K. B. 501, overruled.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Darling and Channell, JJ.) on a special case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

---

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The council of the metropolitan borough of Wandsworth, under section 77 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, claimed from the London County Council the sum of £319 19s., being the apportionment alleged to be payable by the London County Council as the owners of Tooting Bec Common, towards the expenses of paving a new street, called Rastell-avenue, in the parish of Streatham, and the metropolitan borough of Wandsworth.

Rastell-avenue was bounded on the eastern side by a row of houses and on the western side by Tooting Bec Common for a length of 474ft.

By the Metropolitan Commons Supplemental Act, 1873, a scheme relating to Tooting Bec Common, certified by the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, pursuant to the provisions of the Metroplitan Commons Act, 1866, was confirmed. The scheme recited that the Manor of Tooting Bec had been purchased by Beriah Drew and Phillp William Flower, with the knowledge and approval of the Metropolitan Board of Works, to the intent that the commons or waste lands belonging to the said manor might be dedicated to the public as a recreation ground under the provisions of the Metropolitan Commons Act, 1866, and that it had been agreed that the said Beriah Drew and Philip William Flower, in pursuance of the object with which they bought the said manor, and to the intent that the same might be dedicated to the public, would transfer their purchase of and all their interest in the said manor, commons, and waste lands to the Metropolitan Board of Works, and the said board would accept the transfer thereof. The scheme provided that from and after the completion of the purchase by the Metropolitan Board of Works the commons or waste lands delineated in a plan deposited with the said Inclosure Commissioners, and comprising Tooting Bec Common, should for the purposes of the scheme be regulated and managed by the said board. The scheme conferred upon the board (inter alia) the following powers: The board may drain, plant, ornament, and improve the common as may be necessary, and, for the purpose of preserving the turf and grass, may enclose by fences for short periods such portions as may require rest to revive the same, and, for further protection of the common, may put up a post and chain defence against the straying of cattle along such portion of it as is marked by a dotted line in the said plan. No house or any other buildings shall be erected on the common, except such lodges or other buildings as may be necessary for the maintenance or management of the said common or recreation ground. The board may from time to time erect on the common such lodges and other buildings as may be necessary for the maintenance or management of the said common or recreation ground."

By section 14 of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Various Powers) Act, 1875, it was provided that the adjoining common of Tooting Graveney should be regulated and managed by the board as a place of recreation for the public, and for that purpose certain of the powers conferred on the board with reference to the management of Tooting Bec Common by the scheme and Act of 1873, including the above, were extended and made applicable to Tooting Graveney Common.

Tooting Bec Common and Tooting Graveney Common were regulated and managed by the Metropolitan Board of Works under the Acts and the scheme above mentioned down to the commencement of the operation of the Local Government Act, 1888, since which time they had been regulated and managed by the London County Council as the successors of the said board. Bye-laws relating to the said commons had been from time to time made by the said board and by the London County Council. The total area of the two commons was about 210 acres. On Tooting Graveney Common there was a lodge, of the gross rental value of about £30, necessary for the management of the common and occupied by an inspector in the employment of the London County Council, from whose wages a deduction was made in respect of the quarters provided for him in the lodge. On Tooting Bec Common there was a refreshment-house, which was let by the London County Council to a refreshment contractor at a rent of £30 a year, out of which the council paid repairs of the estimated amount of £5 a year. The county council let the rights of grazing under one entire contract over all the commons under their management and control for the sum of £210, of which the sum attributable to Tooting Bec and Tooting Graveney Commons was from £20 to £30. The county council received from the owners and occupiers of houses abutting on the said commons small annual payments, amounting in all to £5 19s. 6d., in respect of licences to have gateways opening on the said commons. The expenses incurred by the county council in the year 1898 to 1899 in respect of the management and regulation of the two commons amounted to £1,190 19s., while the total receipts (excluding the aforesaid sum of £5 19s 6d.) were £26 7s. 3d.—viz., £18 15s. from the refreshment-house and £7 12s. 3d. in respect of grazing rights. In the year 1899 to 1900 the expenses amounted to £1,518 11s. 9d. and the receipts to £55 15s. 3d.—viz., £24 9s. from the refreshment house and £31 6s. 3d. in respect of grazing rights.

The London County Council contended that they were not the owners of Tooting Bec Common within the meaning of the definition of the word "owner" in section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855; that the said common was not capable of being let at a rack-rent in consequence of the provisions of the above-mentioned Acts; and that they, the London County Council, did not and could not receive a rack-rent for the said common.

By section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, the word "owner" shall mean "the person for the time being receiving the rack-rent of the lands or premises in connection with which the said word is used, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would receive the same if such lands or premises were let at a rack-rent."

The magistrate made an order against the London County Council for payment of the sum claimed, but stated this special case for the opinion of the court.

On the hearing of the special case the Divisional Court affirmed the decision of the magistrate on the authority of Vestry of Fulham v. Minter, 49 W. R. 415, [1901] 1 K. B. 501.

The London County Council appealed.

Avory, K.C., and Ryde, for the appellants.

Mattinson, K.C., and J. C. Earle, for the respondents.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 31.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read the following judgment: It was decided in Lambeth Overseers v. London County Council, 46 W. R. 79, [1897] A. C. 625, following Hare v. Overseers of Putney, 29 W. R. 721, 7 Q. B. D. 223, that the public is not a rateable occupier. The question in this case is whether the public is or can be, within the meaning of the definition of the word "owner" in section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, extended to land by section 77 of the Act of 1862, owner of land used by virtue of statutory provisions exclusively as a public recreation ground. Now, in my judgment, this question cannot be disposed of on the authority of the rating cases which I have just cited. From an abstract point of view it is obvious that the question whether property dedicated to the public ought to contribute to poor rate is a very different question from the question whether such property ought to contribute to a road which is a convenience to the property. Moreover, it seems to me that the present case must necessarily be decided by ascertaining what is the true construction of the interpretation contained in section 250 of the Act of 1855. The terms of that section are: "'Owner' shall mean the person for the time being receiving the rack-rent of lands or premises in connection with which the said word is used, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would receive the same if such lands or premises were let at a rack-rent." It seems plain that land may be so dedicated to public purposes that it cannot be let at a rack-rent at all, and in such case it seems to me to follow, from the decision of the Exchequer Chamber in Plumstead Board of Works v. British Land Co., 23 W. R. 634, L. R. 10 Q. B. 203, that the persons in whom the legal title to such land was vested would not be owners within the meaning of section 250. The principle is thus stated by Lord Watson in Great Eastern Railway Co. v. Hackney District Board of Works, 31 W. R. 769, 8 App. Cas. 687: "The authorities cited in the course of the argument appear to me to establish this proposition—that the person vested with the property of heritable subjects which have been placed extra commercium, or are subject in perpetuity to the burden of a public right which deprives him of their beneficial use, is not an owner of land within the meaning of section 77 of the Act of 1862." And by Bowen, L.J., in Wright v. Ingle, 34 W. R. 220, 16 Q. B. D. 379, the same principle is thus stated: "Whether in the case of premises which were prevented by an Act of Parliament from being let at a rack-rent there ever could be an owner within the meaning of section 250, I very much doubt. I am inclined to think that, if this incapacity to be let were stamped on the premises, they never could have an owner within the meaning of section 250."

Applying the principle thus stated to the present case, we have to determine whether the county council could let these commons or any part of them at a rack-rent; and in considering this question I do not think that it is of any importance that it is a part only of the land which is so let or could be so let; nor do I think it of any importance that the payment received or which could be received is taken in a form in which rack-rent is not ordinarily taken, such, for instance, as by way of reduction of wages, or payment for the temporary right to take the herbage, or payment for the right to temporarily occupy a bandstand or a refreshment stall. The form is immaterial if that which is taken is the equivalent of rack-rent: Vestry of St. Giles, Camberwell v. London Cemetery Co., 42 W. R. 446, [1894] 1 Q. B. 699. Again I do not think that the fact that the statutory conditions under which the land is held prevent so high a rent from being obtained as might have been obtained but for the limitations of user imposed by those conditions, negatives the rent received being a rack-rent within the meaning of the definition. What we have to determine is whether or not the dedication of the land to public purposes so that the use of it for any purpose must be a use subordinate to the public purposes to which —to use the words of Lord Fitzgerald in Great Eastern Railway Co. v. Hackney Board of Works—the park or recreation ground is in its whole devoted, excludes those in whom the land is legally vested from the category of owners within the meaning of section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. The fact that the legal owners have no beneficial ownership, but are merely trustees, does not by the very terms of the section exclude them from the category of owners. Does the fact that they are trustees for the public exclude them? I have come to the conclusion that it does.

Apart from some such overriding limitation of the words of section 250 as is indicated by Lords Watson and Fitzgerald in Great Eastern Railway Co. v. Hackney Board of Works, I should have come to the same conclusion myself as that arrived at in Vestry of Fulham v. Minter by Bruce and Phillimore, JJ., and Mr. Rose, the magistrate. In my opinion the London County Council are the owners of land bounding or abutting on the street. They are trustees for the public, and would receive the rack-rent of the land as I think it lawfully might be without interfering with the purposes to which the land is devoted by statute. This in effect is the same conclusion as that arrived at by Mr. Rose in Vestry of Fulham v. Minter; but I think that the receipt of such rack-rent would be subordinate to the public purposes to which these parks or recreation grounds are wholly devoted. This is not a case where the rents received show a surplus after providing for the expenses of the execution of the statutory purposes. I think that such dedication to the public places the land extra commercium, and that the burden of the public right deprives those in whom the legal estate and possession is vested of the beneficial ownership or occupation of such land. In this case the Divisional Court only followed the decision in Vestry of Fulham v. Minter, which bound them. It does not bind us, and, as we think it was wrongly decided, we must reverse the decision of the Divisional Court.

STIRLING, L.J., read the following judgment: The question in this special case is whether the London County Council are the owners of Tooting Bec Common within the meaning of section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, so as to be liable to contribute to the cost of a new street on which part of the common abuts. The section referred to provides that the word "owner" in the Act shall (with exceptions unnecessary to be mentioned) "mean the person for the time being receiving the rack-rent of the lands or premises in connection with which the word is used, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would receive the same if such lands or premises were let at a rack-rent." The Divisional Court has in the circumstances held, on the authority of a previous decision of the same court (Vestry of Fulham v. Minter), that the London County Council are the owners of the common in question within the meaning of the section in question, and from this decision the council have appealed.

The meaning of the definition of owner in section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act of 1855, and of the similar definition in the Public Health Act of 1875, has been repeatedly considered by the courts. In Hornsey District Council v. Smith, 45 W. R. 581, [1897] 1 Ch. 843, A. L. Smith, L.J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, after stating in some detail the two cases of Plumstead Board of Works v. British Land Co., in the Exchequer Chamber, and Great Eastern Railway Co v. Hackney District Board of Works, says: "These two cases, in our judgment, show that, if land be by statute for ever incapable of yielding a rack-rent, the owner thereof is not 'owner' within the meaning of the Acts." I respectfully agree with this conclusion.

The question then reduces itself to this, whether the land is by statute for ever incapable of yielding a rack-rent. In Plumstead Board of Works v. British Land Co. the lands in question were roads dedicated to the public. In Great Eastern Railway Co. v. Hackney District Board of Works the "lands" consisted of the parapets of a bridge erected over a cutting in which the Great Eastern Railway runs. It was suggested that the walls of the parapets might be turned to profitable use by the company by letting the surfaces for posting advertisements. On this Lord Watson observed: "The suggestion is ingenious, and may or may not have some possible foundation in fact, but it fails to satisfy me that the Legislature in framing the Metropolis Management Acts intended to deal with the surface of a mere roadside fence as 'land' which might be let at a rack-rent." With this Lord Blackburn expressed his concurrence. Lord FitzGerald says: "The bridge is by the statute dedicated to public use, and its fence walls are provided for public protection; and if the ownership and control of the walls is in the company, it is so for public purposes and subject to the obligation of perpetual maintenance, unless and until some other good and sufficient fences shall be provided by the company in their stead for the public protection. The company could not let the walls at a rack-rent, and if they might use them for any purpose it must be a use subordinate to the public purposes to which the bridge as a structure is in its whole devoted." These passages seem to me to establish that, although land dedicated to public purposes may be, or be capable of being, used for some purpose of profit, it does not follow that it is, or can be, let at a rack-rent.

Now, Tooting Bec Common is by the scheme and statute of 1873 dedicated to the public as a "common or recreation ground." The extent of the rights of the public is shown by this, that it was considered necessary to insert express provisions authorizing the Metropolitan Board of Works to fence off for short periods such portions of the turf and grass as might require rest, and also to put up on a defined portion a post and chain fence for the protection of the common against the straying of cattle. These rights of the public appear to me to be such as to render the common as a whole incapable of being let at a rack-rent. It is stated in the special case that the common is let for grazing purposes; but I take this to mean that licences have been granted to feed sheep and cattle thereon subject to and consistently with the rights of the public; and any payments made in consideration of such licences appear to me to be similar in their nature to the profits which were suggested in Great Eastern Railway Co. v. Hackney District Board of Works as possible to be earned by the letting of the parapet walls for advertisements. At all events, the letting for grazing purposes mentioned in the case does not, in my judgment, constitute a letting at a rack-rent. Still less can this be said of the arrangements under which some small sums amounting to £5 19s. 6d. are paid in respect of licences granted to adjoining owners to have gateways opening on the commons with the view of preventing private rights being acquired by them. There are, however, two buildings to be considered—viz., the refreshment room built on Tooting Bec Common and the inspector's lodge built on Tooting Graveney Common. Of these the former is the more important, first, because it is situate on Tooting Bec Common, and, secondly, because it is let to a contractor at an annual rent of £30. Now, if this building abutted on the new street, I should, as at present advised, feel some difficulty in holding that the London County Council were not liable to contribute in respect of it. In fact, however, it is situate at a considerable distance from the new street and on a different part of the common. In the present case the London County Council are sought to be made liable, not in respect of this building as the owners of a house under section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act of 1855, but in respect of a portion of the common free from any building and as owners of land bounding or abutting on a new street under section 77 of the Act of 1862. The existence of the building can only be, and (I assume) is, justified as being "necessary for the maintenance or management of the common or recreation ground." If it be true, as I think, that the portion of the common which abuts on the new street is incapable of being let at a rack-rent, I do not see that the case is altered because the London County Council have for the purpose just mentioned seen fit to erect on another part of the common a building which is capable of being so let. For the like reason, the existence of the lodge on Tooting Graveney Common does not appear to me to create a liability on the part of the London County Council. On the whole, I arrive at the conclusion that the appeal ought to be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J., read the following judgment: I cannot agree with the Divisional Court in the interpretation put in the case of Vestry of Fulham v. Minter upon section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. I do not think that the county council were owners of the land in question, nor were the moneys received by them a rack-rent within the meaning of the section. The county council had the legal estate in the land, which was vested in them for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation, and the erection thereon of such buildings and appliances as they might think requisite for those and the like purposes. They were in fact for those ends the custodians and managers of the property. The premises could not be let at a rack-rent and could not be profitably occupied by the county council. Their tenure meant, as is shown by the figures stated in the case, not income, but expenditure. Section 250, it seems to me, was intended to describe persons who had or who represented proprietary rights in premises abutting upon a street. The charge for the improvements in question might properly be imposed upon such persons, because the value of their interests was likely to be enhanced by the outlay. I do not think that the definition was intended to include imaginary or hypothetical owners. So far as the county council was concerned the land by Act of Parliament was rendered sterile and deprived of any commercial value. I am also unable to concur in the view that the moneys paid to the county council ought to be regarded as the best rent which could be obtained and therefore amounted to a rack-rent. The small sums received from the structures and appliances which the county council were empowered to provide bore no relation to the intrinsic value of the land. They have the character of the land upon which they stand. They are, like the land, devoted to the public purposes intended to be served. With respect to the receipts for herbage it was necessary that the grass should be kept down, and this purpose was served by letting it to be grazed by sheep. This was probably a more economical process than mowing the grass from time to time and casting it away. I think the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellants, W. A. Blaxland.

Solicitors for the respondents, W. W. Young & Son.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) March 26.

LANGRISH v. WATTS. (a.)

Limitations, Statute of—Acknowledgment—Promise to pay—Promise to pay sum found due on accounts taken—21 Jac. 1, c. 16.

The defendant, whose debt of £100 to the plaintiff, his uncle, was barred by the Statute of Limitations, wrote to the plaintiff's wife within six years before action a letter in which he said that he was sorry at not having been able to pay it off long ago, that he was unable to satisfy himself as to the exact amount owing, but that he had some note of what he had paid back, and asking for particulars, adding that he would do his best to pay back what he owed. The plaintiff's wife having replied that the plaintiff denied that anything had been paid off, the defendant wrote to her as follows: "I must say your letter was a great surprise to me. I was well aware that I did give uncle a note for £100 originally, but subsequently I gave him a cheque for £40, because I kept the stub of the cheque, and I am almost positive I also gave him another cheque for £20, reducing the amount at the time I left home to £40. How it is uncle did not credit me with it, I cannot think; but if he hunts up his old bank books he will be able to trace up the amounts, and I feel sure he will be satisfied that I am correct. Anyway I hope so. Just at present I cannot lay my hand upon my bank book of that date, or would be more positive on the subject. At present I have no money on hand, having bought some houses out of the portion I got, but as soon as there is another division I will send uncle some. In the meantime I hope you will hunt up the required information." Since that letter "another division" (i.e., of property under a will) had taken place. In an action to recover the £100 and interest, the judge found that no part of the £100 had been repaid.

Held, that the letter, though not an acknowledgment of the debt of £100, contained a promise to pay the amount which might be found due from the defendant upon the accounts being taken, and that therefore the Statute of Limitations was no bar to the action.

Appeal from the judgment of Bruce, J.

The action was brought to recover £201 15s. 10d. for principal and interest on a promissory note for £100, made by the defendant and dated the 9th of December, 1881, and payable with interest at £5 per cent. per annum to the plaintiff on demand.

The defendant did not deny the making of the note or that the plaintiff had lent him £100 on the date named, but alleged that he had repaid a portion of it, and also set up the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16). The main question was whether certain letters written by the defendant to the plaintiff's wife in 1901 contained an admission of the debt and promise to pay sufficient to take the case out of the statute.

On the 27th of June, 1901, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff's wife: "Dear Aunt Bessie,—On hearing from Maud this morning I was sorry to find that uncle had thought it necessary to get Mary to remind me of the promise I made when I saw him last. I fully intended to attend to it at once; but ever since then I have had such a constant drain upon my small means in consequence of my wife's terrible illness that I had put it off, thinking that there would soon be another division, and I should be placed in a better position to meet my obligation to uncle. I am very sorry I have never been in a position to have paid it off years ago. My papers have got considerably mixed up, and I cannot satisfy myself quite as to the exact amount I was owing uncle when I left home the first time. I have some note of what I paid back; but to clear up the subject I shall be pleased if you can furnish me with particulars to check them with mine, and I will do my best to pay back what I owe. I am writing this to you, as I expect uncle has very little to do with business affairs now. . . ." The plaintiff's wife replied that the plaintiff denied that any of the money had been repaid. To this the defendant answered, on the 10th of July, 1901, as follows: "Dear Aunt,—I must say your letter was a great surprise to me. I was well aware that I did give uncle a note for £100 originally, but subsequently I gave him a cheque for £40, because I kept the stub of the cheque, and I am almost positive I also gave him another cheque for £20, reducing the amount at the time I left home to £40. How it is uncle did not credit me with it, I cannot think; but if he hunts up his old bank-books he will be able to trace up the amounts, and I feel sure he will be satisfied that I am correct. Anyway I hope so. Just at present I cannot lay my hand upon my bank book of that date, or would be more positive on the subject. At present I have no money on hand, having bought some houses out of the portion I got, but as soon as there is another division I will send uncle some. In the meantime I hope you will be able to hunt up the required information." The plaintiff's wife having again written that the plaintiff denied having received payment of any part of the sum, the defendant, on the 29th of October, 1901, wrote to the plaintiff a letter, of which the following were the material parts: "I expect to be down shortly, and will call to see you about the note. If by any means I am not down before long, I will take other means of fixing up the matter. I cannot understand how it is you have no record of the amount I paid you. I am sorry to say that some of my papers have got mislaid or lost, which makes it very awkward, but I may be able to get some information at the bank at Farnham, as I drew a cheque for the amount paid. Anyway I hope to make you a satisfactory settlement." On the 23rd of November, 1901, the defendant wrote: "Dear Aunt,—In reply to your last letter I beg to say that I do not expect to be down for some time, so to save any trouble in the matter I have placed it in my solicitor's hands for adjustment. You will hear from him in the course of a few posts." It was admitted that since the letter of the 10th of July, 1901, there had been "another division"—i.e., a division of property under the will of the defendant's father.

Bruce, J., was of opinion that there was no evidence of repayment of any part of the £100; and he held that, though the letters did not contain an acknowledgment of the debt, the letter of the 10th of July contained a clear conditional promise to pay upon "another division" taking place, and that, the division of money having taken place, the promise to pay was sufficient to take the whole debt out of the statute. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff for the amount claimed.

Moyses, for the defendant.—There was no unconditional acknowledgment of the debt from which a promise to pay can be implied, nor was there any express promise to pay. Secondly, there was at most an acknowledgment that £40 was due. An acknowledgment that part of a debt is due cannot revive the whole original debt. Such an acknowledgment can at the most only support a promise to pay the part admitted to be due. Prance v. Sympson, Kay 678, 3 W. R. Ch. Dig. 42, only decides that an acknowledgment that an account is pending and a promise to pay the amount found due on taking the account takes the case out of the statute. That is not the case here.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He also referred to Tanner v. Smart, 6 B. & C. 603; Dabbs v. Humphries, 10 Bing. 446; Buckmaster v. Russell, 9 W. R. 749, 10 C. B. N. S. 745; Mowbray v. Appleby, 80 L. T. Rep. 805, 47 W. R. Dig. 103.

H. Holman Gregory, for the plaintiff.—The true construction of the letters is that the defendant promised to pay the amount which should be found due upon inquiry. That amount has now been found to be £100 and interest. Skeet v. Lindsay, 25 W. R. 322, 2 Ex. D. 314; Sidwell v. Mason, 5 W. R. 729, 2 H. & N. 306; and Prance v. Sympson, all showed that such a promise would take the case out of the statute.

Moyses replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Questions upon the Statute of Limitations are nearly always troublesome to deal with. Where the time specified by the Statute of Limitations has run, the Legislature has said that, unless there has been either an acknowledgment of the debt from which the law will imply a promise to pay, or an express promise to pay, the action is barred. Full effect must be given to the law upon the subject. Taking that view, in my opinion the decision in Buckmaster v. Russell was perfectly right. That case decided two points. It was decided, first, that there was no sufficient acknowledgment of the debt; and, secondly, that if there was a fresh conditional promise to pay, the plaintiff could only sue upon the fresh promise if the condition was fulfilled, and, in that event, he could not sue upon the fresh promise for anything beyond that which was stated in the promise itself. In that case the letter relied upon as an acknowledgment of the debt was as follows: "Gentlemen,—I have received a letter from Messrs. Peard & Langdon, solicitors, of Barnstaple, requesting me to pay you an account of £40 9s. 6d. I have no wish to have anything to do with the lawyers; much less do I wish to deny a just debt. I cannot, however, get rid of the notion that my account with you was settled when I left the army in 1851. But, as you declare it was not settled, I am willing to pay you £10 per annum until it is liquidated. Should this proposal meet with your approbation, we can make arrangements accordingly." The court held that, as the special proposal was not accepted by the creditors, it could not be sued upon; and that, apart from that, there was no sufficient acknowledgment of the debt from which a promise to pay could be fairly inferred. When one looks at that part of the correspondence in the present case in which it is said that an acknowledgment of the original debt is contained, I entirely agree with Bruce, J., that the language can not be construed, without unduly straining it, as an acknowledgment of the original debt. It is impossible to read the letters of the 27th of June or the 10th of July as containing an acknowledgment of indebtedness for £100. By the letter of the 10th of July the defendant admitted £40 was due. I cannot read the letter as admitting £100 to be due. In these circumstances I agree with Bruce, J., that there is no acknowledgment of such a nature as to raise an implied promise to pay the original debt of £100. The learned judge, however, went on to deal with the case upon another view—namely, that the letters contained an invitation to take an account, coupled with a promise to pay the amount found due. The letters may mean that if an account is taken and it is ascertained how much the defendant has to pay, the defendant will pay it. The case seems to me to be on the border line, and I cannot say that Bruce, J., has not arrived to a right conclusion. There is ample authority in Prance v. Sympson, Sidwell v. Mason, and Skeet v. Lindsay that a promise to pay the balance of the original debt found due upon the taking the accounts between the parties is sufficient to take the case out of the Statute of Limitations. In substance in those cases, speaking of the common law cases apart from the claim in equity for an account, it is as if the defendant had said that he did not think that he owed more than a certain sum, but that if the vouchers were sent in he would pay what was found due. That is a promise to pay subject to a business operation being gone through. That operation was gone through in the present case at the trial. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with Bruce, J., that there is no unconditional acknowledgment of the whole debt of £100 from which a promise to pay it can be implied. In the letter, however, of the 10th of July the defendant said that "as soon as there is another division I will send uncle some." It is admitted that another division has taken place; and, therefore, the condition has been fulfilled. What is the meaning of "I will send uncle some"? We start with the defendant's admission that he originally owed the plaintiff £100, and he says in his letters that he gave him a cheque for £40, and that he is almost positive that he also gave him another cheque for £20. So far, that is an admission that £40 is due. That is not enough. The question is whether there is a promise to pay the whole £100. In my opinion, the defendant meant by the words "I will send uncle some" that he would send him £40; but if upon a proper investigation it was found that he had not paid anything off the original debt he would pay the full amount. That being so, the judgment of the learned judge was right.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Upon reading the correspondence, it seems to me that it is impossible to come to any other conclusion than that the defendant promised that if the accounts were gone into between him and the plaintiff he would pay the amount found due. The defendant's proposal was that the accounts should be gone into between his uncle and himself. The cases of Skeet v. Lindsay, Sidwell v. Mason, and Prance v. Sympson are authorities in point. Buckmaster v. Russell is, in my opinion, a very different case from this. The suggested acknowledgment in that case contained in the earlier part of the defendant's letter was not an acknowledgment of the existence of the debt. On the contrary, it denied the existence of the debt. There was in that case no acknowledgment and no promise to pay the debt. It is clear that that case is not an authority in point, and it is not touched by our decision in the present case.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Church, Adams, & Prior, for C. & W. Trimmer, Alton.

Solicitors for the defendant, Kingsbury & Turner.

---

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Feb. 19; March 20.

BISS v. BISS. (a.)

Trustee — Lease — Renewal — Personal incapacity to benefit—Partial interest—Absence of unfair dealing—Rebuttable presumption of law.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The mere fact that a person has only a partial interest in a lease does not in itself disentitle him to take a renewal of the lease for his own benefit. Any presumption of law that the renewal is for the benefit of all the persons interested in the original lease may be rebutted by evidence that there has been no fraud or unfair dealing towards the other persons interested on the part of the person obtaining the renewal, provided that his position with regard to them is neither clearly fiduciary nor of such a special character that he owes a duty towards them by virtue thereof; in either of which cases the presumption of law of his personal incapacity to retain the benefit is irrebuttable.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J.

The plaintiffs were the children of John Biss, who died intestate on the 23rd of September, 1900.

The defendant is the widow and administratrix of John Biss. At the time of his death the deceased was tenant from year to year of a house let to him by one Stone. John Biss had formerly held the house for a term of seven years from Lady Day, 1887, at a rent of £80. Stone had refused to renew the lease, but had allowed him to remain on as tenant from year to year at a rent of £84 a year.

On the death of John Biss the defendant was appointed his administratrix, and a receiver had been appointed by the court in May, 1901, in this action, which was instituted by the plaintiff, J. E. Biss, to obtain administration of the intestate's estate.

As Stone's own term was about to expire on the 25th of March, 1902, he, on the 23rd of September, 1901, gave notice to quit the premises from the 25th of March following.

John Biss had left three children, the plaintiff and a daughter by a former marriage, both of full age, and an infant daughter by the defendant.

On the death of John Biss negotiations had been opened by the widow for a new term, according to Stone, on her own behalf, but, as she said, on behalf of the estate. Stone refused in the most absolute terms to entertain any proposition for a renewal either to her or to anyone representing the estate, and he sent to the receiver a letter of the 17th of March, 1902, as follows: "With regard to your inquiry as to renewal of the above premises I beg to inform you that I positively decline any negotiations for renewal either to Mrs. Biss or to anyone representing the estate of the late Mr. John Biss. I have already rejected Mrs. Biss's application in this connection, and if I let the premises again it will be for the express purpose of offering it to Mr. J. E. Biss, jun., as a matter of respect for him and his late father, but this, of course, is entirely a matter between Mr. John E. Biss, jun., and myself."

The plaintiff, J. E. Biss (who was the person referred to in the letter as John Biss, jun.), had himself called on Stone in the previous February on learning that the receiver had been served with a notice to quit, with a view to a renewal for the benefit of the estate, which Stone had declined to make.

Carrying out the intention expressed in his letter, Stone obtained a renewal himself and offered the premises to the plaintiff on a three years' agreement at a rent of £95 a year, which the plaintiff accepted. It was proved that the deceased had used the premises as a lodging-house, and that the business had yielded a profit.

The defendant took out a summons in the administration action to have the plaintiff declared a trustee of the premises for all parties interested in the estate.

Buckley, J., was of opinion that there had been nothing in the plaintiff's conduct which was unfair so as to disentitle him to the benefit of the renewal, but he held, on the authority of Ex parte Grace, 1 Bos. & P. 376, that the plaintiff must be considered to stand in such a position as to be under a personal incapacity to accept the renewal otherwise than as trustee for all all persons interested in the estate.

The plaintiff appealed.

Astbury, K.C., and Ashton Cross, for the appellant.—Buckley, J., was of opinion that Ex parte Grace, covered the present case. We submit that the cases are distinct. In that case the administratrix was jointly interested in the lease with an infant. As she stood in a fiduciary relation to the infant she could not have obtained a renewal of the lease for her own benefit, and her husband, who actually obtained the renewal, was in no better position. The doctrine of Keech v. Sandford, 2 White & Tudor L. C. 693, only applies where a fiduciary relationship exists, at any rate where there is no custom to renew. But the plaintiff at the time when he got the lease was in no way a trustee for the other persons interested in the estate. No fiduciary relationship exists between tenants in common of real estate: Kennedy v. De Trafford, 45 W. R. 671, [1897] A. C. 180.

They also referred to Longton v. Wilsby, 76 L. T. Rep. 770, 45 W. R. Dig. 165, and James v. Dean, 11 Ves. 383.

T. H. Carson, K.C., and J. G. Wood, for the respondent.—The principle of Keech v. Sandford has been applied to cases where there was no covenant for perpetual renewal and no custom to renew, and the refusal of the landlord in the present case to renew is immaterial. The principle is that if a person possessing a partial interest in a lease obtains a renewal on his own account he is a trustee for all the persons interested in the old lease. The case of Palmer v. Young, 1 Vern. 276, is a direct authority to show that a joint tenant is such a person. The reason is that where several persons are interested in a lease they are deemed in equity to be also interested in any benefits which they may be able to obtain from their position as lessees, and such benefits are treated as an accretion to the original estate. Consequently, if one of them obtains a renewal on his own behalf, he is not allowed to take the benefit of this accretion to the original estate for himself, as this would be to increase his interest at the expense of others, who would be deprived of their interest in the tenant right of renewal arising out of the old lease.

The following cases were cited in the course of the argument: Fitzgibbon v. Scanlan, 1 Dow, 261; Rawe v. Chichester, Amb. 715; Pickering v. Vowles, 1 Bro. C. C. 197; Hamilton v. Denny, 1 Ball. & Beat. 199; Jackson v. Welsh, Ll. & G. temp. Plunket, 346; Clegg v. Fishwick, 1 Mac. & G. 294; Dicconson v. Talbot, 19 W. R. 138, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 32; Quinton v. Frith, Ir. R. 2 Eq. 396, 17 W. R. Ch. Dig. 54, 99; Warner v. Jacob, 30 W. R. 731, 20 Ch. D. 220; Rushworth's case, 2 Freem. 13; Rakestraw v. Brewer, 2 P. Wms. 511; Holmes v. Williams, [1895] W. N. 116; and In re Lord Ranelagh's Will, Beeton v. London School Board, 32 W. R. 714, 26 Ch. D. 370.

Astbury, K.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 19.—COLLINS, M.R.—[His lordship stated the facts and continued:] Buckley, J., considered himself bound by Ex parte Grace, and but for that case his mind, as I understand his judgment, was in favour of the plaintiff. He considered that that case compelled him to hold that the plaintiff stood in such a position as to be under a personal incapacity to accept a renewal otherwise than as trustee for all persons interested in the estate. If, on the other hand, he was at liberty to consider the special circumstances under which the renewal was affected, his view was, and I think it is entirely borne out by the affidavits, that there was nothing in the plaintiff's conduct which was unfair or such as to disentitle him to retain the benefit of the renewal. There are no doubt many cases in which the presumption of personal incapacity to retain the benefit is one of law and cannot be rebutted. The simplest instance is that of a trustee, as in Keech v. Sandford, but the principle has been extended to cover other persons who are not primarily trustees at all—for instance, tenants for life. The foundation of the presumption in their case is that they can take only what the will or settlement under which they make title gives them, and that a renewal must be looked on as an accretion to or graft upon the original term arising out of the goodwill or quasi-tenant right annexed thereto, and their rights to such accretion are those which they have in the term and no greater, and must therefore terminate with their own life: Tuster v. Marriott, Amb. 668; Rawe v. Chichester; James v. Dean; and other cases cited Lewin on Trusts (10th ed.), p. 193. But there is another class of cases in which, as it seems to me, there is no presumption of law but at most a rebuttable presumption of fact. In this class apparently are mortgagees (Rushworth's case), joint tenants (Palmer v. Young), partners (Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick, 17 Ves 298). Primâ facie a mortgagee cannot renew for himself. He cannot hold the accretion any more than he can hold the term itself free from the right to redeem. The reason here is analogous to that which governs the rights of tenants for life. But in this case the presumption is apparently rebuttable, and in Nesbitt v. Tredennick, 1 Ball. & Beat. 29, Lord Manners held it was rebutted. He said: "Here no part of Nesbitt's conduct shows a contrivance, nor was he in possession; all that Nesbitt or Tredennick treated for was a new lease, giving, however, full opportunity to the plaintiffs to dispose of their interests or to renew if they were enabled so to do." As to partners, "It is clear," says Sir W. Grant, "that one partner cannot treat privately and behind the back of his co-partners for a lease of the premises where the joint trade is carried on for his own individual benefit. If he does so treat and obtains a lease in his own name it is a trust for the partnership" (Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick, 17 Ves., at p. 311), and he then proceeds to examine the facts on that basis, and finds unfair dealing in fact. A joint tenant who is not a partner can be under no higher obligation.

Tenants in common do not stand in a fiduciary relation to each other (Kennedy v. De Trafford), and one of two mortgagors, tenants in common, is not debarred from buying for himself the undivided equity of redemption in the whole.

The reason of the rule in the case of trustees and others whose liability is absolute and irrebuttable is said to be public policy (Griffin v. Griffin, 1 Sch. & Lef. 352, at p. 354, per Lord Redesdale; Blewett v. Millett, 7 Bro. P. C. 367), and is based, it would seem, largely upon the fact that possession gives to such persons an opportunity of renewal (Pickering v. Vowles, 1 Bro. Ch. C., at p. 198, per Lord Thurlow), acting on the goodwill that accompanies it (James v. Dean, 11 Ves., at p. 395, per Lord Eldon). It may well be, therefore, that different considerations apply in the case of persons not in possession.

In the present case the plaintiff is simply one of the next-of-kin of the former tenant, and had as such a possible interest in the term. He was not as such a trustee for the others interested, nor was he in possession. The administratrix represented the estate, and alone had the right to renew incident thereto, and she unquestionably could renew only for the benefit of the estate. But is the plaintiff in the same category, or is he entitled to go into the facts to show that he has not in point of fact abused his position or in any sense intercepted an advantage coming by way of accretion to the estate? He did not take under a will or a settlement, with interests coming after his own, but simply got a possible share upon an intestacy in case there was a surplus of assets over debts. It seems to me that his obligation cannot be put higher than that of any other tenant in common against whom it would have to be established, not as a presumption of law, but as an inference of fact, that he had abused his position. If he is not under a personal incapacity to take a benefit he is entitled to show that the renewal was not in fact an accretion to the original term, and that it was not until there had been an absolute refusal on the part of the lessor, and after full opportunity to the administratrix to procure a renewal for the estate if she could, that he accepted a proposal of renewal made to him by the lessor. This question cannot be considered or discussed when the party is by his position debarred from keeping a personal advantage derived directly or indirectly out of his fiduciary or quasi-fiduciary position, but when he is not so debarred I think it becomes a question of fact whether that which he had received was in his hands an accretion to the interests of the deceased or whether the connection between the estate and the renewal had not been wholly severed by the action of the lessor before the plaintiff had accepted the new lease.

This consideration seems to get rid of any difficulty that might be caused by the fact that one of the next-of-kin was an infant. The right or hope of renewal incident to the estate was determined before the plaintiff intervened. Ex parte Grace, by which Buckley, J., conceived himself bound, does not in my opinion cover the present case. There Grace had married the administratrix of the deceased owner of the term, and held the term in her right and subject to the trusts on which she held it. He was therefore in no better position than she would have been had she, being unmarried, obtained a renewal. Keech v. Sandford was directly in point, and the renewed term could not be held otherwise than as part of the estate. I may also point out that in Ex parte Grace, even if the beneficial interests only of those entitled to the old lease which was renewed are looked at, there were ample grounds for supporting the decision, for the old lease belonged partly to an infant, and when possession of the demised premises was taken by the stepfather, the latter (who renewed the lease) became in contemplation of law a bailiff or agent for the infant in respect of the infant's share or interest, and was therefore in that capacity also in a strictly fiduciary position when he applied for a renewal: see Coke on Littleton, 90*a*; Thomas v. Thomas, 3 W. R. 135, 2 Kay & J. 79; Quinton v. Frith, where the cases are collected.

The case, as Buckley, J., says, seems to be somewhat loosely reported, but the dicta must be read in reference to the true facts.

Some reliance was placed by the respondent on the dictum of Lord Bathurst in Rawe v. Chichester, Amb. at p. 719, that "if trustees, mortgagees, or other persons interested obtain renewal, the new lease is always subject to the trusts and limitations of the old lease." But the cases cited by him show that he had not in his mind such an interest as that of the plaintiff in this case. No decision has in fact gone so far as we are asked to go here, and in my opinion, the principle to be extracted from the authorities does not cover this case. Public policy, which is said to be the basis of the principle, does not seem to me to require that every person who takes an interest, however slight, in the estate of which a lease formed a part should be under a personal incapacity to hold a renewal of such lease in his own right. While, therefore, I am bound to differ from the actual decision of the learned judge, I feel that I am giving effect to his own view. The appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree with the judgment of Collins, M.R. I will not add anything to what he has said about the case of Ex parte Grace on the authority of which my brother Buckley decided this case. But since the arguments of this appeal I have had an opportunity of looking at most of the authorities bearing on the subject, and I think it may be useful if I add some observations upon them. I am induced to do this because there are some dicta of judges (notably of Bathurst, L.C., in Rawe v. Chichester), and some statements in text-books which might lead to the supposition that if any person who is partially interested in an old lease obtains from the lessor a renewal he must be held a constructive trustee of the new lease, whatever may be the nature of his interest or the circumstances in which he obtained the new lease. In my opinion the authorities when examined carefully, do not support any such general proposition. I will endeavour to state as shortly as I can to what extent they have gone. In the first place, as far as regards the circumstances under which the new lease is obtained the equitable doctrine I am considering is not limited in its application to cases where the old lease was renewable by agreement or custom, or where the new lease was obtained by surrender or before the expiration of the old lease. There may well be and often is an advantage for the purpose of obtaining a new lease in being in the position of an old lessee, and that advantage may be of appreciable value in the view of a court administering equity, even though the landlord is under no obligation to grant a new lease to the old tenant. Further, I may note here that the cases show that with regard to a person obtaining a renewal who occupies a fiduciary position it is contrary to public policy to allow him to rebut the presumption that in obtaining a renewal he acted in the interests of all persons interested in the old lease. I may also add that some of the decided cases where persons not in a fiduciary position obtaining renewal have been held to be constructive trustees, depend upon the fact that those persons acted fraudulently in the matter, as, for instance, by representing to the lessors or by inducing or allowing the lessors to believe that they were acting in the interests of those entitled to the old lease. Of course, if a person has obtained a new lease by reason or in consideration of a surrender or attempted surrender of an old lease or of rights belonging to third parties, he could not as against those third parties pretend to hold the new lease as his own absolute property. But cases falling within the two last-mentioned classes stand apart, and need no further examination.

I now proceed to consider the cases with reference to the position of the person obtaining the renewal. The cases where the person has clearly occupied a fiduciary position in the matter, including an executor, administrator, trustee, or agent, need not be dwelt upon, as they present no difficulty. I need only remark in passing that it must not be forgotten that if a stranger enters into possession of an infant's property he is to be regarded as acting as a bailiff or agent for the infant in respect of that property. The cases which really demand full consideration are those where the person renewing the lease does not clearly occupy a fiduciary position. On inquiring into these cases it appears to me as a result that a person renewing is only held to be a constructive trustee of the renewed lease if in respect of the old lease he occupied some special position and owed by virtue of that position a duty towards the other persons interested. Take, for example, the case of a tenant for life under a settlement of leaseholds, although not a trustee for the remaindermen, yet his position is not that of a stranger as regards them. He owes by virtue of his position certain duties towards them in respect of the settled property and if by virtue of his position he is enabled to obtain a renewal of the lease equity clearly demands that the new right obtained in virtue of the old should be regarded as a grant on the old and be treated accordingly as settled property. Take next the case of a partner obtaining a renewal of a partnership lease. Here, apart from the fact that in ordinary cases concerning the carrying on of the partnership business he is an agent for the partners, he clearly owes a duty to his co-partners not to acquire any special advantage over them by reason of his position. And therefore as a rule, even if a partnership lease has come to an end, yet if he by virtue of his position obtains a renewed lease he will be held to have acquired it on behalf of all the partners, as Lord Selborne, L.C, said in Cassels v. Steward, 29 W. R. 636, 6 App. Cas. 64, at p. 73, "A man obtaining his locus standi, and his opportunity for making such arrangements, by the position he occupies as a partner, is bound by his obligations to his co-partners in such dealings not to separate his interest from theirs, but, if he acquires any benefit, to communicate it to them." Yet even with regard to partners, between whom the utmost good faith is required by a court of equity, there are the following observations made by Turner, L.J., in Clegg v. Edmundson, 8 De G. M. & G. 787, 5 W. R. Dig. 60. [His lordship read from "I am not prepared" to "the managing partners."] I will next deal with the cases decided as between mortgagor and mortgagee. Each of these owes a duty to the other in respect of the mortgaged property, and if in case of one being able by virtue of his position to obtain a renewal of a mortgaged lease, there are obvious grounds why it should be held against him, at any rate, as a rule, that the renewed lease should be engrafted on the old, as forming part of the mortgage security. In the case of a mortgagee renewing it was put as follows by the court in the case of Rakestraw v. Brewer, 2 P. Wms., at p. 513 (edition of 1826): "This additional term comes from the old root, and is of the same nature, subject to the same equity of redemption, else hardships might be brought upon mortgagors by the mortgagee getting such additional terms more easily as being possessed of one not expired, and by that means worming out and oppressing a poor mortgagor." The only case that seems to call for special comment beyond what I have already said is that of Palmer v. Young, which is represented by some text-books as laying down a general proposition about one of several joint tenants renewing for his own benefit. That case is so shortly reported in 1 Vern. 276 that I found it impossible to properly ascertain what the facts were, and I accordingly had the records and the registrar's notebook searched. The transcript of the records was somewhat difficult, but in result I have ascertained that the following are the facts of the case, and the grounds of the decision of the court, omitting unnecessary details. A lessee for lives from the Bishop of Rochester assigned part of the premises demised for the lives at a proportioned part of the rent to the plaintiff's predecessor in title. The lease was left in the hands of the principal defendant in order to enable him to renew. He obtained a renewal by availing himself of the possession of the lease and by concealing the fact of the previous assignment, and by surrendering the old lease which still had two lives in existence. The renewed lease was for an additional life. The plaintiff brought his suit in Chancery, seeking to have it declared that under the circumstances the defendant was a trustee of the renewed lease so far as concerns the assigned premises and that the plaintiff was entitled to the benefit of the extra life to the exclusion of the plaintiff, and paying a proportioned part of the rent and of the expenses of renewal. The defendant admitted the facts and offered to place the plaintiff in his old position so far as concerns the two lives by granting him a lease, but otherwise claimed for himself the benefit of the renewal. The court found as a fact (as appears from Registrar Edwards' minute book of the 27th of November, 1684) that the defendant had gone with the "parchment" (i.e., the old lease itself) and "pretended an interest in the whole" and had so obtained a renewal for an extra life to the exclusion of the plaintiff, and under these circumstances, of course, the court held the plaintiff entitled to relief, and as there was some doubt as to the validity of the new lease (presumably because the plaintiff as assignee of the demised premises had not joined in the surrender) it was ordered that the plaintiff and defendant do join in surrendering the premises and obtaining a new lease. These facts show that the case was one of clear breach of faith, and was decided on its special circumstances, and is no authority whatever to support the more general proposition for which it is often cited.

To conclude, the result of my investigation of the cases is that neither on authority nor principle can the appellant in the present case be held a trustee of the new lease he has obtained. He was in no wise in any fiduciary position in respect of the premises. He owed no duty to anyone in respect thereof; he has been guilty of no fraud or concealment, and he has not used any right that a court of equity can recognise as belonging to other persons to enable him to obtain the lease. I therefore agree in thinking that the appeal must succeed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., concurred in the judgments delivered by the Master of the Rolls and Romer, L.J.

Solicitors, Arthur Price; T. H. Meynell.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Byrne, J. } April 6, 8.

CORNBROOK BREWERY CO. (LIMITED) v. LAW DEBENTURE CORPORATION (LIMITED). (a.)

Company — Brewery business — Debentures — Covering deed before 1900—Specifically mortgaged property—Property acquired after 1900 upon trusts of covering deed—Assignment to company—Sub-demise to the trustees—Registration of charge—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), s. 14.

Trustees for the debenture-holders of a limited company were empowered by their trust deed, which was executed in 1897, to sell certain property therein specifically mortgaged, and were to hold the proceeds of sale upon trust (amongst other things) at the request of the company to purchase or acquire leasehold hereditaments, which were to be held upon the trusts of the specifically mortgaged property. The trustees having £2,700 in their hands upon the above trusts, and the company desiring to acquire a certain public-house, obtained themselves in March, 1902, a demise of the house for £2,700 for 1,001½ years; and then, in consideration of £2,700 received from the trustees in August, 1902, the company sub-demised the house to them for the whole term except the last day.

Held, that the sub-demise of August, 1902, was a specific mortgage or charge upon the public-house under section 14, sub-section 1, of the Companies Act, 1900, and must be registered under its provisions.

In this case the question was whether or not the plaintiff company had, after the commencement of the Companies Act, 1900, created a mortgage or charge for the purpose of securing an issue of debentures within the meaning of section 14, sub-section 1, of the Act. The defendant corporation were trustees under a covering deed made in order to secure certain issues of debenture stock. That deed was executed on the 17th of February, 1897, and therefore before the passing of the Act. In the interpretation clause it was provided that "'The specifically mortgaged premises' means the hereditaments and premises specified or referred to in the second schedule hereto, and which are to be assured to or vested in the trustees in accordance with clause 8 hereof, and any other hereditaments, assets, and premises which may become vested in the trustees in pursuance of the provision hereinafter contained, or which ought to be so vested"; and that, "'The mortgaged premises' means and includes the specifically mortgaged premises and the general assets collectively." Clause 8 provided that "The company shall forthwith assure to and vest in, or cause or procure the freehold and leasehold hereditaments and premises specified or referred to in the said second schedule herto to be assured to and vested in the trustees upon the trusts hereof free from incumbrances in the manner" therein provided. Sub-section 2 of the same clause stated that leaseholds were "(unless the trustees require the same to be assigned) to be demised to the trustees for the residue of the term for which the same are respectively held except the last three days of each of the same terms." Clause 9 was "The company, as beneficial owner, hereby charges in favour of the trustees the specifically mortgaged premises with the payment of the stock and the interest thereon and all other moneys intended to be hereby secured, to the intent that such charge may be a specific charge, and not a floating charge, for the payment of such moneys." Clause 10 brought in a certain sum of £30,000 to be invested in the purchase of further properties to be held by the trustees as part of the specifically mortgaged premises. Clause 11 gave a charge upon all the assets and undertaking of the company for the time being, other than the specifically mortgaged premises, but as a floating charge only. Clause 22 gave powers as regards the specifically mortgaged premises, and provided that the trustees were to have "full power, at the request of the company, to do or concur in doing all or any of the things following." Then followed a series of powers given to the trustees to deal with the specifically mortgaged premises, including a power of sale and a power of letting on lease, and various other powers. Clause 23 provided that "The trustees shall hold the proceeds to arise from any sale, letting, exchange, or other dealing with the specifically mortgaged premises under the last preceding clause, which proceeds shall become and be part of the specifically mortgaged premises, upon trust at the request of the company to apply the same if they shall think fit. . . . (2) In the purchase or acquiring of any freehold, leasehold, or copyhold hereditaments, or any rights of way, or any easements or rights which may seem suitable for any of the purposes of the company, and which shall be assured to and vested in the trustees"; and other purposes to which the money might be applied were mentioned. Clause 26 provided that "All property assured to or vested in the trustees in pursuance of the provisions herein contained shall be held by the trustees upon and subject to the trusts, powers, and provisions hereinbefore declared and contained, and relating to the specifically mortgaged premises, and shall for all purposes be deemed to form part of the specifically mortgaged premises." The second schedule contained a list of numerous freehold and leasehold public-houses. A supplemental trust deed was executed in June, 1899, but its terms are not material. Some part of the specifically mortgaged property had been sold, and a sum of £2,700 was in the hands of the trustees as the result.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff company were a brewery company, and they desired to acquire a certain public-house known as the "Exile of Erin," and that the £2,700 should be applied to its purchase. The transaction was carried out by means of an indenture of assignment of a term from one Margaret Carroll to the company, and of an indenture of sub-demise from the company to the defendant corporation. The assignment was dated the 14th of March, 1902, and was made between M. Carroll of the one part and the plaintiff company of the other part, and by it, in consideration of £2,700, M. Carroll assigned the "Exile of Erin" with certain special rights to the plaintiff company, their successors and assigns, for the term of 1,001½ years, at the rent of £30, and subject to the covenants and conditions therein contained, and on the part of the company to be observed and performed. The sub-demise was dated the 18th of August, 1902, and was made between the plaintiff company of the one part and the defendant corporation of the other part, and was declared to be supplemental to the trust deed of February, 1897. It recited the indenture of March, 1902, and that "The corporation now holds under the trust deed certain moneys, forming part of the specifically mortgaged premises hereunder upon trust (among other things) to apply the same, if the corporation should think fit, in the purchase or acquiring of any freehold, leasehold, or copyhold hereditaments which may seem suitable for any of the purposes of the company, and which shall be assured to and vested in the corporation to be held by the corporation upon and subject to the trusts, powers, and provisions by the trust deed declared and contained relating to the specifically mortgaged premises thereunder." It further recited that this particular public-house and premises were "suitable for the purposes of the company, and had not been vested in trustees, and had not formed part of the specifically mortgaged premises under the trust deed." It further recited that "the corporation has in pursuance of the provisions of the trust deed agreed at the request of the company to pay to the company out of the moneys held by the corporation as aforesaid the sum of £2,700 upon having the land, messuages, and premises hereinbefore described sub-demised to the corporation upon the trusts of the trust deed in manner hereinafter appearing." And it was witnessed that in consideration of the £2,700 the company as beneficial owner demises unto the corporation this particular property, "to hold the same unto the corporation for all the residue now unexpired of the said term of 1,001½ years, granted therein by the said indenture (except the last day of the said term) upon the trusts and subject to the powers and provisions declared by and contained in the trust deed and the supplemental trust deed of and concerning the specifically mortgaged premises thereunder, and as part of such specifically mortgaged premises, as if the said lands, messuages, and premises had been originally comprised in and demised to the corporation by the trust deed."

In consequence of these transactions the defendant corporation took the property without being liable to the lessor under the covenants contained in the lease, which was presumably the object desired in carrying out the transaction in the above form.

As the sub-demise of August, 1902, was executed after the Companies Act, 1900, the defendant corporation proposed to register the deed as a mortgage or charge for the purpose of securing any issue of debentures under section 14, sub-section 1, of the Act. The plaintiff company thereupon brought this action, claiming a declaration that the sub-demise of August, 1902, did not require registration under the Companies Act, 1900, and an injunction to restrain the defendants from registering the deed.

Danckwerts and J. W. Manning, for the plaintiff company.—The sub-demise of August, 1902, does not create a fresh charge upon the property. It is part of a transaction whereby the corporation as trustees under the deed of 1897 invested the proceeds of sale of part of the specifically mortgaged property upon other property under clause 23 of the deed. The charge upon the property purchased resulted from the fact of its having been purchased for the purposes of the trust and with the proceeds of sale of part of the mortgaged property, and arose ipso facto upon the purchase by the company. The assignment to the company instead of to a third person or to the corporation was an immaterial circumstance, and does not alter the real nature of the transaction. If the assignment had been obtained by the corporation direct from the assignor it could not have been reasonably contended that registration was necessary. The question at issue is an important one, as by section 14, sub-section 6, of the Act of 1900 a copy of the registrar's certificate of registration must be indorsed upon every debenture. As the properties charged are very numerous and may be changed from time to time, this provision would become burdensome or impossible to be carried out if deeds of this kind must be registered. Moreover, how could all the debentures be called in for indorsement on every change of the specifically mortgaged property?

They also referred to In re Harrogate Estates (Limited), ante, p. 334, [1903] 1 Ch. 498, and In re Spiral Globe (Limited), [1902] 2 Ch. 209, 50 W. R. Dig. 27.

Levett, K.C., and K. Parker, for the defendant corporation.—The property in question was assigned by the company to the corporation in August, 1902, and consequently must be registered. What might have happened if the property had been obtained by the corporation directly from the assignor is another matter and does not affect the question. The corporation, as trustees for the debenture-holders, are bound to make them safe by registering the deed of August, 1902.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 8.—BYRNE, J., after stating the facts: The result of this appears to be that property which prior to the execution of the deed of August, 1902, did not form part of the specifically mortgaged property as contained in the trust deed thenceforward formed part of such specifically mortgaged property. It is said, and as at present advised, I think said truly, that had this been a direct purchase from Margaret Carroll, there would have been no question about the necessity for registration of the document as a charge created by the company, because in that case there would have been no charge created by the company subsequently to the coming into operation of the Companies Act, 1900. But that is not the case I have to deal with. It appears to me that the effect of this deed of the 18th of August, 1902, between the company and the corporation was to create "a specific mortgage or charge" upon the property thereby sub-demised, and that therefore it comes within the words of section 14, sub-section 1, of the Act, and that the necessary consequences as to registration under the other provisions of the same section of the Act must follow. There is another way in which the case has been put which I ought to mention, although I am not dealing seriatim with the arguments which have been used, because it seems to me that the view which I have taken of the transaction goes beyond those arguments. It has been said that if this £2,700, part of the specifically mortgaged property, had been invested in any property of a kind which the trustees were entitled to hold, then there would have been ipso facto a charge upon it by virtue of the original deed of 1897. If that had been the case, and if the deed of August, 1902, had not been executed, I see no reason to doubt that this sum of £2,700 might have been followed into the specific property; but that does not alter the fact that this deed creates a security which did not exist before it was executed. Under these circumstances the usual order must follow, and this action must be dismissed with costs.

Solicitors, Hayes, Schmettau, & Dunn; Bircham & Co.

---

Chan. Div.
Buckley, J. } Feb. 11, 12, 13.

In re TANCRED'S SETTLEMENT.
SOMERVILLE v. TANCRED.
In re SELBY.
CHURCH v. TANCRED. (a.)

Power—Appointment—Appointment to two objects—Subsequent appointments among all objects equally—Substitution—Election—Forfeiture on assigning or attempting to assign—Settlement—Assignment to trustees—Trusts for sole benefit of settlor—Power to charge expenses.

£7,000 was settled on trust for a husband and wife during their respective lives, and after their death as they or the survivor should appoint among objects. The husband and wife, by two deeds, irrevocably appointed one-seventh to each of two objects. After the death of the husband, the wife, by two deeds, irrevocably appointed the whole of the £7,000 among all the objects equally. On the death of the wife,

Held, that no case of election had arisen; that on the construction of the four deeds it was evident that the donee intended the £7,000 to be divisible in equal shares, and that, consequently, it was so divisible.

England v. Lavers, 15 W. R. 51, L. R. 3 Eq. 63, explained and followed

In re Ashton, 46 W. R. 138, [1897] 2 Ch 574, distinguished.

Property was appointed to an object of a power for a life, with a forfeiture clause in case he should assign, charge, or otherwise dispose or attempt to dispose of his life interest. By the object's marriage settlement he assigned his life interest, together with other property, to trustees, and appointed them his attorneys to receive it. The property settled was charged with expenses of management. The trusts of the property settled were, during his life, for his sole benefit.

Held, that his life interest was not forfeited.

Adjourned summonses.

By the marriage settlement, dated the 15th of April, 1839, of Sir Thomas and Lady Tancred, a sum of £7,000 was settled, subject to their life interest therein, upon trust for the younger children of the marriage as they by deed or the survivor of them by deed or will should appoint, and in default of appointment for such of the younger children as should attain that age or, being daughters, marry under it. The settlement contained the usual hotchpot clause.

At the date of the appointment of the 17th of April, 1891, hereinafter mentioned, the younger children of the marriage were Prid aux Francis Tancred, Seymer Mitford Tancred, Harry George Tancred, Edith Jane Williams, Bertha Evelyn Somerville, and Lucy Sibyl Hawkins.

By the marriage settlement, dated the 27th of February, 1867, of Mrs. Hawkins, it was agreed that if Mrs. Hawkins (or Mr. Hawkins in her right) should, during the coverture, become entitled to any property of the value of £300, at one time, for any estate whatsoever, the same should be settled.

By a deed-poll, dated the 10th of September, 1872, Sir T. and Lady Tancred, in exercise of their power, irrevocably appointed that one-seventh share of the £7 000, should, subject to their life interests therein, go to such uses as Mrs. Hawkins should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment to her absolutely.

By a deed-poll, dated the 14th of October, 1878, Sir T. and Lady Tancred, in exercise of their power, irrevocably appointed that the trustees of the settlement of 1839 should stand possessed of the one-seventh part of the £7,000, subject to their life interests therein, in trust for Mrs. Somerville, to be an interest vested in her on the solemnization of her then intended marriage.

By the marriage settlement, dated the 19th of October, 1878, of Mrs. Somerville, her one-seventh part of the £7,000 was settled. The settlement contained no after-acquired property clause.

Sir T. Tancred died on the 7th of November, 1880.

At the date of the two appointments next hereinafter mentioned, Lady Tancred had apparently forgotten the existence of the appointments of 1872 and 1878.

By a deed-poll, dated the 17th of April, 1891, Lady Tancred, after reciting that under the settlement of 1839 she had a power of appointment, subject to her life interest therein, over the £7,000 among her six younger children, irrevocably appointed that the £7,000 should be transferred to trustees upon trusts which were, in effect, a settlement of one-sixth thereof on each of her three daughters and her three sons, for their respective lives, and after their respective deaths for the children of each appointee respectively.

The life interests of the daughters were restrained from anticipation.

With regard to the sons' life interests, there was a proviso in each case that his share of income should only be paid to him "until he shall assign, charge, or otherwise dispose or attempt to dispose of the said share of income or any part thereof, or become bankrupt or do or suffer something whereby the said income, if belonging absolutely to him, or some part thereof, would become payable to or vested in some other person, whichever of the events shall first happen."

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The trustees were given a discretionary power to maintain each son if his life interest should be forfeited.

By the same deed she made a similar appointment of certain property over which, under the will of one P. Selby, she had a power of appointment subject to her own life interest therein.

Being advised that this appointment was invalid in so far as it affected to restrain her children from anticipating or releasing their life interests, and in so far as it affected to appoint the capital after their deaths to their grandchildren, she executed another deed of appointment on the 3rd of February, 1893.

By this deed, after recitals to the above effect, in exercise of her power under the settlement of 1839, so far as the same remained unexercised, she irrevocably appointed that after the death of each of her three daughters and three sons one-sixth of the £7,000 should be held in trust for such daughter or son absolutely, "my intention being that, by virtue of the principal appointment—i.e., that of 1891—and these presents, each of my said six children shall take a vested interest in one-sixth of the capital and income of the said sum of £7,000 subject only to my own life interest therein under the settlement."

By Seymer Mitford Tancred's marriage settlement, which was an instrument in Scotch form and dated the 3rd of June, 1896, he assigned to trustees all right, share, and interest then belonging to him, or which might thereafter belong to him, under the settlement of 1839 and Mr. Selby's will, and appointed them his attorneys to receive his right, share, and interest thereby assigned in and under the settlement and will, declaring that all moneys, securities, or investments which should be received by the trustees in virtue of the assignation should be held by them upon trusts which were, during his lifetime, for his sole benefit. There was also a charge on the whole of the property settled for the payment of "all necessary charges and expenses attending the execution of the trust hereby settled." There was also a general power to the trustees to realize the property assigned to them and to reinvest the proceeds.

On the death of Lady Tancred, on the 13th of November, 1901, the £7,000 under the settlement of 1839, and the property subject to the trusts of Mr. Selby's will, became divisible, and the present summonses were taken out and heard together.

Several questions were raised, but there were only two points which call for a report.

His lordship held that the restraint on anticipation and alienation imposed on the children of Sir T. and Lady Tancred by the deed of 1891, was bad, so far as she was thereby dealing with the £7,000 under the settlement of 1839, but was good so far as she was dealing with the property subject to the trusts of the will of Mr. Selby.

The question was argued as to what shares the six younger children took in the £7,000—that is to say, whether the two children who had benefited under the appointments of 1872 and 1878 were entitled each to claim one-seventh of £7,000, plus one-sixth of five-sevenths of £7,000, or whether the £7,000 was divisible in equal sixths.

Astbury, K.C., and J. Henderson, for the trustees of the settlement of 1839.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Howard, for the children who took no interest under the appointments of 1872 and 1878.—The intention of the donee of the power was that the children should bring their appointed shares into hotchpot. The children who took under the two earlier appointments are bound to elect between the earlier appointments and the later: England v. Lavers, 15 W. R. 31, L. R 3 Eq. 63; In re Keon, 3 L. R. Ir. 228. In re Ashton, 46 W. R. 138, [1897] 2 Ch. 574, where it was held that the rule against double portions did not apply, is distinguishable from the present case.

Ingpen, K.C., and L. W. Byrne, for the trustees of Mrs. Hawkins's marriage settlement.—We are entitled to one-seventh of £7,000 plus one-sixth of five-sevenths of £7,000. By the deeds of 1891 and 1893 Lady Tancred was purporting to dispose of the whole £7,000, and, therefore, of something which already belonged to Mrs. Hawkins. If Mrs. Hawkins was not restrained from anticipation, then England v. Lavers, which was decided on the question of election, might apply. But by the deed of 1891, Mrs. Hawkins was so restrained, and on the principle of In re Wheatley, 33 W. R. 275, 27 Ch. D. 606, and In re Vardon's Trusts, 33 W. R. 297, 28 Ch D. 124, she or her assigns can keep both funds without making compensation. It is immaterial that the restraint imposed by the deed of 1891 was bad, because, the doctrine of election being based on the presumed intention of the person executing the instrument, it is sufficient that Lady Tancred should have intended to impose the restraint: Haynes v. Foster, 49 W. R. 327, [1901] 1 Ch. 361. Also, no question of election can arise, for Mrs. Hawkins must elect to take under the instruments of 1891 and 1893, which are the instruments giving rise to the election, and the engrafted doctrine of compensation cannot apply where this is the case: In re Lord Chesham, 34 W. R. 321, 31 Ch. D. 466.

Darley, for Seymer Mitford Tancred and the trustees of his marriage settlement.

Ashton Cross, for the trustees of Mrs. Somerville's marriage settlement and Mr. Somerville.

Birrell, K.C., and G. E. S. Fryer, for Mrs. Somerville.—She is in the same position as the Hawkins trustees, with this difference, that, inasmuch as she has only settled what she took under the deed of 1878, it is only that which goes to her trustees, and anything which she gets under the deeds of 1891 and 1893 belongs to herself. The result is that there is no fund out of which compensation, which is the foundation of the doctrine of election, can come. England v. Lavers can only be supported, if at all, on the doctrine of election. The doctrine of substitution, on which it professes to be founded, is contrary to the principle laid down in Trollope v. Routledge, 1 De G. & Sm. 662. The present case is within In re Ashton.

H. Terrell, K.C., and W. M Cann, for a child of Mrs. Hawkins, who was a beneficiary under the Hawkins settlement.—England v. Lavers shows that the intention of the appointor must be regarded. Lady Tancred could not have intended to substitute for the appointments of 1872 and 1878 those of 1891 and 1893, because she had forgotten the existence of the former.

BUCKLEY, J., after stating the facts, continued: Now the question has been argued before me whether the instruments raised a case of election or not. It is said that, Mrs. Hawkins having become entitled under the appointment of 1872 to one-seventh of £7,000, and under the appointments of 1891 and 1893 to another one-seventh of the £7,000, she can claim the one-seventh which she takes under the appointments of 1891 and 1893, without having to give compensation. In re Wheatley; In re Vardon's Trusts, Haynes v. Foster, and In re Lord Chesham were cited for the proposition that inasmuch as the first one-seventh was appointed to her in such a manner that she had only a life interest without power of anticipation, she could not deal with it, and could not therefore elect. On the other hand, it was said, on the authority of England v. Lavers, that she must elect under which instrument she will take, and that she cannot take both interests without making compensation to her brothers and sisters.

Without going so far as to say that she could not give compensation, I do not think that the case is one of election at all. The real question is as to the meaning of the deeds of 1891 and 1893 having regard to what had been done in 1872 and 1878. Where you find that a power is given to a person to dispose of property you have to see whether the formalities have been observed, and if that is the case, then you must find out the intention of the person who had the power of disposing of the property. I ought, therefore, to read these four appointments and say what it was that she intended to do. At the outset it is clear that after the deeds of 1872 and 1878 neither Mrs. Hawkins nor Mrs. Somerville could take less than one-seventh of the £7,000. But it was open to Lady Tancred to substitute another interest for the one that she had given. By "substitute" I do not mean to imply that after 1878 she, or anyone else, could undo what had been done; nor did Lord Romilly mean that in England v. Lavers. But it is another matter to see what was her intention when, by the deeds of 1891 and 1893, she gave something more. In reading the deed of 1891 it is clear that Lady Tancred thought that she was entitled to dispose of £7,000, and that she meant to give one-sixth of that sum to each of her children. By the deed of 1891 she did to a large extent dispose of the sum in that way. By the deed of 1893 she disposed finally of the whole sum of £7,000. The concluding words in that deed [cited above] settle the matter. That is what she meant to do, and even without the deed of 1893 I should construe the deed of 1891 in the same way. How can I give effect to that intention? There remained after the deeds of 1872 and 1878 enough of the £7,000 to give to the children who had not a share of it one-seventh and a little more, and I read this as an appointment to them of one-seventh, together with enough to bring their shares up to one-sixth, and an appointment to Mrs. Hawkins and Mrs. Somerville of enough to bring their shares up to one-sixth.

In England v. Lavers, where the facts were like those in the present case, Lord Romilly, M.R., said: "My opinion is that the deed-poll is in substitution for the former appointments. Of course the donee of the power could not interfere with these; but I think that when he executed the deed-poll he meant to give to each of his daughters one-sixth of the fund, not in addition to the one-seventh he had already given, but in substitution for it." He is using the word "substitution" in the sense, not that the donee can undo the former appointments, but that by dividing the fund into fewer shares he had increased the value of the shares given by the previous appointments and had to that extent altered them. It would have been more accurate to say "in addition to the former appointments so as to equalize the shares taken by the children in the same manner as if the deed-poll had been substituted for the former appointments." I am not sure that I should follow Lord Romilly in holding that this would raise a case of election; but that point is immaterial to his decision, the basis of his judgment being that by the deed-poll the donee meant to provide that his children should take equal shares of the whole fund.

Then it is said that In re Ashton derogates from the authority of Lord Romilly's decision. In In re Ashton the donee of a power to appoint £10,000 made a will by which she appointed it to A., B., and C. equally. She then executed a deed appointing one-third of the fund to A. Subsequently she died without having altered her will. Stirling, J., held that A. was entitled to take one-third under the deed, and one-third of two-thirds under the will. That is not this case. The will written before the deed described the sum as £10,000. When the deed was executed one-third of the fund was taken out. When you read the will you must read it as at the date of the death of the testatrix, and if it had been executed then, the amount of the fund would have been less. In re Ashton has no bearing on this case, which I decide on the ground that, upon the true construction of the deeds of 1891 and 1893, Lady Tancred intended each child to take one-sixth of the whole fund. England v. Lavers, when properly understood, governs this case, and the whole of the fund passes in sixths.

The question was subsequently argued as to whether the assignment by Seymer Mitford Tancred to the trustees of his marriage settlement had effected a forfeiture of the life interest in the property subject to the trusts of Mr. Selby's will which had been appointed to him by the deed of 1891.

Darley, for S. M. Tancred and the trustees of his marriage settlement, argued that there had been no forfeiture, because in regard to the property, he, during his life, took the sole beneficial interest.

W. M. Cann (H. Terrell, K.C., with him), for grandchildren, argued that there had been a forfeiture because he had disposed or had attempted to dispose of his life interest in the property.

He relied on In re Porter, 41 W. R. 38, [1892] 3 Ch. 481.

BUCKLEY, J., said that under the settlement of 1896 the whole of Seymer Mitford Tancred's life interest had been assigned to trustees upon trusts under which he was the sole cestui que trust, and so far he did not think that there had been any forfeiture. It was said that the clause authorizing payment of the charges and expenses of the trust gave a right to the trustees to look to this fund for recoupment of their expenses, and that that was a disposition or attempted disposition of the income whereby it would become "payable to or vested in some other person." In his opinion that was not so. The object of the clause was that if he disposed or attempted to dispose of his life interest or became bankrupt his life estate should go over. That had not happened. Seymer Mitford Tancred remained the only person entitled to the income. The mere fact that the trustees had power to charge their expenses was not sufficient to bring the case within the clause. The case was like that of a man who appointed an agent to collect his income and gave him power to charge a commission. Neither was the appointment of the trustees to be his attorneys to receive his income an assignment, for he still retained the beneficial interest.

He should have thought that the reason of inserting the words "attempt to dispose of" was that the words "dispose of" referred to an event which could not in strictness happen, because if he attempted to dispose of his interest, it ipso facto ceased and could not, therefore, be disposed of. It was said, however, that North, J., in In re Porter had held that the words "attempt to dispose of" had reference to a disposition which by reason of its having no legal effect failed independently of the clause. Even if that were so, in the present case there had been neither a disposition nor an attempted disposition. He held, therefore, that the life interest had not been forfeited.

Solicitors, Payne, Shaw, Mackenzie, & Lake; Gray & Co.; Flower & Flower.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). March 9.

STARKEY v. BANK OF ENGLAND. (a.)

Principal and agent—Power of attorney—Forged signature—Transfer of stock—Stockbroker—Warranty of authority—Liability—Indemnity.

Any person purporting to act as agent impliedly warrants the authority he professes to act under, so that, should the supposed authority turn out to be invalid or forged, he renders himself liable to make good the loss occasioned to those he has misled; and this is so even when he honestly believes his authority to be genuine. A stockbroker, therefore, executing a transfer of stock at the Bank of England under a forged power of attorney which he honestly believed to be good, must indemnify the bank for the consequential loss thereby occasioned them.

Collen v. Wright, 6 W. R. 123, 8 E. & B. 647, approved.

Decision of Court of Appeal (50 W. R. 340, [1902] 1 Ch. 610) affirmed.

Appeal from order of Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ., reported sub. nom. Oliver v. Bank of England, 50 W. R. 340, [1902] 1 Ch. 610), which affirmed a judgment of Kekewich, J. (49 W. R. 391, [1901] 1 Ch. 652).

The facts are set out at length in the reports below; they may be shortly summarized as follows:

In December, 1897, the firm of Starkey, Lewison, & Cooke, stockbrokers, of which the appellant Starkey was a member received instructions from a solicitor named F. W. Oliver, for whom they usually acted, to apply for a power of attorney for the sale of Consols standing in the books of the Bank of England in the names of F. W. Oliver's brother, Edgar Oliver, and F. W. Oliver himself as trustees.

The firm accordingly obtained the form of power, which was forwarded for execution to F. W. Oliver, who returned it signed by himself, and apparently by Edgar Oliver, but the signature of Edgar Oliver was forged, and the usual notice failed to reach him.

The appellant, who alone signed the demand to the bank to act on the power, honestly believed both signatures to be genuine, and the Consols were transferred under it to other names. Certain bank stock were afterwards transferred under precisely similar circumstances.

F. W. Oliver died in July, 1899. After his death the fraud was discovered, and Edgar Oliver thereupon brought an action against the bank for replacement of the Consols and stock, and the bank served the appellant's firm with a third party notice for an indemnity.

Kekewich, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff, and held that the appellant was bound to indemnify the bank.

Upjohn, K.C., Rufus Isaacs, K.C., Stewart Smith, K.C., and Stamp, for the appellant.—The sole question is, was the case within the law laid down in Collen v. Wright, 6 W. R. 123, 8 E. & B. 647? The bank did not rely only on the broker. An innocent misrepresentation only entitles to a rescission of the contract

Derry v. Peek, 38 W. R. 33, 14 App. Cas. 337; Low v. Bouverie, 40 W. R. 50, [1891] 3 Ch. 82; Redgrave v. Hurd, 30 W. R. 251, 20 Ch. D. 1; Firbank's Executors v. Humphreys, 35 W. R. 92, 18 Q. B. D. 54; Polhill v. Walter, 3 B. & Ad. 114; Smout v. Ilbery, 10 M. & W. 1; Story on Agency; Cherry v. Colonial Bank of Australasia, 17 W. R. 1031, L. R. 3 P. C. 24; and Merry v. Nickalls, 20 W. R. 929, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 733, were cited or referred to.

H. D. Greene, K.C., Latham, K.C., and Howard Wright, for the respondents, were not called.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I confess that I have been puzzled to think how I should have argued this case on the part of the appellant, if I had had the duty of doing it. The two learned counsel who have ingeniously occupied a considerable time in endeavouring to do so, show the difficulty which I should have had under the circumstances. I entertain no doubt upon the question. It seems to me that there never has really been any doubt upon the subject. I will take the judgment in Collen v. Wright, and read three passages from it. Lord Campbell, C.J., says: "There can be no doubt that the testator asserted that he had authority to let the property on the terms to which he agreed. That is a promise and a warranty. Might he not then have been sued on the warranty, although he believed it to be true? If he induced the plaintiff to act upon it, he was bound. It is broken since the testator had not authority." Wightman, J., says: "If a man makes a contract as agent, he does promise that he is what he represents himself to be, and he must answer for any damage which directly results from confidence being given to the representation." Crompton, J., says: "I am of the same opinion. The first question is whether an action lies on the contract of a person representing himself to have authority, there being good consideration for such a contract." These three statements seem to me to cover the whole ground. And those statements are corroborated by the full Court of Exchequer Chamber. Therefore the whole number of judges who held both those principles to be part of the law of England was nine judges, nearly fifty years ago. That seems to me to render this case free from all doubt. I do not seek to go into the principle upon which that law may be supposed to rest. It is enough for me to say that at any rate, upon the grounds there stated, it has been the law for fifty years, enunciated by judges of the highest authority. I have not the least notion what is supposed to have shaken that state of the law in the decision in Derry v. Peek. We have more than once been told that Derry v. Peek is supposed to have altered the law—I do not think that it has anything to do with it. It was an action for deceit, and this House held that where it is an action for deceit you must prove deceit, and you must prove mala fides on the part of the person who deceived the other. I suppose that it was no new law. The application of that law to the particular case became a question of fact, and purely of fact. Some of us thought—I myself did—that the facts were rather in favour of the view that there was intentional deceit; but that was a question of fact, and it was disposed of by the court below. That court was unanimous in holding that the court of first instance was right in coming to the conclusion that there was in fact no real deceit. But what has that to do with the present case? Here is a formal document, intended to be acted upon, which upon the face of it purports to be a representation of authority by the person whose signature is appended thereto. Upon the facts I should have thought it impossible to doubt that it was a representation of authority on the part of those two persons whose signatures purport to be to it, and that the person who produced the authority and demanded to act upon it was himself asserting the authority which he supposed he had, to do the thing which he was doing. He had no such authority The result is that the bank have transferred a quantity of Consols standing in the names of two persons when only one person gave the authority. That appears to me to come within the effect of the decision to which I have referred, and I do not think it necessary to go through the catena of cases upon that subject. It is said that this case is extending the principle of Collen v. Wright. I do not think that it is. It seems to me, as a matter of principle, to fall exactly within Collen v. Wright. I have not been able, and I never have been able from the beginning to the end of the argument, to understand what is meant by saying there is a distinction which makes it an extension of Collen v. Wright, because the consequence in that case was a contract, but here no such consequence followed. I think that it is absolutely immaterial, and arises from a confusion between "contract" and "warranty," but whether the facts made a contract between the plaintiff and the defendants, or whether or not a contract followed in consequence seems to me an absolutely illogical and unintelligible distinction. That which does enforce the liability is that, under the circumstances of this document being presented to the bank to be acted upon, and upon the representation that the agent had the authority of the principal, which he had not, that does import an obligation, the contract being for good consideration, on the part of the person that the thing which he represented to be genuine was genuine. The result is that I think that this appeal should be dismissed with costs and I move your lordships accordingly.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lords ASHBOURNE and MACNAGHTEN concurred.

Lord DAVEY.—I also entirely agree. The point made by Mr. Rufus Isaacs seems to be this, that Collen v. Wright is an exception from the rule that an innocent representation gives no cause of action, and that, as an exception, it is to be confined to the particular case in which it was laid down; Collen v. Wright having been a case in which a supposed agent induced a third party to enter into a contract with him, it must be confined to the cases in which the transaction entered into with the supposed agent was in the nature of a contract. I think that it would be a very narrow construction to put upon the rule laid down, and not in accordance with the statement of it by the learned judges. I will not trouble your lordships by reading what Bramwell, L.J., said in the case of Dickson v. Reuter's Telegram Co., 26 W. R. 23, 3 C. P. D. 1, but he pointed out that it was a fallacy to treat it as an exception from the law relating to actions of deceit and that it really and truly was a separate and independent rule of law. As a separate and independent rule of law it was not confined to the bare case where the transaction was simply one of a contract in business into which a third party was induced to enter by a representation that the person with whom he was doing business had the authority of some other person. Really and truly Mr. Upjohn's agument is the same thing in another form, because, as I understand it, the whole stre s of his argument has been to show that this case is not an exception from the rule as to actions of deceit. and that the rule as laid down in Collen v. Wright and other cases, which need not be enumerated, does not extend cases where the supposed agent did not know that he had no authority and had not the means of finding out. It is sufficient to take the earliest cases in which the rule is stated, and I will take as an example a case older than Collen v. Wright; Lewis v. Nicholson, 18 Q. B. 503, in which Lord Campbell, C.J., states the doctrine thus: After saying that in no case where it appears that a man did not intend to bind himself, but only to make a contract for a principal, can he be sued in place of the principal, merely because there was no authority, he says: "He is liable if there is any fraud in an action for deceit, and, in my opinion, as at present advised, on an implied contract that he had authority, whether there was fraud or not." Other cases might be cited to exactly the same effect, and I am of opinion that it is utterly immaterial for the purpose of the application of this branch of the law whether the supposed agent knew of the defect of his authority or not, and indeed that is the very doctrine which is asserted by Story, J., in his first edition, as well as in subsequent editions, on his work of Agency, to which reference has been made. The same point was also, as I understand the case, dealt with in the case of Cherry v. The Colonial Bank of Australasia in the Privy Council, to which reference was made. I have no hesitation in saying that I entirely concur in the motion which has been made in the present case.

Lord ROBERTSON concurred.

Lord LINDLEY.—This is the first time that I have ever heard Collen v. Wright disputed. It appears to me to be good law, and it was law, long before that case, according to Story, J. I do not quite understand the observation made by Cockburn, C.J., that there was nothing in Story against the view which he took. It appears to me that, whatever may be said of the other cases, Collen v. Wright is sound, Firbank's Executors v. Humphreys is sound, and so is this decision.

Order appealed from affirmed and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellant, Morley, Shirreff, & Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, Freshfields.

---

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — May 11, 12

In re INNES. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Contributory—Shares allotted without consideration—Liability of allottee—Misfeasance of directors.

In 1899 two brothers, Messrs. R. I. and J. I., who had certain patent rights, arranged with six shipowners to form a private company, and to sell to such company their business and patent rights for £6,000, payable as to £3,000 in cash and as to £3,000 in fully-paid shares. It was arranged (1) that the capital of the company should be £25,000, divided into 2,500 shares of £10 each; (2) that the vendors should take 300 fully paid-up shares as the balance of their purchase-money; (3) that the six shipowners should take and pay for fifty shares apiece for the purpose of raising the £3,000 payable in cash to the vendors; (4) that of the remaining 1,900 shares each of the six shipowners should take 300 fully-paid shares for his own benefit; (5) that the last 100 shares should be held in reserve and should be applied in making bonus payments to persons introducing business to the company. On the 7th of December, 1899, the company was duly incorporated with the capital above stated. No prospectus was issued, and there was no intention to go to the public with shares.

In pursuance of the above-mentioned arrangement an agreement, dated the 23rd of March, 1900, was entered into between the vendors and the company, whereby the vendors purported to sell their business and patent rights to the company for £25,000, payable as to £3,000 in cash and as to £22,000 by the allotment to the vendors or their nominees of 2,200 fully-paid shares. This agreement was duly registered, and the shares were allotted in accordance with the antecedent arrangement.

(a.) Reported by R. R CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In November, 1901, the company went into liquidation, and a summons was taken out by the liquidator against the four directors—viz., R. I. and three of the shipowners, for a declaration that the three shipowner directors were liable as contributories for the full amount of the fully paid-up shares which they had received, and, in the alternative for a declaration that all four directors were liable for misfeasance.

Held, that the contract of the 23rd of March, 1900, carried out the true previous intention of the parties; that it was a genuine contract of sale as between the vendors and the company; that the director allottees received these shares as nominees under the rights of the vendors; and consequently that the liquidator could not make them liable as contributories.

Held, further, that the directors were not liable on the ground of misfeasance, all the shareholders having known of and acquiesced in the transaction.

Judgment of Kekewich, J. (ante, p. 378, [1903] 1 Ch. 674), reversed.

Appeal from the decision of Kekewich, J. (reported ante, p. 378, [1903] 1 Ch. 674).

The facts are fully set out in the report of the case in the court below.

The arguments adduced were the same as those in the court below, and the same cases were cited.

Upjohn, K.C., and Jessel, for the appellants.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and Cozens-Hardy, for the respondents.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—There was a summons taken out by the liquidator against three directors and a Mr. Robert Innes, for a declaration that the first three respondents were liable as contributories for the full amount of certain shares in the company allotted to them respectively as fully paid up; and, in the alternative, for a declaration that all the respondents were jointly and severally liable as directors for misfeasance for having paid away the capital of the company without any consideration. Kekewich, J., did not find anything as regards the misfeasance point, and expressed his doubt as to whether these gentlemen could be made liable on that ground, but proceeded to deal with the summons independently of misfeasance. He gave judgment in favour of the liquidator, and it is that judgment which we have now to consider.

This was a company formed, as a private company, and everything that was done was done with the full knowledge of all the eight members, and the result was this: that, there being this company formed for the purchase of the business of Messrs. Innes, a contract was ultimately entered into under which the business of Messrs. Innes was sold to the company, and part of the consideration payable by the company to Messrs. Innes consisted of fully-paid shares. It is not disputed that of these fully-paid shares, which purported to be paid to Messrs. Innes, these three directors received, each of them, three hundred. It is said that these shares were not in any way paid for, either by these three directors or by Robert Innes, who represents the vendors, and that the transaction really constituted a gift by the company. There was some sort of a suggestion made that, because these gentlemen took as allottees, you might leave out the part of the contract which related to the vendors and their nominees, and treat the agreement of the 23rd of March, 1900, as a simple transaction between the company and directors. It is impossible now to argue that it is so. That contract was a transaction which entitled the vendors to have, as part of the consideration for the property they were selling, certain shares at their disposal. There was prior to the allotment no application by the allottees at all, and no contract between them and the company. It is impossible to ignore the fact of this contract, which has not been impeached, and under which property passed to the company. It is said, however, that we ought to treat these shares as shares taken without consideration, because, it is said, we ought to treat the business assets, which were sold, as being of the value of £6,000, and the fully-paid shares given beyond that price as not really being a part of the consideration of the purchase, but as a gift made by the company to the vendors for the purpose of being handed on to these directors. A great many cases have been cited as showing that the court is not bound by the form of a contract, but is entitled to go behind it. We are invited to say that the transaction was colourable; that, whilst purporting to be the payment of a price, it was really a gift, or, if not a gift, the payment of a commission for the placing of its capital. This is a mere question of fact, and I cannot agree that we ought to come to this conclusion of fact at all. It was not suggested by the liquidator that these gentlemen were guilty of any fraud, and therefore primâ facie we have got before us a contract under which these fully-paid shares were part of the price of the property which was sold. It cannot be suggested that mere inadequacy of price is sufficient of itself to invalidate the contract. To do that you must show that the contract of purchase in truth and in fact was something else than a purchase. I see no ground whatever for coming to that conclusion. On looking at the facts, as a whole, it seems to me that it was a most natural transaction that the vendors, when selling, should consider it a reasonable thing to do, not only to ask for cash, but also to ask for payment in shares. And, although I have not got to go into the question of the goodness or badness of the bargain on the part of the company, I think that, so far as the company is concerned, there is nothing to lead us to the conclusion that such a bargain was not made by those acting on behalf of the company in the honest belief that it was in the interests of the company. I have seen nothing in the affidavits or anything else to lead me to say that the transaction was not what it purported to be. The only other observation I have to make is with regard to one suggestion as to the largeness of the amount which was given in these fully-paid shares. I can only say that I entirely agree with the view taken by Mr. Upjohn, that when once you arrive at the conclusion that there really was a contract of sale and purchase, and that the company did get the property in fact, then it is a matter of indifference how the shares were divided amongst the eight shareholders. Under the circumstances, there is nothing to be said with regard to the misfeasance part of the summons. I am of opinion that we must reverse the judgment of the court below.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. When the arguments on behalf of the respondent, the liquidator, are analyzed, it will be found that for their validity they really depend on two assumptions. The first assumption is this—viz., that before the company was formed and before the contract was made between the vendors and the company, the two Innes and the six shipowners had arranged that Messrs. Innes should sell their property to the company for £6,000 only. Now I cannot agree with that assumption of fact at all. I do not think that Messrs.

Innes would have been willing to sell to the company without, as part of the terms of sale, obtaining such a hold of the share capital as would enable them to carry out the negotiations of sale as between themselves and the six other gentlemen. It was, to my mind, most important to Messrs. Innes that they should obtain the confidence in the company of the six shipowners, and that they should all be interested in the capital, and have that capital to themselves in the proportions which they had arranged between themselves. To my mind the negotiations between those parties and the arrangements come to were quite consistent with the view that the purchase-money should be fixed at £25,000, as to £3 000 in cash, and as to £22,000 in fully-paid shares, and that the six should get from Messrs. Innes, as vendors, such part of the £22,000 in shares as had been arranged between them. If such an arrangement had not been effected, there would, in my opinion, have been no sale and no company. The first assumption, then, goes by the board. The second assumption on which the liquidator relied was this—viz., that a contract had been made by the two Messrs. Innes to sell to the company for £6,000. It is, to my mind, impossible to make such an assumption No such contract ever existed. The contract which was in fact made and registered carried out, to my mind, the real intention of the parties. But for that registered contract the company would never have acquired the patent rights which they did acquire. And, when you look at the registered contract, it is not one which can be severed and treated as two contracts—one as a contract of sale by the Messrs. Innes for £6,000, the other as a contract by the company to issue shares to the shipowners as a consideration for their applying for £500 worth of shares. The registered contract cannot be so split up, and it is impossible to hold that these shares were allotted without consideration or at a discount.

The ground, then, upon which the case was decided in the court below cannot be supported. It is impossible to place the appellants upon the list of contributories as holders of unpaid shares. The case is covered by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Carling's case, 24 W. R. 165, 1 Ch. D. 115. There was no taking of shares by the appellants as between them and the company. They only acquired as nominees under the rights of the two Innes.

The only other ground upon which the liquidator could have succeeded is that of misfeasance. But the circumstances negative such a view. The shareholders were eight in number, all were sui juris, no other shareholders were contemplated. That being so, the company as a whole knew of these shares being given to the six shipowners, and consequently have no right to impeach the transaction or to call upon these gentlemen to refund either the shares or their value. There was no act ultra vires the company, there were no acts requiring to be validated by some formal meeting of the company. The creditors, again, have no right to impeach if the company has not the right. The creditors are not deceived. If they had looked at the registered contract they would have seen what the position was. They would have found that all the shares of the company had been issued as fully paid up; they would have seen that the property consisted of patents and other rights acquired by the company. The creditors, then, can have no right to make these gentlemen liable by alleging misfeasance. The appeal must succeed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I also am unable to adopt the view of Kekewich, J., in this case. There are two points for decision. If the question were now raised for the first time a good deal might be said in support of that part of the application which seeks to charge these directors with misfeasance. It is conceded that if there had been in fact other shareholders at the time, or any intention that there should be other shareholders, the directors might have been held liable. On principle it is not easy to appreciate the distinction between a private company and a public company. It might have been more satisfactory to say that in each case the mere knowledge and acquiescence of all the shareholders, not manifested by a formal resolution of the company in general meeting, ought not to suffice to condone a breach of trust in the event of the subsequent winding up of the company. But the authorities have, in my view, decided the contrary, and the misfeasance part of the summons cannot, therefore, be supported. As to the other part of the summons, I can find no ground for holding the appellants liable unless the court is prepared to overrule Carling's case and the subsequent authorities which have followed it, which, of course, is impossible. There was only one contract between the vendors and the company; it was not even one contract divisible into two parts. It was probably a voidable contract, but it cannot now be avoided or impeached. The company took possession of the property. The liquidator has sold it. The court cannot go into the question of consideration. The vendors, as between themselves and the company, were entitled to these shares fully paid up, and were entitled to have them allotted to their nominees. The agreement between the vendors and the directors as to the disposal of part of the purchase price receivable from the company did not make the contract of sale between the vendors and the company either a "sham" or "illusory."

Appeal allowed

Solicitors, F. W. Hill; Burn & Berridge.

---

From K. B. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.) April 21.

ATKINSON v. LUMB. (a)

Master and servant—Employer's liability—Accident—Compensation—"On or in or about engineering work"—Construction of reservoir—Laying water-pipes—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

A contractor had entered into a contract for the construction of a reservoir and the laying of water-pipes from the reservoir to a town about two miles away. The laying of the pipes was commenced at a point about 600 yards from the reservoir, and the work was continued towards the reservoir. The trench for the pipes had been opened for about 100 yards, and the pipe-track for the rest of the distance to the reservoir had been staked out. A workman who was employed by the contractor in laying the pipes was injured by an accident at a spot between 500 and 600 yards from the reservoir. The reservoir was being constructed by means of machinery driven by steam, but no machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power was used in laying the pipes. In proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act. 1897, the county court judge found that the laying of the pipes was a necessary part of the entire work, which was an "engineering work" within section 7, sub-section 2, of the Act, and that therefore the workman was at the time of the accident employed on that engineering work.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that there was evidence upon which the county court judge could so find.

Appeal from an award of the Todmorden County Court judge under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was a workman in the employment of a contractor named Lumb. Lumb had entered into a contract with the Corporation of Todmorden for the construction of a water reservoir and filter beds, and the laying of pipes from the reservoir to Todmorden, a distance of about two miles. The work was all being carried out under one contract. The laying of the pipes was commenced at a point about 600 yards from the reservoir, and was continued towards the reservoir. A trench for the pipes had been opened for about 100 yards from this point, and the contractor had taken possession of the rest of the ground between this and the reservoir, and had staked out the pipe track up to the reservoir. The pipes were brought to the place in wagons and lifted out of the wagons by means of a derrick worked by hand.

On the 15th of January, 1902, the applicant was employed in laying the pipes in the trench, when, in paying off the steel rope attached to the derrick, a broken strand injured his thumb and incapacitated him for work. At this time the reservoir was being constructed by means of machinery driven by steam. In proceeding to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it was admitted the construction of the reservoir was an "engineering work" within the meaning of section 7 of the Act, but it was contended on behalf of the employer that the applicant was not at the time of the accident employed "on or in or about engineering work."

The county court judge, in giving his decision, said that the point at issue was whether or not the water pipes, which were to be connected with the reservoir, and the work necessary for laying them down, were so much an integral part of the water system as to bring the case within the Act. In his opinion, this work for and laying of the pipes were a necessary part of the engineering work of the water supply, and so intimately connected with it as to make it a part of the entire work, and in no wise dissociated from or merely ancillary to it, as in the case of Chambers v. Whitehaven Harbour Commissioners, 47 W. R. 533, [1899] 2 Q. B. 132. The reservoir without the pipes, or the pipes without the reservoir, would not in either case be a complete work, and as a part was engineering so was the whole. He accordingly made an award in favour of the applicant for half his weekly wages.

The employer appealed.

After the award the applicant died from blood poisoning consequent upon the injury, and his personal representatives were made respondents to the appeal.

Adshead Elliott, for the employer.—The employment of the deceased man at the time of the accident was not "on or in or about engineering work" within section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The reservoir was an engineering work, but this accident happened between 500 and 600 yards away from it. It therefore did not happen "about" the engineering work: Chambers v. Whitehaven Harbour Commissioners is directly in point. The award was therefore wrong.

E. Shortt, for the respondents.—The county court judge has found as a fact that the work of constructing the reservoir and laying the pipes was one entire work carried out under one contract. The work was split up into sections for convenience, and the judge has found that the laying of the pipes was a necessary part of that engineering work. There was evidence upon which the judge could so find, and this court cannot interfere with his finding. It is a question of fact in each case, and whether the distance from the reservoir is 600 yards or 20 yards can make no difference in principle. The deceased man at the time of the accident was therefore engaged "on," or at any rate "about," engineering work. The case of Middlemiss v. Middle District Committee of Berwick, in the Court of Session in Scotland, 2 Ct. Sess. Cas. (5th ser.) 392, is directly in point.

He also referred to Mason v. Dean, 48 W. R. 353, [1900] 1 Q. B. 770; Fenn v. Miller, 48 W. R. 369, [1900] 1 Q. B. 788.

Elliott, in reply.—In Chambers v. Whitehaven Harbour Commissioners it was just as much a necessary part of the dredging operations to carry the mud out to sea when dredged as the laying of the pipes in the present case was a necessary part of the engineering work of the water supply. Could it be said that if the reservoir had been 100 miles away from the town the laying of the pipes near the town would have been part of the engineering work?

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal by the employer from an award of the county court judge in favour of the workman. The workman who was injured was in the employment of a contractor, who had entered into a contract for the construction of a reservoir and the laying down of pipes for the supply of water to a town. It is admitted that the construction of the reservoir involved the use of machinery driven by steam power, and that, therefore, the construction of the reservoir comes within the definition of "engineering work" in section 7, sub-section 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. That sub-section says that "'engineering work' means any work of construction or alteration or repair of a railroad, harbour, dock, canal, or sewer." Pausing there, the county court judge has found that this particular work of constructing the reservoir and laying the pipes does not come within that part of the definition. The clause goes on: "and includes any other work for the construction, alteration, or repair of which machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power is used." That is the definition of "engineering work" given in the Act, and by section 7, sub-section 1, "this Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers as hereinafter defined on or in or about . . . engineering work." In dealing with this definition I desire to call attention to this, that the word "work" is used in two senses, and unless this is borne in mind it may give rise to some difficulty. In the first part of the definition it is used as meaning the labour bestowed; in the second part it is used as meaning the thing upon which the labour is bestowed. Accordingly, in the second part of the definition of "engineering work," with which alone we are concerned in the present case, the word "work" is used as meaning, not the labour bestowed, but the thing on which the labour is bestowed. It is, therefore, a physical thing which embraces a certain physical area. It is important to bear that in mind, and it emphasizes the distinction between the present case and those cases in which it was held that a workman who was not on or in or about a factory did not come within the Act merely because he was at the time of the accident employed upon his master's business. We are not concerned in this case with labour bestowed upon a thing, but with the thing itself. If, therefore, the injured workman was at the time of the accident employed on or in or about the physical thing—the engineering work—the Act applies. The county court judge has found as a fact that the area of this work embraced the place where the workman was injured. He met with an accident when he was employed on this physical thing called an engineering work. That at once distinguishes many of the cases on the Act from the present case. Even if I did not agree with those cases, I am bound by them; but I must say that I entirely agree with them. The words "on or in or about" are used in reference to area, and do not cover the case of a workman who is injured while employed on his master's business unless he was at the time on or in or about the area of, among other things, the factory or engineering work. But if the area of the factory or engineering work is extended to the place where the workman is injured the Act applies.

In Chambers v. Whitehaven Harbour Commissioners a steam dredger was used for dredging a harbour and workmen were employed on the steam dredger. The mud which the steam dredger raised was discharged into a hopper which, when full, was taken by a tug out to sea and there emptied. The hopper was not driven or actuated by steam. One of the workmen so employed went in his turn in the hopper to help in discharging the mud into the sea, and when about a mile and a half out at sea he was knocked overboard and drowned. The county court judge there found as a fact that the accident did not happen "on or in or about" engineering work. There was no finding in that case that the place where the man met with the accident was part of the physical area which was described as the engineering work. The steam dredger and the place where it was were the physical area of the engineering work. The hopper was like the cart which conveys the goods from a factory, and with regard to which there has been more than one decision. This court held, following a line of decisions, that the man did not meet with the accident while employed on or in or about engineering work. Then there is the case in Scotland of Middlemiss v. Middle District Committee of Berwick. That case is very difficult to distinguish from the present case. There a road was being repaired by means of a steam-roller and a water-cart, the water-cart being used to sprinkle the newly-laid surface before it was rolled. The driver of the water-cart was directed to water a piece of road over a quarter of a mile away from where the steam-roller was at work, and he was there killed by an accident. The Court of Session held that he was employed on an engineering work when he was killed, the operations being part of a process. They held that the physical area of the engineering work extended to the place where the man met with the accident. In the present case the county court judge has found that the place where the accident happened was part of the area of the engineering work, and in my opinion there is evidence to support that finding. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have nothing to add.

MATHEW, L.J.—I also am of the same opinion, and I agree with the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, W. Hurd & Son, for Chapman & Brooks, Manchester.

Solicitors for the respondents, Firth & Co., for Craven & Garsed, Todmorden.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.) — April 21.

ELVIN v. WOODWARD & CO. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation — "Scaffolding" — Painter's steps—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c 37), s. 7.

An ordinary pair of self-supporting painter's steps, eight feet high, with flat steps and a board on the top for a painter to stand upon to enable him to paint a place out of his reach from the ground may be a "scaffolding" within section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

So held by Collins, M.R., and Mathew, L.J.; Stirling, L.J., dissenting.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the Shoreditch County Court under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was a painter in the employment of Woodward & Co., who had contracted to repair and paint a house which exceeded 30ft. in height. The applicant was employed on the painting work of the house. He was painting a wall 10 or 11ft. in height above the street, and in order to reach the necessary height he was standing upon a pair of ordinary painter's steps. These steps were 8ft. high and had ten flat steps with a board on the top upon which a man could stand when at work. The steps were supported by uprights, and could be moved from place to place. While the applicant was at work standing on the steps, he fell off and was injured. At the time of the accident the main scaffolding, which had been used in repairing the house, had been taken down.

Upon proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the county court judge gave judgment as follows: "I find that the applicant in this case was injured by a fall from steps on which he had been standing for the purpose of painting a wall above the height he could reach when standing on the ground. The steps were 8ft. high, ten rungs, ordinary painter's steps. In my opinion such steps, though used at the time of the accident to support the man while doing the work, afford no evidence that the house in question was being repaired by means of a scaffolding. If the court is of opinion that there was evidence on which I might find that the steps were a 'scaffolding,' I award £1 a week from fourteen days after the accident until ended, reduced, or varied, with costs on scale C. Award for the respondents (the employers) with costs on scale C."

The applicant appealed.

Rueyg, K.C., and Chester Jones, for the applicant.

A. Powell, K.C., and Addington Willis, for the employers.

The arguments and the cases are referred to in the judgments.

COLLINS, M.R.—At one time I should have held without any hesitation that such steps as these were not, and could not be, a "scaffolding" within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 1. of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The House of Lords, however, has, in Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co., 49 W. R. 380, [1901] A. C. 49, placed a construction on the word scaffolding which is not consistent with the view I had previously taken. They held that scaffolding might be external or internal, and might include an internal staging arranged with planks and trestles and without poles. That decision has cut away the grounds upon which I should have held that this arrangement of steps could not be a scaffolding. It is exceedingly difficult to find any principle of law to apply in ascertaining what is a scaffolding. In Marshall v. Rudeforth, 50 W. R. 596, [1902] 2 K. B. 175, this court held that it was impossible to say as a matter of law that a ladder which was placed against a house and was used for the work of repairing the house must be a scaffolding. On the other hand, this court held in Veazey v. Chattle, 50 W. R 263, [1902] 1 K. B. 494, that a contrivance called a crawling-board used for the repair of the roof of a building might be a scaffolding. In that case the court affirmed the decision of the same county court judge as decided the present case, holding that there was evidence to justify the finding of the judge that this contrivance was a scaffolding. The same learned judge has now put the question in the present case to the court whether a pair of ordinary painter's steps such as these can be a scaffolding within the meaning of the Act. He has held that the steps, though used at the time of the accident to support the man while doing the work, afford no evidence that the house was being repaired by means of a scaffolding. If he had merely made an award in favour of the employers, I should not have found it possible to disagree with him, because there seems to me to be evidence upon which the county court judge could have found either way. But he has made an award based upon the assumption that these steps could not be a scaffolding, while at the same time he added that "if the court is of opinion that there was evidence on which I might find that the steps were a scaffolding, I award £1 a week from fourteen days after the accident." That amounts to saying that if there is any evidence, he would have held that the steps were a scaffolding. The learned judge does not ask us, if we think that there is some evidence, to send the case back to him. I base my judgment on this, that these steps may be a scaffolding. I cannot draw any distinction in point of law between a staging consisting of planks placed across trestles or footstools and ordinary painter's steps which carry their own support with a top wide enough to form a platform for a man to stand upon at work. I cannot say as a matter of law that such an arrangement cannot be a scaffolding. That being so, there is evidence upon which the county court judge might have found that the steps were a scaffolding, and therefore the appeal must be allowed and an award made in favour of the applicant for £1 a week from fourteen days after the accident.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

STIRLING, L.J.—I regret that I am unable to agree with my learned brothers. The question is whether the structure which is described as ordinary painter's steps is a "scaffolding" within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The House of Lords, in Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co, has laid down the way in which the Act is to be construed. Lord Macnaghten says: "I agree that the only way to construe the Act is to read it fairly, taking the words in their common and ordinary signification, and that the court ought not to strain the language in order to bring in or to exclude any particular case, however arbitrary or unscientific the line of demarcation drawn by the Act may seem to be." In the same case Lord Brampton cited with approval a passage from the judgment of Rigby, L.J., in Maude v. Brook, 48 W. R. 290, [1900] 1 Q. B. 575, where the Lord Justice said: "In construing the Act we are not at liberty to confine the meaning of the word 'scaffolding' to that which is its most usual form; anything, whether usual or unusual, that can properly be called scaffolding is within the Act." And, lastly, Lord Lindley said: "Anything which can fairly be called a scaffold is a scaffolding within the meaning of section 7 if used as mentioned in the Act." Guided by those opinions, I ask myself whether an ordinary pair of painter's steps which are used for enabling a painter to paint a wall out of his reach from the ground can be fairly regarded as a scaffolding. Much as I regret to differ from the other members of the court, I feel bound to come to the conclusion that the view taken by the county court judge is correct.

MATHEW, L.J.—I agree with the Master of the Rolls. We must take the words of the Act and see what they mean. A scaffolding within the meaning of this Act includes a structure inside or outside a building erected for the purpose of enabling workmen to construct or repair the building or part thereof. We have been instructed by the House of Lords in Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co. that this question is a question of law for the court after the facts have been ascertained, and that one of the elements to be considered is the purpose for which the scaffolding is used. That case shows that what would not in the ordinary acceptation of the term be called a scaffolding may be a scaffolding within the meaning of the Act. I have no hesitation in saying that two trestles with a plank placed across them may be a "scaffolding" within the decision in the House of Lords, if used in the way mentioned in the Act. In the present case we have a pair of steps so constructed as not to answer the ordinary purpose of a ladder—namely, to enable a man to go up or down from one place to another. They are constructed for a special purpose and are self-supporting, upon which a man can stand while he is at work. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the applicant, Shaen, Roscoe, Massey, & Co.

Solicitors for the employers, Treadwell & Aylwin.

---

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Byrne, J. — May 14.

In re PEIRSON'S SETTLEMENT.
CAYLEY v. DE WEND. (a.)

Settlement—Marriage settlement—Trust for persons who would have been entitled as wife's next-of-kin if wife had survived husband—Survivorship of husband—Time for ascertaining next-of-kin.

Under the ultimate trust in a marriage settlement trustees were directed to hold certain funds "in trust for the person or persons who, under the statutes made for the distribution of intestates' personal estates, would then be entitled to the personal estate of A. P." (the wife) "in case she having survived" her husband "had died possessed of the said stocks, funds, and securities, and to be paid and divided accordingly." The husband survived the wife

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, following Pinder v. Pinder, 28 Beav. 44, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 71, that the persons entitled were the wife's next-of-kin at the time of the husband's decease.

This was a summons to determine what persons, in the events which had happened, were the next-of-kin of Mrs. Anne Peirson, deceased, under a marriage settlement bearing date the 1st of December, 1852.

The plaintiff was the Rev. Richard Edward Cayley, of 37, Gunterstone-road, West Kensington, clerk, who claimed to be the sole surviving trustee of the said settlement.

The defendants were parties claiming as the next-of-kin at Mrs. Peirson's death, and at her husband's death respectively.

The facts of the case were as follow: Under the said settlement it was declared that the trustees should stand possessed of the several sums of Consolidated Bank Annuities therein mentioned upon trust as to the income for Mr. and Mrs. Peirson during their lives as therein mentioned, and after the death of the survivor of them it was declared that the said trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities, and the annual produce of them, should be in trust for the children of the said Mr. and Mrs. Peirson as therein mentioned, and in the event of the failure of such issue the said moneys and funds should be held on such trusts as Mrs. Peirson should during coverture by will appoint, and in default thereof in trust for the person or persons who under the statutes made for the distribution of intestates' personal estates would then be entitled to the personal estate of the said Anne Peirson in case she having survived the said Thomas Peirson had died possessed of the said trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities, and to be paid and divided accordingly.

Mrs. Peirson died on the 1st of May, 1891, leaving no issue, and without having exercised her power of appointment.

On the 9th of November, 1902, Mr. Peirson died.

At the date of Mrs. Peirson's death her only next-of-kin was her sister, Mrs. De Wend, who died on the 22nd of February, 1897, and whose executors and trustees were before the court.

At the date of Mr. Peirson's death Mrs. Peirson's next-of-kin were her sister's four children.

T. L. Wilkinson, for the trustees of the settlement.

J. W. Galbraith, for Mrs. Peirson's trustees.—The class ought to be ascertained at the date of the husband's death: Pinder v. Pinder, 28 Beav. 44, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 71; Chalmers v. North, 8 W. R. 426, 28 Beav. 175; In re King, Gibson v. Wright, 60 L. T. Rep. 745, 37 W. R. Dig. 158; Clark v. Hayne, 37 W. R. 667, 42 Ch. 529. The words are practically the same as in Pinder v. Pinder.

T. Pakenham Law, for the representatives of Mrs De Wend.—The date at which the next-of-kin entitled to take under this gift ought to be ascertained is the death of the wife: Druitt v. Seaward, 34 W. R. 180, 31 Ch. D. 234; In re Bradley, 58 L. T. Rep. 631. There is a conflict of authorities here, and all the cases cannot be reconciled. Druitt v. Seaward, however, closely resembles this, and should be followed.

BYRNE, J. (after stating the facts).—The point is, at what date the next-of-kin are to be ascertained, whether at the death of the wife or of the husband. There is a difficulty in reconciling the cases, but the words in this case are almost the same as those used in Pinder v. Pinder. Chitty, J., says in regard to the judgment of Romilly, M.R., in Pinder v. Pinder, in In re King, Gibson v. Wright, 60 L. T. Rep., at p. 747: "I do not think it would be right after that decision has stood for so long a period, and when I have got a trust, as I have stated, as nearly identical as could be, to depart from that decision, which may frequently have been acted on." I cannot add anything. I think that I ought to take the same course here as was taken in Pinder v. Pinder. Stirling, J., in In re Bradley did not dissent from Pinder v. Pinder. He stated that the words there were altogether different. I cannot as to In re Bradley throw over that part of Stirling, J.'s judgment. In Clarke v Hayne Kay, J., disapproved both of Druitt v. Seaward and In re Bradley. I can only say that this case falls within Pinder v. Pinder and I must follow the decision there.

Solicitors (for all parties), Cayley & Cayley.

---

Chan. Div. Byrne, J. } May 8, 9.

CARTER v. ROBERTS. (a.)

Practice—Motion to commit—Exhibits to affidavits—Service of copies upon respondent—R.S.C. 1885, ord. 52, r. 4.

An exhibit to an affidavit is not part of the affidavit within the terms of ord. 52, r. 4, and that rule does not require copies of exhibits to be served upon the respondent to a motion for committal. But the respondent ought to have notice of the evidence intended to be used against him, and if the party moving omits to furnish him with copies of such exhibits as are necessary to enable him to know fairly the nature of this evidence, the applicant will be liable to have the motion dismissed.

Motion.

This was a motion by the plaintiff in a partnership action for the committal of the defendant for contempt of court, and also for the appointment of a receiver of the assets of the partnership.

Levett, K.C., and T. Douglas, for the plaintiff, stated that there were certain exhibits to the affidavits filed on behalf of the plaintiff, copies of which had not been served upon the defendant with the notice of motion, and they asked for an adjournment. It appeared that copies of the exhibits had subsequently been given to the defendant.

Rowden, K.C., and P. S. Stokes, for the defendant.—We object to any adjournment, and ask that motion may be at once dismissed. The plaintiff has not complied with ord. 52, r. 4, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, by not having served copies of the exhibits. Exhibits are part of the affidavit (In re Hinchliffe, 43 W. R. 82, [1895] 1 Ch. 117), and copies of them must be served with the notice of motion: Rosenbaum v. Belson, 45 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 576, [1901] W. N. 124. The irregularity is fatal and cannot be cured: Taylor v. Roe, 68 L. T. Rep. 213, [1893] W. N. 14, 41 W. R. Dig. 171. Every iota of the rules must be complied with: per Bowen, L.J., in In re Evans, 41 W. R. 230, 9 Times L. R. 109

Levett, in reply.—The service of copies of affidavits is not required by the rules: In re Hutchings, [1887] W. N. 254; Sloane v. Britain Steamship Co., 45 W. R. 203, [1897] 1 Q. B. 185.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 9.—BYRNE, J.—The rule upon which the question depends is rule 4 of order 52. There are two cases noted in the Weekly Notes bearing upon the question. One is In re Hutchings. In that case a preliminary objection to the motion was taken on the ground that copies of the exhibits had not been served with the notice of motion in accordance with the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883. Stirling, J., in overruling the objection, said that although the rule did not in terms extend to the exhibits, he was far from saying that they ought not to be delivered with the affidavits. But in that case the respondent had seen all the exhibits, and had filed affidavits in reply, in which he had dealt with them all; so that it is not really a decision on the point, because, as I read it, the learned judge thought that if the objection was a good one, it had been waived. Then it appears that there was a case before me of Rosenbaum v. Belson. I have a vague recollection of the case. The party appeared in person, and said that he had not had copies of the exhibits. I cannot call to mind whether I dismissed the action upon the ground that they had not been served. If so, and if it was done upon that general ground, I am not prepared to say that I was right. I have now had an opportunity of hearing the question fully and carefully argued by counsel on both sides, and I will state the conclusion to which I have come.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I think that for some purposes the exhibits are treated in the Rules of the Supreme Court as part of the affidavit, and that in other respects and purposes they are undoubtedly not so treated. Thus affidavits to be filed under ord. 38, r. 10, do not include exhibits. The exhibits are not filed, but go back to the persons to whom they belong. On the other hand, it was decided in In re Hinchliffe that for the purposes of ord. 38, r. 23—that is as regards the right of inspection—exhibits are part of the affidavit. In In re Hutchings, Stirling, J., said that exhibits were not within the terms of ord. 52, r. 4. I take that as meaning that the term affidavit does not include exhibits. It has been pointed out in the course of the argument that it would be impossible in certain cases to serve copies of exhibits. Thus upon a motion to attach a man in respect of some infringement of an invention it might be necessary for strict proof to exhibit an iron safe weighing a ton. Or, as Mr. Levett suggested, the exhibit might be a box of cigars. How could you serve a copy of the safe or of the box of cigars? There are other cases where it would seem oppressive to the parties, either to the party moving, or if the motion should be successful to the respondent, to serve copies of all written exhibits. Thus it might be necessary to exhibit a copy of a long account, the original of which was known to be in the possession of the respondent. In that case it would seem to be primâ facie oppressive on the respondent if he should thereafter have to pay the costs of the motion, because he would have to pay for the copy of a document, the original of which he had in his own possession, and with which he was acquainted. I have therefore come to the conclusion that the terms of ord. 52, r. 4, do not make it necessary to serve copies of exhibits so as to impose upon the party moving the absolute result of having his motion dismissed for irregularity in case he omits to serve them. At the same time it is obvious, as was said by Kekewich, J., in Taylor v. Roe, that the meaning and intention of the rule is that the defendant shall have fair notice, not merely of the grounds on which the motion is made, but of the evidence on which it is founded, and I think that a party moving to attach who did not furnish copies of such exhibits as were reasonably necessary to enable the defendant to understand the nature of the evidence that would be brought against him would be in peril of having his motion dismissed. Each case must depend upon its special circumstances. Under these circumstances I think that the plaintiff is entitled to ask for the motion to stand over upon the ground that he has not committed an irregularity within the words of the rule.

[Upon attention being called to ord. 14, r. 2, his lordship observed that where the rules intend an affidavit to be served it is so stated.]

Motion adjourned.

Solicitors, Jaques & Co., for C. Beaumont Cottam, Ludlow; Chester, Broome, & Griffithes, for Weyman & Weyman, Ludlow.

---

Chan. Div. Farwell, J. — March 6, 12.

In re WELLS.
BOYER v. MCLEAN. (a.)

Will—Agreement for determining the trusts of the will by paying off annuities—Sanction of court on behalf of infants—Arrangement for benefit of infants other than a "compromise"—Jurisdiction.

The court has jurisdiction to sanction an arrangement between parties, some of whom are infants, notwithstanding that such arrangement be not strictly speaking a "compromise."

Peto v. Gardner, 2 Y. & C. C. C. 312, not followed.

Adjourned summons.

By his will, dated the 15th of December, 1882, H. W. gave all his property, both real and personal, to trustees upon trust to pay two annuities, and during the lifetime of the two annuitants and of the survivor to accumulate the remainder of the income, and upon trust after the death of the survivor of the two annuitants for such of the children of his two daughters as should be then living and should attain the age of twenty-one.

A son of one of the two daughters made a settlement of his expectant share, and his son, an infant, had a contingent interest under this settlement.

By a conditional agreement entered into on the 19th of November, 1902, it was agreed that the two annuitants should be paid off and the residue of the fund divided among the persons then entitled in expectancy to shares therein.

This summons asked for the sanction of the court to the agreement on behalf of the infant.

Butcher, K.C., and J. A. Nash, for the plaintiffs.

A. F. C. Luxmore; Upjohn, K.C., and F. W. Webster; W. Scott Thompson; Forder Lampson; Begg; and Taubmann Goldie, for the several defendants, asked the court to sanction the agreement, but called attention to the decision of Knight-Bruce, V.C., in Peto v. Gardner, 2 Y. & C. Ch. Cas. 312, that the court had no jurisdiction to give such sanction except to a literal compromise—i.e., a compromise of an actual dispute; and to Day v. Day, 9 Jur. 785, in which the same judge acted upon his previous decision in Peto v. Gardner.

FARWELL, J.—I am satisfied that the proposed arrangement is for the benefit of the infant, and I should have no doubt, but for the decision of Knight-Bruce, V.C., in Peto v. Gardner. That decision seems to me, however, to run counter to a continuous stream of authority. To go back to the beginning of things, the judgment of Lord Hardwicke in Inwood v. Twyne, Amb. 417, is an early and excellent authority that the court will "change the nature of an infant's estate if that be for the infant's benefit." To the same effect is Pierson v. Shore, 1 Atk. 480, where Lord Hardwicke treats the fact that the transaction in question was the most beneficial there could be for an infant cestui que trust as a sufficient reason for supporting it. Again the court will allow policies of life assurance which have been settled to be surrendered in certain circumstances, as in Hill v. Trenery, 23 Beav. 16, 6 W. R. Ch. Digr 54; Beresford v. Beresford, 23 Beav. 292, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 91, and in an earlier and even stronger case before Lord Langdale, Vickers v. Scott, 1 Jur. 402. Nor is it necessary to the exercise of the jurisdiction of the court that the arrangement to be sanctioned should have in the strict sense a compromise. In Brooke v. Lord Mostyn, 13 W. R. 1115, 2 De G. J. & S. 373, Turner, L.J., though he spoke of the arrangement then under discussion as a compromise, describes the jurisdiction of the court in the broadest terms. He says: "In the exercise of that jurisdiction the court may in general order the trustees to deal with the trust property in whatever mode it may consider to be for the benefit of the cestuis que trust who are infants or under disabilities." The most recent reported case bearing on this subject is In re New, In re Leavers, [1901] 2 Ch. 534, where, again, the jurisdiction of the court is stated in terms which do not suggest any such limitation as Knight-Bruce, V.C., laid down, and where it is said "it is impossible, and no attempt ought to be made to state or define all the circumstances under which or the extent to which the court will exercise the jurisdiction." I do not think Peto v. Gardner can fairly be distinguished from the present case, but I come to the conclusion that it runs counter to a continuous stream of authorities, and that I am not bound to follow it.

(a.) Reported by GODFREY R. BENSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors, Collins & Cook; Collins & Collins; Duffield, Bruty, & Co.; Travers, Smith, & Co.

---

Chan. Div.
Farwell, J. } Feb. 17.

In re SAUNDERTON GLEBE LANDS (a)

Railway—Compulsory purchase—Personal inconvenience to limited owner—Compensation—Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 73.

A limited owner of lands taken by compulsory purchase under the Lands Clauses Acts is entitled to have any personal inconvenience which may be caused to him by the works for which the land is taken, considered in the fixing of the purchase price, and to have so much of the purchase price as is attributable to such consideration paid to him.

Petition.

By a private Act powers were given to a joint committee of the Great Western and Great Central Railways to acquire a part of the glebe lands of the parish of Saunderton, Bucks, for the purpose of constructing a new line of railway and of widening an existing line.

The sum of £1,600 was paid into court as purchase-money, and the rector now applied to the court for the payment out to him of £100 as compensation for the personal inconvenience, annoyance, and loss of amenity of residence occasioned to him by the noise of the works, the temporary obstruction of the only roads leading to the rectory, the crowd of strange workmen brought into the parish, and other causes connected with the works.

Affidavits were sworn by the valuers who had fixed the purchase price of £1,600 to the effect that they had taken these circumstances into consideration, and that, had they not done so, they would have fixed the price at least £100 lower.

C. E. Bovill, for the petitioner, referred to In re Collis' Estate, 14 L. T. Rep. 353; 14 W. R. Ch. Dig. 107.

G. Borthwick, for the patrons, did not oppose the application.

Medd, for the railway companies.

FARWELL, J.—This is an application of an unusual character, but the order asked for seems to be clearly within the proviso of section 73 of the Act, and I accordingly make it.

Solicitors, Routh, Stacy, & Castle; R. R. Nelson.

(a.) Reported by GODFREY R. BENSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

---

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) } April 27.

LUMBY v. FAUPEL. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Covenant by lessee to pay taxes, rates, and assessments—Expenses of paving rate—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s 150.

A covenant in a lease that the lessee would during the continuance "pay all taxes, rates, and assessments imposed or assessed upon the premises, or on the landlord or tenant in respect thereof," does not impose on the lessee the apportioned cost of paving the road in front of the premises in respect of work done by the local authority under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, where the work was done before, but the apportionment was made after, the granting of the lease.

Baylis v. Jiggens, [1898] 2 Q. B. 315, 46 W. R. Dig. 87, followed.

Foulger v. Arding, 50 W. R. 417, [1902] 1 K. B. 700, distinguished.

Appeal from his Honour Judge Russell, sitting at the Kingston County Court.

The action was brought by the lessor of No. 46, Broadway, Wimbledon, to recover from the lessee the sum of £25 18s. 11d., being the amount of the expense of paving the roadway apportioned on the premises, under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The plaintiff by a lease dated the 2nd of October, 1898, leased the above premises to Edward Gordon for the term of twenty-one years.

On the 29th of May, 1899, Edward Gordon assigned his interest in the premises to the defendant.

In November, 1899, the defendant surrendered his lease, and was granted a new lease for the term of twenty-one years from the 29th of September, 1899.

The lease contained a covenant that the lessee would pay all "rates, taxes, and assessments whatsoever which now are or during the said term shall be imposed or assessed upon the said premises or on the landlord or tenant in respect thereof by authority of Parliament or otherwise."

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The work was completed in January, 1897, notice of apportionment was given on the 2nd of January, 1902, and the demand for payment was made on the 3rd of May, 1902.

His Honour Judge Russell gave judgment for the plaintiff on the authority of Foulger v. Arding, 50 W. R. 417, [1902] 1 K. B. 700.

The defendant appealed.

J. S. Green, for the defendant.—The covenant in this case is identical with Baylis v. Jiggens, [1898] 2 Q. B. 315, 46 W. R. Dig. 87, and Channell, J., there held that the burden did not fall on the tenant. Further, the work in this case was done before the lease was entered into, and the case of Surtees v. Woodhouse, ante, p. 275, [1903] 1 K. B. 396, decides that the tenant is not liable for a charge on the premises, even though the final apportionment is not made till after the lease is entered into.

He also cited the following cases: In re Bettesworth v. Richer, 36 W. R. 544, 37 Ch. D. 535; Hurst v. Hurst, 4 Exch. 571; Farlow v. Stevenson, 48 W. R. 213, [1900] 1 Ch. 128; Hartley v. Hudson, 4 C. P. D. 367, 28 W. R. Dig. 419; Wilkinson v. Collyer, 32 W. R. 614, 13 Q. B. D. 1.

W. O. Hodges, for the plaintiff.—This is an assessment imposed upon the landlord in respect of the premises, and therefore falls within the covenant. As regards the second point, though the original lease was surrendered it was a continuous tenancy, and Surtees v. Woodhouse is accordingly distinguishable.

He cited Payne v. Burridge, 12 M. & W. 727; Thompson v. Lapworth, 16 W. R. 312, L. R. 3 C. P. 149.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The discussion of this case, which has been, of course, of very great assistance to us on both sides, has only brought out in strong relief the difficulty which I felt when I gave judgment in Foulger v. Arding, and which was expressed on the appeal in that case by the learned Master of the Rolls—namely, the difficulty of attempting to go through this maze of cases and endeavouring to lay down some distinct and definite rule which will reconcile them all; I believe it would be quite impossible to do so, and it certainly is high time that, either by a decision of the House of Lords or by legislation, there should be put an end to this tangle in which parties are placed by these various decisions.

But in this particular case we have to deal with an action brought upon a covenant which contains the words that the lessee will pay the rent "and will also pay the rates, taxes, and assessments whatsoever which now are or during the said term shall be imposed or assessed upon the said premises or on the landlord or tenant in respect thereof by authority of Parliament or otherwise." The particular charge in question is a paving expense under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, the work in respect of which had been done—some two years before the lease—in the year 1897, but the apportionment for which was not made until nearly three years afterwards. I endeavoured when I gave judgment in Foulger v. Arding to express my opinion. I thought you could possibly lay down some sort of general principle that you must find words which showed a contract by the tenant to take particular payments or particular duties and burdens upon his own shoulders, and that it was possible in some way of that kind to reconcile the various authorities. I therefore came to the conclusion that the word "impositions" was not sufficient in that case to put the burden upon the tenant. The Court of Appeal took a different view, which I can well understand, and no doubt I was wrong in the construction I put upon the word "impositions"; and of course the judgments of the Master of the Rolls and the other two Lord Justices in the Court of Appeal have, if not altogether removed, affected and impaired the weight of some of the arguments and reasons which were given in the earlier cases for declining to put the obligation on the tenant. As the Master of the Rolls has pointed out, the trend of the decisions has been gradually in favour of the landlord, and that such a case as Farlow v. Stevenson would, if decided at an earlier period, have been, in all probability, not decided in the same way. If, therefore, we could see that Foulger v. Arding had laid down some rule or principle which would impose the liability upon the tenant in this case, it would have been of assistance to us, and probably we might have been able in this and future cases to dispense with the task of going through any part of the maze of cases to which I have already referred. But, taken as an authority for this particular case, I do not think that Foulger v. Arding does afford us that guide. The words in Foulger v. Arding were "taxes, rates, including sewers, main drainage assessments, and impositions whatsoever which now are or which at any time or times hereafter during the continuance of the said term hereby granted may be taxed, rated, assessed, charged, or imposed upon," and the reasoning of the learned judges, practically speaking, proceeds upon the construction to be put upon the covenant in consequence of the presence there of the word "impositions," which may no doubt from some point of view be construed as being a wider word than "rates, taxes, or assessments," although if some of the earlier cases had been followed a wider meaning would not have been put on that word. That being so, we cannot protect ourselves under the decision of Foulger v. Arding by saying that the Court of Appeal has already put a construction upon the covenant now before us. There are not here these words which, in the opinion of the Court of Appeal, were wider words. We have here to deal with the words "taxes, rates, and assessments." I think the argument has shown that the only words that can be relied upon are "assessments imposed or assessed upon the premises or upon the landlord or tenant." Really one might almost say that there might be equally good reasons for giving the judgment one way or the other. If you take the view that any sum of money that is paid in respect of property is an assessment upon that property, then it would come within the words "assessments imposed." On the other hand, if you hold that "assessment" has a narrower meaning—and I think from some points of view it must be considered to have a narrower meaning than "payments" or "impositions" or "duties" or "charge"—you can give good reasons why it should not come within that. Under these circumstances I must say I am pressed with the fact that there are two, and it may be said from one point of view three, very great and weighty opinions which have taken the view that these words are not sufficiently wide to impose this upon the tenant. There is the opinion of Manisty, J., in Wilkinson v. Collyer, which, so far as the actual words "rates, taxes, and assessments" are concerned, is an opinion to the same effect, but does not go quite so far, because, as was pointed out by my brother Channell in Baylis v. Jiggens the covenant there was not so wide with reference to the person upon whom the rates, taxes, and assessments were imposed. Then there was the opinion of A. L. Smith, J., in Lyon v. Greenhow, 8 Times L. R. 457, where the words are certainly, so far as I can see, identical: "Rates, taxes, assessments imposed or assessed upon the premises or landlord or tenant in respect thereof by authority of Parliament." Then there is the opinion of my brother Channell in the case of Baylis v. Jiggens; and I must say that when we find that the Court of Appeal, in dealing with Foulger v. Arding, and having a great many of these cases before them, have themselves relied upon the further word "impositions" as imposing the liability, there is some ground for thinking that if the words had been merely such as occur in the cases I have referred to, the decision would probably have been different. I have accordingly come to the conclusion that we ought not, at any rate sitting here, to hold, in face of the opinions that have been expressed, that the words "rates, taxes, and assessments imposed or assessed" are sufficient within the meaning of the covenant to impose the liability upon the tenant to bear a paving expense in respect of which the work has been done, and has become a charge upon the premises before the commencement of the lease. I prefer to base my judgment on that ground, though I do not express any opinion hostile to Mr. Green's argument founded upon Surtees v. Woodhouse, but I prefer to base my judgment upon the ground that the words of the covenant do not impose the duty upon the tenant.

I can well understand the county court judge thinking that this case was governed by Foulger v. Arding. For a long time I myself thought that Foulger v. Arding went further than I now think it does, and for the reasons I have given I do not think it can be regarded as an authority to overrule the decisions I have referred to, and this appeal must therefore be allowed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. These words which are used in this lease, "rates, taxes, and assessments," have been used over and over again in leases which have received judicial construction for a number of years past, and the result of the authorities is well summed up in A. L. Smith, J.'s, judgment in Lyon v. Greenhow, where he says: "Though a great number of cases have been cited"—and he is dealing with the same words that I am dealing with—"there is not a single authority in which the tenant has been held to be liable whose lease contained words such as were in the present lease. Where the tenant was held liable there were words in excess of those found in this covenant." Then, having disposed of the authorities in that way, he expressed his opinion that the liability to pay for a drain, which was very much the same class of work as there is here, did not fall within the words "rates, taxes, or assessments."

I know that arguments may be advanced to show that this is an assessment, and if the mere fact that a sum of money has to be apportioned between some individuals who happen to occupy contiguous properties is enough to make it an assessment, of course it is; but I should think, used in this sense, "rates, taxes, and assessments" does not mean and was not intended to mean such a case as this. I agree with my lord it is best to base our judgment on this point. I confess that my own individual opinion is that the principle in Surtees v. Woodhouse for the purpose of construing covenants of this kind goes a good deal further, and very nearly, if not quite, covers this case; but that has not been thoroughly and fully argued, because we gave an intimation of our opinion that we should probably decide the case upon the other point and I therefore prefer to rest my judgment definitely upon the first point which has been argued.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree that we ought to decide this case in the way in which my lord and my brother Wills have stated, on the ground that, upon the authorities, words identical with those in this lease have in fact been construed as not imposing the liability upon the tenant; and that in all the cases in which the liability has been imposed there has been some larger word than is to be found in this covenant, either duties, charges, or impositions. One of those three has been found in every case, so far as I know, in which the liability has been put on the tenant. Under these circumstances I think we ought to allow this appeal. At the same time I have the greatest possible doubt about it. One of the cases in which that has been so decided was my own decision (Baylis v. Jiggens). I had very great doubt about that at the time. I have still greater doubt about it now, because a portion of the reasoning upon which I proceeded has certainly been destroyed by the subsequent case of Foulger v. Arding; but it is only a portion of the reasoning, and my judgment was justified in that case by something which I do not think I knew of at the time—viz., that the late Master of the Rolls had given a precisely identical decision, which I do not think was quoted to me. The matter really is extremely doubtful, and I quite agree with what my lord has said, that it is very desirable that, if possible, an end should be put to these questions. How to do it one does not quite know, because even if one of these cases were taken to the House of Lords, in all probability some draughtsman would put a new word into the covenant which the courts would have to deal with, and I hope that Parliament will not prevent parties contracting in such terms as they are advised. The real thing that ought to be done to prevent these difficulties is that tenants should take a little trouble about the preparation of their leases. In point of fact the tenant nearly always allows the landlord's solicitor to prepare the lease for the sake of expense, and he probably does not take much trouble to have it supervised on his own behalf, and then the lease contains words which are ultimately construed by the court to include some charge which no tenant in his senses would now deliberately agree to pay. The difficulties of the court might be removed if persons who were going to take leases would take a little more care about the preparation of them.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Ashley, Lumley, & Cooper.

Solicitors for the defendant, Gregson, Warham, Waugh, & Gregson.

---

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.)

March 26; April 24.

FARMER v. GLYN JONES. (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Medicines—Owner, proprietor, original or first vendor—Stamp Act, 1804 (44 Geo. 3, c 98), s. 2—Medicine Stamp Acts, 1802 (42 Geo. 3, c. 56), s. 3, and 1812 (52 Geo. 3, c. 150), s. 2, Schedule.

A chemist bought from a firm of wholesale chemists a well-known drug, called ammoniated tincture of quinine. He affixed to it a label stating that it was a well-known and highly recommended remedy for influenza.

Held, that he was not the "owner, proprietor, original or first vendor" of the medicine in question within the meaning of the schedule, 52 Geo. 3, c. 150, and that therefore he was not liable to stamp duty as having held out or recommended the medicine.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Case stated.

The facts of the case and the arguments fully appear from the judgment.

Sir E. Carson, S.G., and Rowlatt, for the appellant.

Asquith, K.C. (H. D. Bonsey and Galbraith with him), for the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 24.—WILLS, J., read the judgment of the court: The appellant is an officer of the Inland Revenue. The respondent is a registered chemist and druggist holding a license for the sale of medicines liable to duty under the Medicines Stamp Duty Acts. The respondent sold on the 8th of April, 1902, to an officer of the Inland Revenue, a bottle with a label affixed containing the following words: "Ammoniated tincture of quinine, B.P., a well-known and highly recommended remedy for influenza and colds." It had, however, no stamp. Proceedings were taken by the appellant against the respondent under 52 Geo. 3, c. 150, s. 2, for selling this bottle without a stamp. The magistrate dismissed the summons, being of opinion that no stamp was necessary. The appellant has prosecuted the present appeal by way of a case stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2, and 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 33, and the rules made under the latter Act. Section 2 of 52 Geo. 3, c. 150, provides that "if any person, whether licensed or not, shall either vend or expose to sale or offer or keep ready for sale, whether for foreign or home consumption, or buy or receive or keep for the purpose of selling by retail, either on his account or on the account or behalf of any other person, any packet, box, bottle, phial, or other enclosure containing any of the drugs, herbs, oils, waters, essences, tinctures, pills, powders, preparations, or compositions mentioned, and set forth in the schedule annexed to this Act, without a paper, cover, or label provided and supplied by the Commissioners of Stamps pursuant to 44 Geo. 3, c. 78, or to 42 Geo. 3, c. 56, and duly stamped for denoting the duty charged on such packet, box, bottle, &c., being properly and sufficiently pasted, stuck, fastened, or affixed thereto in such manner that such packet, box, &c., cannot be opened or the contents taken therefrom without tearing such stamped cover, wrap, or label, so as to prevent its being made use of again, the person so offending shall be liable to a penalty of ten pounds."

The schedule begins with a list of about 600 named powders, pills, essences, tinctures, lozenges, and preparations of every description, including foreign medicines of all kinds except drugs, and proceeds as follows: "And also all other pills, powders, lozenges, tinctures, &c., medicated herbs and waters, chemical and officinal preparations whatsoever to be used or applied externally or internally as medicines or medicaments for the prevention, cure, or relief of any disorder or complaint incident to or in anywise affecting the human body, made, prepared, uttered, vended, or exposed to sale by any person whatsoever, wherein (a) the person making or preparing the same vending or exposing to sale the same, hath or claims to have any occult secret or art for the making or preparing the same; or such person hath claims to have (b) any exclusive right or title to the making or preparing the same; or (c) which have at any time heretofore been, now are, or shall hereafter be prepared, uttered, or exposed to sale under the authority of any letters patent to the great seal; or (d) which have at any time heretofore been, now are, or shall hereafter be by any public notice or advertisement, or by any written or printed papers or handbills, or by any label or words written or printed, affixed to or delivered with any packet, box, bottle, &c., containing the same held out or recommended to the public, by the makers, vendors, or proprietors thereof as nostrums or proprietory medicines, or as specified for or as beneficial to the prevention, cure, or relief of any distemper, malady, ailment, disorder, or complaint incident to or in anywise affecting the human body." The schedule continues as follows: "Special exemptions," of which the first is "all drugs named in the book of rates referred to by the Acts of Tonnage and Poundage of 12 Car. 2, and in another book of rates referred to by the Act 2 Geo. 1, c. 11"; secondly, "all drugs uttered or vended entire without any mixture or composition with any other drug or ingredient whatsoever by any surgeon, apothecary, chemist, or druggist or other person duly qualified as therein specified"; thirdly—and this is the part of the exemptions more especially material in the present case—all mixtures, compositions, or preparations named or compounded with or prepared from any "medicinal drugs, medicated or chemical preparations, &c., bearing different denominations and having different properties, qualities, &c., which shall be uttered or vended by any such surgeon, apothecary, chemist, or druggist, or other such person as appointed, the different denominations, properties, &c., of which mixtures, &c., are known, admitted, and approved of in the preservation, cure, or relief of any disorder, malady, &c., affecting the human body, and wherein (a) the person mixing, compounding, preparing, uttering, or vending the same hath not nor claims to have any occult or secret art for the mixing or compounding the same, nor (b) hath no claims to have any exclusive right or title to the mixing, compounding, &c., of the same, and which mixtures, &c., have not been, are not, nor shall hereafter be, prepared, uttered, vended, or exposed to sale under the authority of any letters patent under the great seal, nor at any time heretofore have been, now are, or shall hereafter be, by any public notice, advertisement, or by any written or printed papers or handbills, or by any labels or words, written or printed papers fixed to or delivered with any such packet, box, bottle, &c., held out or recommended to the public by the owners, proprietors, makers, compounders, original or first vendors thereof as nostrums, &c., proprietary medicines, or as specified or as beneficial to the prevention, cure, or relief of any such distemper, malady, ailment, or complaint as aforesaid."

It is found in the case—(1) that ammoniated tincture of quinine is a mixture of medicinal drugs bearing different denominations and having different properties; (2) that the ammoniated tincture of quinine, the subject of the present inquiry, was prepared in accordance with the formula published in the British Pharmacopœia of 1898, and that the "B.P." upon the label was intended to indicate that it was so prepared; (3) that the denominations, properties, qualities, virtues, and efficacies of ammoniated tincture of quinine are known, admitted, and approved of in the prevention, cure, and relief of influenza and colds, and that influenza and colds are ailments affecting the human body; (4) that the respondent has not and does not claim to have any occult secret for, nor any exclusive right or title to, the mixing, composing, or vending of ammoniated tincture of quinine; (5) that it has not been nor is prepared or sold under the letters patent of the great seal; (6) that the respondent is not the originator of ammoniated tincture of quinine. It was first introduced as a medicine several years ago, and is in general use and on general sale by chemists throughout the country. The ammoniated tincture of quinine the sale of which gave rise to this case was bought by the respondent from wholesale chemists, who compounded it and who sold it without any such label as the respondent used, and without any recommendation of any kind. (7) Except that the label in question was affixed by the respondent, the owners, proprietors, makers, compounders, original or first vendors of ammoniated tincture of quinine never held it out or recommended it to the public by any public notice or advertisement, or by any written or printed papers or handbills, or by any label or words written or printed and affixed to or delivered with any packet, box, bottle, &c., containing the same as a nostrum or proprietary medicine, or as a specific, or as beneficial for the prevention, cure, or relief of any distemper, malady, ailment, or complaint incident to or in any wise affecting the human body, and the person aforesaid has not, nor claims to have, any more than the respondent himself, any occult secret or art for the mixing or compounding the tincture, nor any exclusive right or title to the mixing, compounding, preparing, or vending the same; nor was it ever prepared, uttered, vended, or exposed to sale under the authority of letters patent under the great seal.

Unless the respondent by affixing the label in question has brought himself within the description contained in the last portion of the "special exemptions" of the schedule to 52 Geo. 3, c. 150, and is the "owner, proprietor, maker, compounder, original or first vendor thereof," the tincture he has sold falls in every respect within the special exemption. The difficulty is to ascertain who are the persons meant in the "special exemption" by the "owners, proprietors, makers, compounders, original or first vendors thereof"—i.e., of the "mixtures, compositions, or preparations" to which the clause refers; for it is clear that such words as "makers, compounders" cannot refer to the immediate antecedent, which includes "bottle," "pot," and "phial," their application to which would be absurd. Great light seems to be thrown upon the question by the words "at any time heretofore have been, now are, or shall hereafter be . . . held out or recommended to the public" as beneficial for curative purposes. For it is plain that whoever the owner, proprietor, &c., may be, if he once issues an advertisement or affixes a label containing a recommendation of the preparation as of curative efficacy, the subject-matter of such advertisement or recommendation, or rather the bottle, &c., containing it, is affected with a perpetual liability to stamp duty. This consideration alone seems sufficient to show that a retail chemist who buys in the ordinary course of business an article which till it got into his hands was within the exemption, cannot be within the designation of the "owner, proprietor, &c," of the preparation. Indeed the Solicitor-General was driven to the argument that "owner, proprietor" referred to the last antecedent and meant owner, &c., of each particular bottle or phial sold. It has already been shown that this application of the phrase would make the passage absurd. It cannot be supposed that the maker of the glass bottle can by any act of his determine its liability or non-liability to duty when containing a substance which he could have no object in puffing, or which the owner of the bottle and the substance could prevent him from puffing if he were so minded. Thus far we have dealt only with the very words of the exemption itself.

It is desirable to go more deeply into the matter and see whether the view expressed is consistent with and borne out by the rest of the legislation on the subject. We may start with the Act 42 Geo. 3, c. 56, because that Act recited that the earlier Act (25 Geo. 3, c. 79) had been much evaded, and repealed not only the former duties, but all powers and authorities contained in that and any subsequent Act for levying and collecting the same. Section 2 of 42 Geo. 3, c. 56, granted ad valorem duties on every packet, box, bottle, &c. (using the same language in this respect as the Act of 53 Geo. 3) containing any drugs, herbs, pills, &c., or other preparation or composition, whatever to be used externally or internally as medicines or medicaments for the prevention, cure, or relief of any disorder affecting the human body. The duties were the same in amount as those now chargeable. Section 3 provided that the duties should be payable by the "owners and proprietors or makers and compounders or original and first vendors" of such drugs, &c., as aforesaid, and should be charged upon and paid in respect of every packet, box, bottle, &c., with any such contents as aforesaid before the same should be first sold or delivered out of the custody or possession of the owners, proprietors, makers, compounders, original or first vendors thereof for sale either wholesale or retail, either for foreign or home consumption or otherwise, and before the same should be in any way uttered, vended, or exposed for sale, or offered or kept ready for sale, and not in bulk, in any shop, house, or other place by any such owner, proprietor, &c., or any person on his behalf. This is still the law. The 4th and 5th sections closely resemble, if they are not identical with, those now appearing as "special exemption." It seems impossible to doubt that the owners, proprietors, &c, here (section 5) designated are the same persons as those mentioned in section 3 as the persons who are to pay the duties before they put the wares into circulation; and it surely must be for them to say whether or not they will, by advertising it as possessing curative properties, at once obtain the advantage of such advertisement, and subject the article at once and for all time to the disadvantage of having to pay duty.

Sections 8 and 10 of the same Act require persons making, compounding, preparing, uttering, vending, or exposing to sale or keeping ready for sale any drug or any packets, boxes, bottles, &c., with such contents as aforesaid, which are subject to the duties to take out licence and to procure from the Commissioner of Stamps covers, wrappers, or labels to be affixed to the packets, boxes, &c., in which the dutiable articles are sold. Section 19, in order to obviate doubts on the subject, provides that all articles enumerated in a schedule to the Act shall be dutiable, and all similar articles and also all preparations wherein the person preparing and selling the same has or claims a secret process or exclusive right, or articles prepared, &c., under letters patent, or which heretofore, are now, or shall be advertised in any way as a curative by the makers, vendors, or proprietors thereof, and the persons uttering or selling the same shall be charged with the duties imposed as licensees. It will be observed that this section, though giving an extensive application to substances or articles to be charged with the duty, makes no change as to the persons who are to pay the duties, and that the incidence, so far as relates to persons, is still regulated by section 3. The importance of this remark is emphasized by the fact that the section does enlarge the class of persons required to take out licences or give information to the commissioners under liability of a fine, thus obviously carrying out the idea that the duties were to be paid by the person who first put the article into circulation. The framework of these Acts was altered by the Act of 44 Geo. 3, c. 98, which repealed all the duties under the care of the Commissioner of Stamps, but granted new duties in lieu thereof and preserved the machinery for their incidence and collection. It brought together all such duties in two schedules, A and B, each of which is headed "Stamp

Duties." The duties now in question are in Schedule B, under the head "Medicines," and impose upon every packet, box, bottle, &c., containing any drugs, &c., or other preparation used or to be used externally or internally as medicines or medicaments, &c., uttered or vended in Great Britain, the same ad valorem duties as before, ending with a duty of £1 on every packet, box, or bottle, &c., which with its contents should exceed the value of 50s. It continues with a schedule of drugs within schedule B. Seeing that by section 3 the duties imposed by the Act are to be paid by the "owners, proprietors, makers, or compounders, or original or first vendors of the dutiable articles so that if they are once so advertised by the makers, vendors, or proprietors they become permanently affected with duty, it cannot be doubted that, notwithstanding the difference of language, the "makers, vendors, or proprietors" mean the same persons as those designated by the fuller phrase of "owners or proprietors or makers or compounders or original or first vendors of the drugs or preparations."

By the 43 Geo. 3, c. 73, the Act of 42 Geo. 3 was amended: By section 1, an amended and enlarged schedule (like the former schedule), only a list of specific preparations made by the Act specifically liable to duty was substituted for the former schedule. By section 2 it was provided that any person who should receive from any proprietor, original or first vendor (a phrase obviously meant to have the same scope as the longer phrase in section 3 of the first Act, 42 Geo. 3), or any agent of such person any article subject to duty for the purpose of selling again without the proper label affixed, and who shall not within ten days either return the article to the person from whom he received it or give information thereof to the commissioners, should be liable to a penalty.

Of some hundreds of specified articles and collections, first, all the previous general descriptions of dutiable articles, and then the exemptions under the title of "special exemptions," except in a few matters of description and arrangement of no assistance in construing the Acts, it is undistinguishable from the schedule to the amending Act of 52 Geo. 3, c 150, and it is only noticed as showing how and when the legislation imposing the duties took the form of a schedule embodying both incidence and exemptions.

The duties are still payable under section 3 of 42 Geo. 3 by the "owners or proprietors or makers and compounders or original or first vendors" of the preparations, the obligation of the retail dealer being, if he receives any dutiable article—and it will be dutiable, and dutiable for ever, if the original owner of the preparation has once advertised it as possessing remedial qualities—to return it to the vendor or to inform the commissioners. If, however, the article is compounded of drugs or chemicals as to which there is no secret either of denomination, quality, efficacy, or mode of manufacture; if it is in no sense a proprietary or patent medicine; if the person who originally introduced it to the public is not and no person has become the owner and proprietor, not of the bottle or box or jar in which the compound is sold, but of the mixture or compound itself, so that it is not the common property of all the world, and has never advertised it as a specific or as possessing remedial qualities, and if it is made up or sold by a duly qualified person, it is exempt from duty. In short, the description in section 3 of 54 Geo. 3 of the persons chargeable with the duty, that of persons recommending it by advertisement, label, or other like means as curative in the portion of the schedule of 52 Geo. 3 which affects it with duty, and the description of the person by whom it must have been so advertised if it is to escape duty contained in the "special exemptions," though in somewhat different words, all mean the same thing. The whole scheme of the Acts appears to be to strike with chargeability medicines imported from abroad and medicines which particular persons can make to the exclusion of others. Where a specific case affords any substantial recommendation and gives any value to the article, there is sure to be some person who can prevent other persons from using the same name for his compound. The same may be said of secret preparations, proprietary and patent medicines, and if the advertisement or public recommendation as a curative agent is to stamp the article with chargeability, it is reasonable to conclude that the makers, vendors, or proprietors, upon the fact of advertisement or recommendation by whom the future as well as the present chargeability is to depend, must be persons who can exercise a choice as to whether the article shall or shall not be put upon the market with accompaniments or accessories which will make it for ever afterwards liable to duty. The fact that the persons, the only persons, who are to pay the duties are those by whom the article shall be first sold, and that they are to pay the duties before the articles are first sold, points strongly in the same direction. We may add that, if we were to adopt the Solicitor-General's argument that the respondent must be considered the "first vendor thereof" because he was the first person to sell the mixture in a shape in which it could be taxable—that is, with a label recommending it—the result would be that the exemption could never take effect at all, for no case could come within it, except cases which the taxing enactment did not hit. The article sold by the respondent seems to us to have been sold by a person and under conditions which bring it within the "special exemptions," and this appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs.

Solicitor for the appellant, Solicitor to the Inland Revenue.

Solicitors for the respondent, Neve, Beck, & Kirby.

---

K. B. Div. (Bigham, J.) — Feb. 23, 24; April 1, 22.

CORNFOOT v. ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE CORPORATION. (a.)

Insurance, Marine—Policy—Duration of risk—Construction—"Thirty days in port after arrival."

A policy of marine insurance on a vessel was expressed to be for "a voyage from Portland, Oregon, by any route to Algoa Bay and for thirty days in port after arrival, however employed." The policy described the risk as running until the vessel "hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety." The words "twenty-four hours" were struck out and the words "as above" were written over them. The vessel arrived at Algoa Bay at 10 a.m. on the 2nd of August, 1902; was safely moored at anchor in the bay at 11.30 on the same day; and was totally lost at 4.30 p.m. on the 1st of September.

Held, that "thirty days" meant thirty consecutive periods of twenty-four hours, beginning at 11.30 a.m. on the 2nd of August, and not thirty calendar days, and that therefore the vessel was lost after the expiration of the time covered by the policy.

Action tried in Commercial Court before Bigham, J., sitting with a jury.

(a) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff, on behalf of himself and all others the owners of the vessel Inchcape Rock sued the defendants on a policy of insurance, which the latter had underwritten, as for a total loss.

The risk in the body of the policy was in writing and was as follows: "For a voyage from Portland, Oregon, by any route to Algoa Bay, and for thirty days in port after arrival, however employed."

The print of the policy was in the ordinary Lloyd's form and described the risk as running until the vessel "hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety." The words "twenty-four hours" were struck out and the words "as above" were written over them.

The vessel arrived in Algoa Bay at 10 a.m. on the 2nd of August, 1902; she was safely moored at anchor in the bay at 11.30 a.m. on the same day; and she was totally lost at 4.30 p.m. on the 1st of September.

Hamilton, K.C., and Leck, for the plaintiffs.—The question is whether the insurance extended beyond 4.30 p.m. on the 1st of September. The effect of the policy is that the ship was covered until the end of the thirtieth day after arrival in the bay, and that means until the expiration of thirty calendar days. The days ran from midnight next after the ship arrived, and the vessel therefore was covered during the whole of the 2nd of September. In law a day means a calendar day and not any period of twenty-four hours.

They referred to The Katy, 43 W. R. 290, [1895] P. 56.

Scrutton, K.C., and Loehnis, for the defendants.—The question is whether the ship was covered for thirty periods of twenty-four hours commencing at 11.30 a.m. on the 2nd of August, or for thirty calendar days. If the policy means thirty calendar days, the day on which the vessel arrived counts as one of them. If the time began to run from midnight, as the plaintiffs contend, then the ship was not covered between 11.30 a.m. and midnight on the 2nd of August.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 22.—BIGHAM, J., read the following judgment: In this case the defendants had underwritten the plaintiff's ship Inchcape Rock. The risk is described in the body of the policy in writing in the following words: "For a voyage from Portland, Oregon, by any route to Algoa Bay and for thirty days in port after arrival, however employed." The question I have to determine is whether at the time of the loss the thirty days here mentioned had run out; and the answer to the question depends upon the meaning to be attached to the word "days," whether it is to be taken to mean thirty consecutive periods of twenty-four hours or thirty calendar days. The print of the policy is in the ordinary Lloyd's form, which describes the risk as running until the vessel "hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety"; but the printed words "twenty-four hours" are struck through with a pen and the words "as above" are written over them, the effect being to incorporate at this point the earlier written words which I have just read. Thus the duration of the risk may be described as extending until thirty days after the vessel's arrival and safe mooring at anchor in the bay. The case was tried before me with a jury; and they found the following facts: (1) That the vessel arrived in Algoa Bay at 10 a.m. on the 2nd of August, 1902; (2) that she was safely moored at anchor in the bay at 11.30 a.m. on the same day; and (3) that she was totally lost at 4.30 p.m. on the 1st of September.

Thus it will be seen that if the thirty days are to be calculated as periods of twenty-four hours beginning at 11.30 a.m. on the 2nd of August the risk had run off at the time of the loss, otherwise if the thirty days are to be taken as meaning thirty clear calendar days. I do not suppose that there could be any doubt about the duration of the risk if the policy had been issued in its original printed form, unaltered and without the written words which I have read. The risk would have lasted until 11.30 a.m. on the 2nd of August, and from that moment until 11.30 a.m on the 3rd of August. It could not have been contended that the first of the twenty-four hours did not begin to run until noon on the 2nd of August, for the period of time from 11.30 to 12.30 is as much an hour as the period of time from noon to 1 p.m. Why should the expression "thirty days" be read in a different way? No doubt in some cases the word "day" means a period of twenty-four hours starting from midnight and ending at midnight. That is a calendar day—a Monday or a Tuesday. But did the parties to this contract use the word in that sense? I think clearly not. The risk was to be a continuing risk. It was not to stop at 11.30 on the morning of the 2nd of August and then to revive at midnight. It was to run continuously from 11.30 a.m. on the 2nd of August until the expiration of the thirty days, and no longer. To interpret the contract in the way contended for by the plaintiff would have the effect either of imposing on the defendants a longer risk than they bargained to undertake or of relieving them from liability during the hours from 11.30 a.m. on the 2nd of August until midnight. Neither party intended to make such a contract. It follows, therefore, that the thirty days mentioned in the policy must be taken to mean thirty consecutive periods of twenty-fours beginning at the time of the ship's safe mooring in the bay. After the jury had been discharged another point was taken on behalf of the plaintiff. It was said that the ship was not ready to discharge until 5 p.m. on the 2nd of August, and that, as upon the authorities a ship cannot be said to be safely moored unless and until she is ready to discharge, the time did not begin to run until 5 p.m. I am, however, quite satisfied, notwithstanding some of the vivâ voce evidence, that the ship was an arrived ship within the meaning of the policy by 11.30 a.m., and was then ready to discharge, and this was what the jury meant to find, and did find, in answer to my questions. There must be judgment for the defendants, with costs.

Judgment accordingly.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Botterell & Roche.

Solicitors for the defendants, Hollams, Sons, Coward, & Hawksley.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) May 5.

In re HALL.
FOSTER v. METCALFE. (a.)

Will—Contingent legacy—Appropriation.

When a testator gives a sum of cash as a contingent legacy without any provision for the payment of interest before the happening of the contingency, the executor is not entitled of his own authority, and to the possible detriment of the contingent legatee, to invest and appropriate a fund to meet that legacy; and if the fund so appropriated should, owing to depreciation of the security, be insufficient to answer the full amount of the legacy, if and when the legacy becomes payable, the legatee is entitled to have the deficiency made good, either out of the residuary estate or by the executor personally.

Decision of Kekewich, J., ante, p. 107, reversed.

Appeal from the decision of Kekewich, J. (reported ante, p. 107).

The facts were as follows:

By his will, dated the 26th of November, 1896, William Hall gave to each of his godchildren (by name) who should survive him, and who should attain the age of twenty-one years or marry under that age, a legacy of £1,000 free of legacy duty, but without any provision for the payment of interest in the meantime.

The testator died on the 14th of October, 1897.

Phyllis Chalmers, one of the godchildren named in the will, was, at the date of the testator's death, an infant and unmarried, but she had since attained twenty-one.

Two other godchildren were still infants and unmarried.

In 1899 the trustees of the will invested three several sums of £1,000 in the purchase of trustee securities to meet the three contingent legacies, and one of the securities, being £700 Great Eastern Railway Irredeemable 4 per cent. Stock, was appropriated by them to meet Miss Chalmers' legacy.

The stock in question depreciated in value, and when Miss Chalmers came of age she refused to accept the stock in satisfaction of her legacy. The surviving trustee thereupon took out a summons to determine the validity of the appropriation.

Kekewich, J., came to the conclusion that the appropriation was good, and ordered the legatee to pay the costs of all parties.

Miss Chalmers appealed

Buckmaster, K.C., and Baildon, for Miss Chalmers.—There is no power in the will enabling the executor to appropriate in this manner. The rule is quite clear and is in accordance with reason and justice—viz., an executor must not distribute the estate until he has set aside what will be amply sufficient to pay contingent legacies. If he fails to do this he must bear the consequences of his own imprudence. Fortunately in this case the executor need not bear the loss, for there is undisposed-of residue. The sum set aside to meet contingent legacies is part of the estate and not appropriated to the particular legatee.

They referred to Roper on Legacies (4th ed.), 931; Webber v. Webber, 1 Sim. & St. 311; Allhusen v. Whittell, L. R. 4 Eq. 295, 15 W. R. Ch. Dig. 122; and Seton, 1679, 1690.

Warrington, K.C., and Northcote, for beneficiaries.—An appropriation having been made, the contingent legatee must bear the loss or take the profits. [ROMER, L.J.—You are maintaining that the executor has turned himself into a trustee, which he had no power to do.]

They referred to Burgess v. Robinson, 3 Mer. 8; Rock v. Hardman, 4 Madd. 253; Green v. Pigott, 1 Bro. Ch. C. 103. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred to Sitwell v. Bernard, 6 Ves. 520.]

They also cited Lewin on Trusts (10th ed.), p. 687, and In re Waters, [1889] W. N. 39.

Clauson, for the infant beneficiaries.

Crossfield, for the executor.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I do not think that in this case the order of the learned judge can be supported. The question is whether the trustees of the will had any right to make such an appropriation as they have made without the consent of the legatee, and having made it had then the right to say that the loss arising from the depreciation of the stock appropriated must be borne by the legatee. I am of opinion that it is not true to say that they could make such an appropriation and then throw the loss upon the legatee. The question really in each case is this. When an investment is made, which it is desired to appropriate to a particular object, whose property is the sum so invested? Does it become the property of the legatee? Or does it remain a portion of the estate? In my judgment, if you ask that question in the present case, where the legacy was contingent and the legatee was to take the legacy without interest in the meanwhile, the answer is that the sum invested did not become the property of the legatee but remained a part of the estate. There was no such appropriation here as could have caused the legatee to bear the loss or entitle her to take the profits arising on the appropriation. The interest on this investment became a part of the estate of the testator, and, in the event of not being wanted to satisfy the debts or obligations of the testator, would go to the estate of the residuary legatee. There has been some confusion during the argument between a legacy payable in futuro and a contingent legacy. If you have got a vested legacy which will certainly be payable in futuro, the legatee has an absolute right to go to the trustee and say, "Although my legacy, is payable in futuro, it is vested, and I require you to invest the amount of the legacy." When this is done, that fund is really appropriated, and the gain or loss falls on the legatee. This is what Lord Hardwicke meant when he said, in the case of Johnson v. Mills, [1749] 1 Ves. Sen. 282, "I thought nothing was better settled than what is now endeavoured to be made a question: that wherever a demand was made out of assets, certainly due but payable at a future time, the person entitled thereto might come against the executor, to have it secured for his benefit, and set apart in the meantime."

But this has no application to the case where not only the legacy is contingent, but the interest in the meantime does not go to such legatee, but remains part of the estate. In the present case the contingent legatee does not take the interest in the meantime, and I have not heard any authority leading to the conclusion that the executors had any other right than to retain, as prudent executors and as part of the estate, a sufficient sum to answer this legacy, should it become necessary to do so by the happening of the contingency. I do not know that it is necessary to say any more. An executor is not entitled at his own will to take any portion of the estate and turn it into a trust fund, with the contingent legatee as cestui que trust. It could no doubt be done if the court thought fit to make an order to that effect, but as to that I will say nothing at all. All I say here is that the executors under the will had no power to make this appropriation, and the loss in value cannot fall upon the legatee.

(a.) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. If executors have to provide for a vested legacy, and there is no one who can give a receipt for it, undoubtedly both the executors and the court have power to set apart a sum of money and properly invest it to meet the legacy. Further, if you find that a legacy is settled upon trust, the same course would apply. And even if you find a contingent legacy and a direction in the will that the income to arise therefrom is to go to the legatee before the contingency happens and the legacy becomes payable, then you may properly infer an intention on the part of the testator that a fund should be set aside to answer it. Again, even if you have the case of a purely contingent legacy and no provision as to the application of income in the meantime, that mere fact does not paralyze the administration of the estate. It does not prevent the executors or the court parting with the residuary estate after taking reasonable care to provide for the contingency. It is also possible that if in a similar case an executor without going to the court could prove that he had acted in a thoroughly reasonable manner, and had, before distributing the residue, set aside such a sum as would in all reasonable probability satisfy the legacy, he would not be held personally liable if subsequently it turned out that the sum set apart was not sufficient to answer the contingent legacy. But such a setting apart would be a setting apart of a fund, not as the legacy, but to answer it, and the income of the fund so set apart would be payable as part of the residue, for, as I have pointed out, the sum set apart is still part of the estate. But it appears to me that there is no authority in the court and the executor, and certainly none in the executor unaided, which would justify dealing with the fund as if it were a separate settled fund to be held on trust to invest, and, so far as regards income to be paid to the residuary legatee until the contingency happens, and, subject to that, for the contingent legatee if the legacy becomes payable, and otherwise over. The testator has not indicated, nor has the court power to infer, such a trust. There is an inconvenience, and it may be that there are several; but it is sufficient to say that the court has no jurisdiction to create such a trust. There is always this dilemma, that if the fund is set apart as on a special trust there is no jurisdiction, and, if it is not so set apart, in what way does the income go to the residuary legatee except on the footing that the fund still remains part of the general estate? In the case before us the legacy is clearly contingent, and there is not a word in the will as to the income before the legacy becomes payable. It is clear that the executor had no power to set apart a fund as he purported to do and invest it and hold it on trust. The fund was not set apart solely for the contingent legatee, but was really held upon trust, and, in my opinion, there was no power for the executor to turn himself into a trustee or hold the fund in any way to the prejudice of the legatee. For these considerations the appeal must succeed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot approve of the judgment of the learned judge either on principle or authority. The fund invested never ceased to be part of the general estate, to the income of which the residuary legatee was entitled. When there is a contingent legacy of a sum of cash, and no direction either express or implied as to investment, the legatee, I think, cannot require the sum to be appropriated.

I may refer to King v. Malcote, 9 Hare 692, at p. 696, where Turner, V.C., says: "A contingent legacy is separated from the assets, or secured, because it is a sum which in any event is certainly payable to some person, though it may be uncertain to whom it will become payable. But a contingent debt is a sum which it is altogether doubtful whether it will ever be taken out of the assets. Even in the case of a contingent legacy, the legatee is not, as it was assumed at the bar, entitled to have a sum actually retained or appropriated to answer the legacy when the contingency arises. That is not an unusual way of providing for the legacy, but it is a matter of arrangement, not of right, and in strictness the legatee is only entitled to have security for the payment of the sum should the contingency arise." If the legatee is not entitled to have the sum set aside, it would be strange if the executor without the sanction of the court had the right to make an appropriation which might be detrimental to the legatee. It seems to me that what has been done here has really been to create a settlement of £1,000 on the contingent legatee until twenty-one years of age and then over. And for that I can find no authority, and there is no principle upon which it can be supported. I think, therefore, that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Edgar, Robins, & Clarke; Collyer-Bristow, & Co., for Watson Sons, & Carrick, Hull; J. A. Bartrum.

---

From K. B. Div.
(Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L JJ.) April 7.

ANGEL v. MERCHANTS' MARINE INSURANCE CO. (a.)

Insurance (marine)—Loss—Constructive total loss—Taking value of wreck into account.

Where a vessel has been stranded by a peril insured against, in estimating whether or not she is a constructive total loss, the value of the wreck is not an element which ought to be taken into consideration.

Appeal from a judgment of Bigham, J.

The action was brought by a shipowner upon two policies of marine insurance. The first was a policy dated the 2nd of August, 1900, issued by the defendants for £1,000 upon the hull and machinery of the steamship Phillis Angel, valued at £23,000, for twelve months from the 27th of July, 1900; and the second was a policy of the same date issued by the defendants for £1,000 upon disbursements in the said steamship for twelve months from the 28th of July, 1900.

Bigham, J., gave judgment in favour of the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

Carver, K.C., Lochnis, and Lewis Noad, for the appellant.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Maurice Hill, for the respondents.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the judgments.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 7.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read the following judgment: This is an appeal from the judgment of Bigham, J., in favour of the defendants in an action claiming as for a constructive total loss on a policy on ship. The ship was wrecked on the coast of Sicily, being driven on the rocks. There was from the first the hope that the ship might be got off, but the plaintiff (the shipowner) gave a notice of abandonment to the underwriters, which they did not accept. The ship was floated and brought to Malta by the operations of the salvage association acting for the benefit of all concerned on the terms that they were to receive nothing unless the ship was salved. The cost of these operations was afterwards assessed at £3,500. The ship was to a certain extent repaired at Malta with a view to her proceeding under steam to Cardiff for permanent repairs. The underwriters agreed with the master for the navigation by the ship's crew of the ship when repaired from Malta to Cardiff for a sum of £1,400. The repairs somehow or other, although certified by surveyors to be sufficient, broke down almost immediately after leaving Malta; the fact being that it was only possible to get repairs of a very temporary nature done at Malta. The ship was nearly lost, but succeeded in getting into Tunis. She was again temporarily repaired there, but was not allowed to proceed to England under her own steam, and was towed to Cardiff. Estimates were obtained at Barry for the repair of the ship, but she was not actually repaired before the trial before Bigham, J. Bigham, J., arrived at the conclusion that £22,559, less some £200 which the shipowner admitted he could not support, was the proper amount to fix as the cost of repairs. The repaired value of the ship the learned judge took as £23,000, which by the terms of the policy was to be taken as the repaired value in ascertaining whether the vessel was a constructive total loss. Bigham, J., in estimating the cost of repairs, did not add anything for the expenses incurred by reason of the accident which compelled the ship to put into Tunis. This accident he attributed to the perils of the sea, and thought that the temporarily repaired ship could have been insured for the voyage to England for a premium of £150; and it was for this reason that he included nothing in the expenses of repairs for expenses incurred by reason of the accident, and only included the insurance premium. Bigham, J., deducted from the plaintiff's estimate of repairs certain items to which objection was taken by Mr. Griggs, the expert witness called on behalf of the defendants. As to several of these items, I am not sure that I should not have arrived at a different conclusion in fact. I do not, however, think that we ought to review the decision of the learned judge, arrived at after a five days' trial, on matters which in a sense are all questions of fact, for I treat estimates based on facts as matters of fact. A different finding on some of these objections by the underwriters would have been sufficient to make the expenses exceed the repaired value. I accept, however, as I have already said, the findings of the learned judge; and I only mention the dispute on these points to show how little the figures relied on as constituting the items of the cost of repairs or the total arrived at thereby can be relied on as factors in a mere arithmetical conclusion, especially in a case in which the learned judge thought, to use his own expression, that it was a very close thing, and so very near a constructive total loss that the underwriters might very well have paid it. The shipowner gave his notice of abandonment immediately after the marine accident. Precise estimates, are, of course, impossible, and it seems to me that unless the insured shipowner is to take upon himself risks which ought not to be borne by him (such as the risk whether the ship will be got afloat at all, or, having been got afloat, will arrive at a port for temporary repairs, and ultimately at home for permanent repairs) a large margin ought to be added to the figures of cost of repairs to cover risks of this sort—risks which a "prudent uninsured owner" could certainly take into consideration in determining whether he should repair or sell. There is, however, another consideration which it is suggested the "prudent uninsured owner" would certainly in fact have regarded in determining whether he should repair—I mean the damaged value of the ship; that is, the price which could be got for her as she lay unrepaired, which was, it was said, about £7,000. But, unfortunately, this part of the case was not very thoroughly gone into. The plaintiff in the earlier part of the trial seems to have been content to rely upon the estimates of cost of repairs exceeding the £23,000. Then, when it seemed likely that the deductions made by the judge would reduce the repairs below the £23,000, the claim to add the value of the damaged vessel was put forward and discussed, the judge, however, saying that there was no real evidence of the value. It seems unsatisfactory to have to discuss an important question of marine insurance law in a case in which the facts, perhaps, do not raise the question at all. I do not think that it could be or was denied that the value of the damaged ship must be included in the calculation, if the ship had, in fact, been sold where she was and as she was, and the question, after sale, had been whether the circumstances justified abandonment. But it is said that this item of calculation must be disregarded if there is no such sale. Now in my judgment the "prudent uninsured owner" test was already accepted as the proper test at least down to 1873. The recognition of the test in Irving v. Manning, 1 H. L. Cas. 287, and in Rankin v. Potter, 22 W. R. 1, L. R. 6 H. L. 83, puts the matter, to my mind, beyond argument. Nor do I think that it is possible to say that Moss v. Smith, 9 C. B. 94, which was cited in Rankin v. Potter, had then been recognized as substituting for the "prudent uninsured owner" test an arithmetical test turning on the difference between estimated totals. The prudent uninsured owner test was, I think, adopted for the very purpose of covering considerations which cannot be embodied in the figures of an arithmetical calculation. I wish to observe that in Moss v. Smith there was no approximation of the cost of repairs and repaired value, and that the alleged misdirection was a misdirection with regard to the freight (which was separately insured), inasmuch as the Chief Justice, it was said, omitted to tell the jury that, in determining whether or not there was a total loss of freight, they were to throw out of consideration the value of the ship and to consider only whether a prudent owner, acting with a view to earning freight, would have executed the necessary repairs either wholly or in part. The court held that there was no misdirection, and it is with reference to this that Maule, J., made the observations which are relied upon as either substituting the "arithmetical" for the "prudent owner" test, or for limiting the measure in applying the prudent owner test to a contrast of the figures of cost of repairs and repaired value. There can be no doubt, to my mind, but that Baron Bramwell and Baron Martin, in delivering their opinions in Rankin v. Potter, both recognized the value of the damaged ship as an item which was to be taken into consideration in the application of the "prudent uninsured owner" test; and, more than that, recognized the value of the damaged ship as an item going to make up the total of the figures to be contrasted with repaired value. This view has been applied by Phillimore, J., in Beaver Line v. London and Provincial Marine and General Insurance Co., 5 Com. Cas. 269, and by Walton, J., in Wild Rose Steamship Co. v. Jupe, 19 Times L. R. 289. It is to be observed that in Rankin v. Potter the item of value of the damaged ship was essential to the conclusion that there was a constructive total loss. You cannot get the required result without it. It is further to be noted that in Rankin v. Potter the ship was not in fact sold. It seems to me that, perhaps, the authorities could be reconciled if one took the rule to be that the shipowner could only take into consideration the value of the damaged ship if the cost of repairs approximated to the repaired value. If the damage to the ship by the perils of the sea is so extensive that it is clear that the cost of repairs will approximate to the repaired value, it would not be reasonably practicable to repair her if a substantial sum could be obtained for her as she is and where she is, seeing that the expense of repairs would be such that, under the circumstances, no man of common sense would incur the outlay. Such a ship, as a matter of business, is totally lost. Take, however, the case where the damage is slight. The cost of repairs is small relatively to the value of the ship. The shipowner, as a matter of business, would not take into consideration the necessarily high value of the slightly damaged ship unless, instead of desiring to minimize the loss incurred by the perils of the sea, he regarded the marine accident as affording a market enabling him to sell his ship at a profit. In my judgment, a case in which the costs of repairs and the value of the ship so nearly approximate as they do in the present case, would be just a case in which the "prudent owner" test would apply, and, as I have suggested, would do justice, which the mere comparison of figures would fail to do. But there is no case which has recognized this modification in the application of the prudent owner test, and one hesitates to introduce such a modification in the rules of law governing so widely extended a business as that of marine insurance under British law, although the application of the prudent owner test, as understood by Baron Bramwell and Baron Martin in their opinions in Rankin v. Potter, and also by Lord Abinger in Young v. Turing, 2 Man. & Gr. 593, might lead to the result pointed out by the editors of the last (the seventh) edition of Arnould on Marine Insurance, s. 1124—Mr. de Hart and Mr. Ralph Simey—following a suggestion by Mr. McArthur in his work on marine insurance. The note in the last edition of Arnould runs thus: "e.g., suppose a vessel comes into port requiring repairs costing £1,000—her damaged value being £10,000, and her repaired value £10,500. This, according to the argument derived from Young v. Turing, would be a case of constructive total loss. But it is submitted that it is absurd to say a vessel is a total loss, whether constructively or otherwise, which is only damaged to the extent of 10 per cent. or less." The contention seems to be that the old test of a "prudent uninsured owner" was adopted at a time when there was no telegraph and the means of communication were difficult and at a time when there was no salvage association ready to step in to salve the ship and take charge of her until she could reach a port where permanent repairs could be effectively executed, and where, therefore, the cost of the repairs could be measured either by the actual execution of the work or by reliable estimates obtained on invitations to tender. It is said that at the time of the adoption of the "prudent owner" test, the master, through difficulty of communication and inability to secure with any certainty means of repair, was in practice apt to consider seriously the question whether he should sell the materials of the ship, or the ship as she lay, rather than make the attempt to repair. But it is said that nowadays such a case rarely arises, and that when it does the old test can be applied; but that now the conveniences of modern times, telegraphic communication, the salvage associations, and Lloyd's agents everywhere, throw on the master but rarely the old alternative, repair or sell; and that in modern times the shipowner ought to guide his conduct as an insured owner desirous to have regard to the interests of all concerned, and that the damaged ship ought, whenever it is possible, to be taken to the port where permanent repairs can be effected, and the arithmetical test applied with something like precision. Such a rule seems to me too favourable to the underwriter. I think that this contention is open to the criticism that the shipowner at the moment of election, when he has to exercise the option of giving notice of abandonment, has really no precise data upon which to act, and that there must always be a quantity of items, especially the cost of the temporary repairs and the getting of the ship to the ports of temporary and permanent repair, as there were in the present case, which do not admit of precision. I doubt whether under the absolute arithmetical test the underwriter really takes upon himself the whole of the risks of the perils of the sea. I think it was a doubt of this sort which made lawyers of the United States of America adopt the 50 per cent. rule. The final result in this appeal, I think, must be that the judgment of Bigham, J., must be affirmed; first, because I doubt whether in any case we ought to reverse the decision of Bigham, J., on this question of marine insurance law, having regard to the state of the evidence as to the value of the damaged ship, the manner in which the point was taken at the end of the trial, and the mode in which it was disposed of by the learned judge, and I am not prepared to do so. Secondly, even though my opinion were stronger than it is, I should not like to differ from my brethren on a point which does not properly arise on the evidence. I therefore do not differ from the judgment of my brethren, that the judgment of Bigham, J., must be affirmed.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree that in this case we ought to accept the conclusion of fact of Bigham, J. It is therefore to be taken that the value of the ship when repaired exceeded the expense of repairs by a sum of about £700 or £750. The learned judge arrived at a smaller figure, but I understand it to have been conceded in argument that some consequential corrections which would have been the result of his determination would have brought it to the figure I have mentioned. It is then contended that the loss ought nevertheless to be treated as a constructive total loss, because the value of the ship as she lay on the rocks exceeded that sum, so that a prudent uninsured shipowner would have sold her rather than repaired her. Bigham, J., rejected this contention, saying that there had not been adduced any evidence as to that value on which he could act. Now the evidence stood thus: No one was called on behalf of the plaintiff to show what the value of the ship was at the time. Naturally none of the plaintiff's witnesses were cross-examined on the subject, nor has there been any evidence of these matters adduced by the defendants. In truth the plaintiff seems to have launched his case in the expectation that he would be able to satisfy the judge that the cost of repairs would exceed the value of the ship when repaired, and it was only when he failed in satisfying the judge on that point that he fell back on this question of the value of the ship, and he now seeks to establish the amount from expressions which occur in the correspondence and in the light of subsequent events. I think there is much to be said in favour of Bigham, J.'s, view. I think mere estimates of value not made at the time ought, in a case of this kind, to be closely scrutinized by the court, and I hesitate to rely on inference with respect to a matter in which direct evidence can be given. I do not think, therefore, that it would be right to overrule Bigham, J.'s, decision, and this would be sufficient to dispose of the case, so far as I am concerned. But a question of law has been argued, and unfortunately on it different views seem to be entertained by my brethren, and it may be right, therefore, that I should express the opinion that I have formed.

The case of Young v. Turing, 2 Man. & G. 593, was decided in the year 1841 in the Exchequer Chamber, and Lord Abinger, in giving the judgment of the court, says at p. 601: "The Chief Justice has laid down the usual and recognized rule, that the jury ought to consider whether, under all the circumstances attending the ship, a prudent owner, if uninsured, would have repaired the vessel." Then he says: "Now, to the value of the repairs must be added her value as she lay in the dock." It is upon that observation that the argument in this case is founded. It is to be observed it is a mere dictum; it was not necessary for the decision of the case, and, so far as appears from the report, did not form the subject of argument before the court.

Now, in 1847 there was decided the case of Irving v. Manning, in the House of Lords, and Patteson, J., who delivered the opinion of the learned judges who advised the House, says: "The course has been in all cases in modern times to consider the loss as total where a prudent owner, uninsured, would not have repaired." And again at a later point he says: "The established mode of putting the question, when it is alleged that there has been what is perhaps improperly called a constructive total loss of a ship, is to consider the policy altogether out of the question, and to inquire what a prudent uninsured owner would have done in the state in which the vessel was placed by the perils insured against. If he would not have repaired the vessel it is deemed to be lost." In 1850 the case was decided of Moss v. Smith, 9 C. B. 94, in which the question was very much considered, and judgments were given which are constantly referred to in subsequent cases. Maule, J., says at p. 103: "If a ship sustains such extensive damage that it would not be reasonably practicable to repair her—seeing that the expense of repairs would be such that no man of commonsense would incur the outlay—the ship is said to be totally lost. It is in that way alone that the question as to what a prudent owner would do arises. However damaged the ship may be, if it be practicable to repair her, so as to enable her to complete the adventure she is not totally lost. The ordinary measure of prudence which the courts have adopted is this—if the ship, when repaired, will not be worth the sum which it would be necessary to expend upon her, the repairs are, practically speaking, impossible, and it is a case of total loss." Wilde, C.J., at p. 108, says this: "The underwriter undertakes to indemnify the owner against a loss of freight by perils of the sea. The law has fixed the meaning of this warranty against sea damage in such distinct terms that for many years every contract of insurance has been made with reference to the known and recognized principle that a ship is prevented from performing her voyage, and consequently from earning freight, when she has sustained damage which can only be repaired at an expense which no prudent owner uninsured would incur; and that is when the outlay will exceed that which he will get by it—viz., when the ship, after the repairs are executed, will not be worth the sum which has been expended upon her." Now it seems to me that in that case the court defined, as Maule, J., points out, the standard—the measure of prudence—which the courts have adopted with reference to such a case.

In the year 1853 there was published the third edition of Phillips on Insurance, and at section 1534 the learned author states the law thus: "In English jurisprudence the right to make an abandonment of the ship is governed by the rule just stated—namely, that the right to abandon on account of the damage and expense merely accrues where, and only where, the ship when recovered or repaired will not be worth the expense necessarily to be incurred for the purpose of recovering or repairing it." Then he adds: "This rule has reference to a case in which the amount merely determines the character of the loss. Other circumstances may come into consideration in determining the loss to be partial or total."

I do not propose to go in any detail through the subsequent cases, but it appears to me that, notwithstanding the observations of Baron Bramwell and Baron Martin in advising the House of Lords in Rankin v. Potter, to which my lord has referred, the weight of authority is in favour of the view which is based on the decision in Moss v. Smith, and which is expressed in the language which I have just cited from Phillips on Insurance.

I should like, however, to refer particularly to the case of Aitchison v. Lohre, 28 W. R. 1, 4 App. Cas. 755, where the question of whether or no there was a constructive total loss was discussed by the House of Lords. Lord Blackburn deals with the point (4 App. Cas., at p. 761) where he says: "I think it convenient to pause here and inquire what would have been the loss to an uninsured owner from the perils of the seas under such circumstances. If such an uninsured owner chose to sell the hull as it lay, his position would be this," and he goes through a calculation by which he arrives at a loss, amounting to £2,521, and then he says: "And if the hull had been so damaged that to repair it would have cost more than the ship would, when repaired, have been worth, the prudent shipowner would have taken this course. But in fact he not only could, but did, repair it." Then he goes into a second calculation, in which he ascertains the loss, having reference to the repairs and expenditure necessary for the purpose of repairing, and the value of the ship when repaired, and he arrives at an amount of loss which is smaller than that which he ascertained would have been suffered if a sale had been made. As I understand the figures, the result would have been the same, whether the value of the vessel as the ship lay is taken into consideration or not, and therefore it appears to me not to be a decision which guides us in the present case. But the way in which the learned lord lays down the law in a subsequent passage appears to me to agree with that which was contended for by the defendants in the present case. He says (4 App. Cas.) at p. 762: "The owner of an insured ship which is so damaged that, though it is capable of repair, the expense of repairing it will exceed its value, may treat the ship as totally lost, and recover a total loss, the underwriters who pay that total loss being entitled to all that is saved. The assured is not, even then, bound to do so. But if the ship can be practically repaired within the meaning of that phrase, as explained by Maule, J., in Moss v. Smith, the assured has not the option to treat it as a total loss; and on the figures stated in the special case the respondent here had not that option." It appears to me that the learned lord there adopts the mode of stating the case which is laid down in the judgments of Moss v. Smith, and the law is laid down in the same manner, as it seems to me, by Lord Watson in a subsequent case in the House of Lords of Sailing Ship Blairmore Co. v. Macredie, [1898] A. C. 593.

For these reasons I have arrived at the conclusion which I have stated. I only wish to add this, that I do not say that evidence of value in such cases as these can be entirely excluded, and therefore I do not differ from Phillimore, J., and Walton J., in what they did in the cases before them, because their decisions were only on the admissibility of evidence. It may be that evidence of the value of the ship as a wreck might be material in ascertaining the question of fact whether or no there was or was not a total loss.

I agree, therefore, with the judgment which has been given.

MATHEW, L.J., read the following judgment: The plaintiff sought to establish his right to abandon to the underwriters by evidence that the cost of the repairs of the ship would exceed the repaired value. Bigham, J., decided that the plaintiff had failed and that there was no constructive total loss. It has not been easy to follow the steps of the learned judge, through a mass of evidence and argument submitted to him in the course of a trial that lasted over five days. The vessel was insured by a time policy for £23,000, and by the terms of the policy the insured value of the ship was to be taken as the repaired value in ascertaining whether the vessel was a constructive total loss. The vessel, while covered by the policy, was cast ashore on the coast of Sicily, and upon news of the disaster the assured gave a notice of abandonment which the underwriters declined to accept. With the consent of all concerned salvage operations were undertaken by the salvage association, and the ship was floated and brought to Malta at a cost of £3,500. In her damaged condition she was worth about £7,000. Under the superintendence of surveyors, who represented the plaintiff and the underwriters, temporary repairs to enable the vessel to be brought home were done at a cost of about £550. The learned judge has found that the repairs were properly done. The underwriters had provided a sum of £1,475 to cover the expenses of the voyage home. This sum, added to the value of the damaged ship, could be insured from Malta to a home port for £150. The vessel sailed from Malta, but in a few hours, as it would seem from some peril of the sea, her steering gear gave way and she was obliged to put into Tunis. Further repairs were found to be necessary, which were done at a cost of £218. A tug was sent out from England to bring the vessel home at a cost of £750. She was brought safely to Barry, and a tender was obtained to cover all necessary repairs. These sums of £218 and £750 would be covered by the insurance from Malta to a home port, and were held by the learned judge not to be charges which the owner would have had to meet. At the trial accounts were put in which had been prepared to show the plaintiff's estimates of the costs of reinstating the ship. The total amounted to the very large sum of £26,222. These figures were reduced by the learned judge to £22,559. In the discussion before us the items allowed on the one hand and struck out on the other were objected to, and we were asked to review the decision of Bigham, J., as to the cost of repairs. But I see no reason to differ from the conclusion that £22,559 was a proper estimate of the outlay necessary to reinstate the ship.

But it was contended for the plaintiff that, upon the assumption that the entire cost of repairs did not exceed the sum of £22,559, the plaintiff was nevertheless entitled to treat the loss as total. It was argued that the question to be determined was whether or not a prudent uninsured owner would abandon the venture and sell the wreck as she lay on the rocks. In arriving at a conclusion on this subject, the owner, it was said, would take into account the value of the damaged vessel, and would certainly sell rather than repair. I am unable to agree with this reasoning. The solution of the question whether there is a constructive total loss may sometimes be helped by considering what a prudent owner would do, where, for instance, a stranded vessel is immediately sold on the ground that salvage operations were difficult, and the result uncertain. But it seems to me in such a case as the present, where the actual costs of repairs have been ascertained and are not a matter of estimate, the matter cannot be dealt with on that footing. The question is not what an owner would consider the course most advantageous to himself. What has to be determined is to what extent the ship has been damaged by the perils insured against, and thus to settle whether the loss is partial or total. It is total if the prosecution of the voyage has become commercially impracticable. In recent times, with the readier means of communication open to underwriters, the condition of a stranded ship is rarely left to mere speculation. When notice of abandonment has been given the skilled agents of the underwriters are enabled to visit the vessel, and they can generally form a sound judgment as to whether the ship can be saved. Where there is a fair prospect of reinstatement, salvage operations are undertaken on behalf of the insurers without requiring the owner to incur any expense. In this case the usual course was followed. The salvage operations succeeded, and the underwriters satisfied the learned judge that the loss was partial and not total. They arrived at this result by showing that the cost of rendering the ship as serviceable as she was when insured was less than the repaired value. The argument that the real question was what an imaginary owner would do when his vessel was still on the rocks seems to me not to be open to the plaintiff. Any such general principle would seriously prejudice underwriters, and might impose upon them losses which were not due to the perils insured against. The test applicable here is that sanctioned in the many decisions referred to by counsel for the underwriters from Moss v. Smith, to Sailing Ship Blairmore Co. v. Macredie. The rule seems to me to have been properly applied by Bigham, J.

But it was further urged for the plaintiff that, in determining the question of the right to abandon, the value of the damaged ship should be added to the cost of repairs, and with this addition the valuation fixed by the policy would be largely exceeded. The application of this supposed mode of calculation would seem to involve unreasonable results, for, in adjusting the amount the assured could recover under his policy, what is saved from the perils insured against is treated as having been lost. The authority relied upon by the plaintiff's counsel was a dictum of Lord Abinger in his judgment in Young v. Turing. It was admitted that the point had not been dealt with in that case, either at nisi prius or in the Court of Common Pleas, and the observation of the Chief Baron was not necessary for the decision of the court. Further, that with the exception of the recent judgments at nisi prius referred to in the argument, the authority of Young v. Turing upon this point had not been judicially approved. It is noticeable that at the trial no evidence was offered to show that average adjusters acted upon any such rule. The subject is discussed unfavourably to the plaintiff's contention in 2 Phillips on Insurance, s. 1534; Carver's Carriage by Sea (3rd ed.), s. 303; and 2 Arnould on Marine Insurance (7th ed.), s. 1124. I am of opinion that the plaintiff's contention fails, and that in determining whether the ship can be repaired the assured is not entitled to add the damaged value of the ship to the cost of repairs. [His lordship then dealt with another point not material to the main question, and concluded by saying that the judgment should be affirmed.]

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Dowling, Bolam, & Co., for Downing & Handcock, Cardiff.

Solicitors for the defendants, Walton, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

---

From Chan. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) March 18.

LAMPLOUGH v. THE COMPANY OF PROPRIETORS OF THE KENT WATERWORKS. (a.)

Waterworks company—Prescribed rates of dividend—Surplus profits—Deficiencies in previous years—Incorporation of Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847—Deficiencies in years prior to incorporation of Act—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), s. 75.

A waterworks company, which was incorporated in 1809, obtained in 1864 an Act of Parliament to enable it to amalgamate with another company. This Act provided that from and after the passing of the Act the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, should apply to the whole of the undertaking and waterworks of the company. Before the passing of the Act of 1864 there was no limitation on the rate of dividend which the company might pay, but after that date, by virtue of section 75 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, no larger dividend than 10 per cent. was permissible, "unless a larger dividend be at any time necessary to make up the deficiency of any previous dividend which shall have fallen short of" 10 per cent.

Held, that the Act of 1847 was not retrospective, but spoke only from the time of its incorporation, and as providing for the future. Consequently the company was not justified in paying a larger dividend than 10 per cent. in order to make up any deficiencies or arrears of dividend which had occurred prior to the year 1864.

This was an appeal from a decision of Joyce, J.

The question which had to be determined in the action was whether the defendant company was entitled to apply surplus profits in making up to stockholders a dividend of 10 per cent. upon their stock from the year 1809, when the company was incorporated, down to the 30th of June, 1864, at which date the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, first became applicable to the company's undertaking, or whether the surplus profits must now be applied in constituting a reserve fund to secure future dividend, and, subject thereto, in reduction of the maximum water rates chargeable by the company under its Acts.

The defendant company was incorporated by an Act passed in the year 1809, by which it was empowered to purchase certain waterworks which had been established under letters patent granted by King William III. giving an exclusive right for a term of 500 years to supply water to Greenwich and other places in the county of Kent.

By this Act the company was empowered to raise £100,000 capital in shares of £100 each, the holders of which were to be "entitled to receive the entire and net distribution of an equal proportionate part, according to the money so by them respectively paid, of the profits and advantages that shall and may arise and accrue by the rates and other sums of money to be raised, recovered, or received by the said company of proprietors by the authority of this Act." The Act also gave the company power to raise additional capital if necessary.

Further Acts were obtained by the company giving powers of extension and raising fresh capital in 1811, 1850, 1860, and 1862.

In 1864 the defendant company was desirous of amalgamating with the North Kent Waterworks Co., and an Act (27 & 28 Vict. c. 146) was obtained to enable the amalgamation to be carried into effect.

Section 2 of this Act of 1864 incorporated among other Acts the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, and section 27 was as follows: "The several provisions of this Act with respect to water supply and water rates or rents, and all incidental matters, including the several provisions incorporated with this Act of 'the Waterworks Clauses Acts, 1847 and 1863' . . . apply from and after the passing of this Act to the whole of the undertaking and waterworks of the company."

Before the passing of this Act the company was under no obligation as to supply' and there was no limit upon the rates which it might charge nor upon the rate of dividend which it might pay.

Further Acts were obtained by the company in 1877, 1888, and 1902.

Under the Act of 1862 all the company's share capital had been converted into ordinary stock subject to the provisions of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, and all the shareholders were entitled to rank rateably in respect of dividend except a special issue of 7 per cent. ordinary stock issued in pursuance of the Act of 1877.

Since the passing of the Act of 1864 the amount of dividend to be received by the shareholders was limited by section 75 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, which is in the following terms: "The profits of the undertaking to be divided among the undertakers in any year shall not exceed the prescribed rate, or where no rate is prescribed they shall not exceed the rate of ten pounds in the hundred by the year on the paid-up capital in the undertaking, which in such case shall be deemed the prescribed rate, unless a larger dividend be at any time necessary to make up the deficiency of any previous dividend which shall have fallen short of the said yearly rate."

Section 76 of the same Act provided that if profits exceeded the amount limited the excess should be invested and form a reserve fund.

The company had for some years past been paying dividends in excess of 10 per cent. and had thereby made good all deficiencies or arrears which had arisen on the years from 1864 onwards. It was now proposed to continue paying dividends in excess of 10 per cent. in order to make up the deficiencies or arrears which had arisen on years prior to 1864, a proceeding which it was stated would involve a sum of no less than £700,000.

The plaintiff was the holder of £2,500 7 per cent. stock of the defendant company created under the Act of 1877, and he moved for an injunction to restrain the company from paying any dividend on any of their ordinary stock in respect of, or so as to make up, any deficiency or alleged deficiency of dividend on those stocks which might have occurred before the 30th of June, 1864.

Joyce, J., came to the conclusion upon the construction of the Acts that the payment of these back dividends was not within the powers of the company, and he granted an injunction accordingly.

The company appealed.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Cripps, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the company.

Younger, K.C., and Ashworth James, for the plaintiff, were not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R., stated the facts, and continued: It is contended for the company, in a very ingenious argument, that it is entitled to go back behind the period at which the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, was incorporated, and to treat the deficiencies occurring before section 75 of that Act was applicable at all as enabling it now to enlarge the dividend beyond 10 per cent.

It seems to me that, on the fair and grammatical construction of the sections in this case and applicable to it, that contention cannot be supported. [His lordship referred to section 27 of the Act of 1864, and continued:] Now what is the meaning of that? It seems to me those are words pointing to the application in the future of the provisions of the general Act. And what are those provisions? The provisions are contained in the 75th section, which still speak for the future; from the date at which the general Act is applied the company is to have the right of dividing profits at the prescribed rate, and of making up the deficiency of any previous dividend which shall have fallen short of that rate.

The Act speaks from the time it is passed, though in cases where it is incorporated, it speaks from the time from which it is incorporated, and when it refers to "the deficiency of any previous dividend," it is providing for the future, and when in future the company comes to distribute a sum by way of dividend and finds that it has more in hand than would suffice to pay the "prescribed rate"—that is, 10 per cent.—it looks back to see whether, from the time that Act came into operation which enables it to do that, there is a deficiency in a previous year. Of course there cannot be any such deficiency in the first year, but there may be in the second or the third; and so this company is in exactly the same position as a company that came into existence with these rights and these obligations and limitations on the day when the Waterworks Clauses Act was incorporated. This company is in no better and in no worse position; it was not bound, unless Parliament compelled it to do so, to incorporate the Waterworks Clauses Act into its undertaking; if it did so of its own free will, it probably did so because, on the whole, it was considered that the advantages were equivalent to, and probably more than counterbalanced any disadvantages. We have not been referred to all the numerous advantages which I have no doubt are contained in this Act of the Legislature—advantages possibly for the public as well as for the company, but I have no doubt, in either view, that advantages do exist. If the Act was imposed on the company by the Legislature, equally it seems to me that certain obligations were imposed upon it in return for certain advantages acquired. Therefore I cannot see the supposed injustice of cutting the company off from certain rights which it then enjoyed, rights which up to that date had not returned any very large profit, because the company was not in a very prosperous condition. I do not think the company had any immediate hope of being in a position to pay 10 per cent. at the time, and I do not suppose that it occurred to them that it was giving up anything of very great value when it undertook to limit its dividends to 10 per cent., seeing that up to 1864 it had never paid more than 6 per cent., and there did not seem to be any immediate prospect of paying 10 per cent. It is not a matter of mere benevolence in these cases; a railway company does not lower its rates out of pure goodwill to the public; it expects a larger return, and generally gets it, just as this company have got it. It was prepared, for its own advantage, it seems to me, to fix itself to certain rates. It had not derived any very great advantage from the unlimited right to charge unlimited rates before. It accepted the obligation of fixing its rates, it took on an obligation, or the qualified right rather, to pay dividends to the extent of 10 per cent., which it had never done before, and it took upon it the limitation, which I do not suppose it thought a very stern one at the time, of not paying more than 10 per cent. except in the event of its being able to show that there were deficiencies in previous years to which that dividend might be applied, or which, existing, would justify it in paying a larger dividend.

That seems to me to be the scheme of the Act, and we are doing no injustice in giving that Act its natural construction—namely, that it takes effect, as the language of the section says, "from and after the passing of this Act"—that is, in 1864.

Now Mr. Parker has certainly addressed a very ingenious argument, which I hope I fully appreciated. I cannot be absolutely certain that I did—I thought I understood the argument, but where I failed was to see its direct application to the one point in issue in this case—whether this Act is retrospective in the power conferred to take into consideration the deficit of the dividends before 1864; but this, at all events, does come out clear, that at the bottom of Mr. Parker's argument lies this proposition, that "dividend" in the 75th section means the total divisable sum, and not "dividend" in the popular sense—the sense in which ordinary persons use it—the sum received and paid as a quotient, the sum which they take and receive as they receive interest. That is the sense in which throughout these proceedings it has been used by Mr. Parker's clients in the documents they have tendered to us where they give us the rates of dividend paid throughout, and it is the sense in which it is has been used in the order of the learned judge, and, if I am not mistaken, in the notice of appeal. However, I will not affirm that. Now the order of the learned judge is this: "This court doth order that the defendant company and its directors be restrained until the trial of this action or until further order from declaring or paying any dividend on any of the ordinary stocks of the defendant company;" it is arrested in the attempt to pay a dividend in the popular form. It is restrained "until further order from declaring or paying any dividend on any of the ordinary stocks of the defendant company in respect of or so as to make up any deficiency or alleged deficiency of dividends which may have occurred before the 30th of June, 1864." I refer to that as showing the sense in which the word "dividend" has been used by all the parties in this action. That is not, of course, sufficient. I come to the Act itself, and I am told by Mr. Parker that the word "dividend" in the 75th section means, not dividend in the popular sense, but the sum to be divided—dividend in the technical sense. So I look through the Act, and the first thing I come to is the next section, the 76th section, in which, on Mr. Parker's own showing, "dividend" can mean nothing short of and nothing but dividend in the ordinary and popular significance—"and the dividends and interest arising from such securities shall also be invested." Mr. Parker admitted "dividend" there was dividend in the popular sense. The 77th section does not deal with that particular subject-matter at all, but section 78 does, and here again I find: "When such fund shall, by accumulation or otherwise, amount to the prescribed sum, or one-tenth part of the nominal capital, as the case may be, the interest and dividends thereon shall no longer be invested." And here again I have Mr. Parker's admission that "dividend" is dividend in the popular sense. Then I come to the 79th section. In the 79th section I again find this: "will enable the undertakers to make a dividend of the amount aforesaid and so from time to time" the "amount aforesaid" being at the prescribed rate of 10 per cent. "Dividend," again, in the popular sense, and then, as the crowning climax, the last place in which "dividend" is referred to in this connection, I find this in section 80: "and in case dividends to the amount hereinbefore limited have been paid, make such a rateable deduction," and so on. There can be no doubt that the only thing that was ever paid here was not the whole thing, but the specific part allotted by way of quotient to the individual shareholder; so that Mr. Parker starts with a strong presumption against him, that in this one particular section 75 the Legislature should use the word "dividend" in the strictly technical Latin sense, whereas in all the others they use it in the popular sense. Then I come to look at the section itself, and it seems to me it is only by a very artificial and refined train of reasoning that you can put on it any sense other than the popular sense. It seems to me, therefore, that the Act is capable of a very simple and natural meaning, applying to the words their ordinary grammatical sense, and that no injustice whatever is done by giving it that sense. In point of fact I think in this case the judgment of the learned judge below, though very short, was perfectly right, and exhausts the question, and I should not have added anything myself except that I thought myself bound in deference to the very ingenious argument of Mr. Parker to say a few words on the matter. In my opinion this appeal must be dismissrd.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and will only add a very few words. Before the Act of 1864, this company was able to divide, and no doubt did divide, all its profits amongst its shareholders by way of dividend without any limitation. There was no limit as to dividend at all, and accordingly it would have been impossible for the company to have pretended in any one year to have altered the dividend of a prior year, or to have appropriated the profits available for distribution amongst them in any one year to some past year which had been disposed of. In other words, with regard to this company up to the passing of the Act of 1864, there could not be said to have been in respect of dividends any deficiency at all in any true sense of the term. We then come to the Act of 1864, which incorporated the Act of 1847 for the first time, and so far as that Act of 1847 is concerned it may almost be said that there is a new incorporation, at any rate, quâ that Act of 1847. It is said on behalf of the appellants here that it was a great hardship incorporating that Act of 1847, and that at any rate it would be an even greater hardship unless they were successful on this appeal. The answer is, this company took the benefit of the new Act with its advantages and its disadvantages.

It had to go to Parliament to get some fresh powers, amongst others the right to incorporate another company and acquire its undertaking, and the Legislature, I presume, thought fit to impose upon this company the obligation of taking the appropriate sections of the Act of 1847 with their benefits and their liabilities, and the bargain was struck, and here we have the company subject now to the provisions of the Act of 1847. By section 27 of the Act of 1864, even if it needed that section to show it, it is perfectly clear that the provisions of the Act of 1847 which we have to consider are only to take effect from and after the passing of the Act of 1864, so far as concerns this company. In other words, they are to have no retrospective effect at all, and indeed it is difficult to see how they possibly could. Before the passing of the Act of 1864 in the prior years of this company there might or might not have been years where it had applied by way of profit amongst its shareholders unlimited dividends exceeding the prescribed rate of 10 per cent., but you could not possibly say, now that the Act of 1847 has been incorporated, you could treat the past years as years in which there was any limitation by way of dividend—any limitation by way of the profits which could be divided between the shareholders by way of dividend. Of course you could not say anything of the kind. There was no limit, and you could not have impeached any one year as having paid more than 10 per cent. or required the company to account for any excess, if any there had been. The provisions, as I have said, of the Act of 1847 were clearly not retrospective, and were only intended to apply, as appears to me, to the coming years so far as concerns this part of the case. Then the appellants say: "Oh, we want to regard the years before 1864 where we, the shareholders, did not as a matter of fact get the full 10 per cent. as being years in which there was a deficiency within the meaning of the phrase as it is used in the Act of 1847." The first answer is, I think, that the Act of 1847, after the incorporation, had no relation whatever to any deficiency in the prior years. As I have pointed out, with regard to those prior years you could not say there was any such thing as a deficiency existing.

And if you look at the wording of section 75, on which the appellants have to rely in order to enable them to distribute dividends in respect of a past deficiency, how is it worded? That section says this, that they must have a limit to the amount they distribute by way of dividend, "unless a larger dividend be at any time necessary to make up the deficiency of any previous dividend which shall have fallen short of the said yearly rate," the "yearly rate" there, to my mind, clearly meaning the prescribed rate—prescribed, as I have pointed out for this company, for the first time, to take effect after the passing of the Act of 1864. How could it be said within the meaning of those words that the years before 1864 fall within the provisions of the section. The section shows, to my mind, that it is only dealing with years where there was a limited maximum dividend in respect of which it could be said that there had been a deficiency, and a dividend which, within the words of the section, had fallen short of the prescribed rate. To my mind both the wording of the section and the spirit of it, and the general considerations applicable to the case, show that these years before 1864 cannot be regarded at all as coming within the operation of section 75, or being affected or operated upon, if I may use the expression, by the Act of 1847 at all. It appears to me that Joyce, J., was quite right in the decision he has come to, and that this appeal fails.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have very little to add. It is important to remember, dealing with the Act of 1847 alone, that according to its terms it contemplated only waterworks to be thereafter authorized by Act of Parliament, which Act of Parliament should declare that this Act of 1847 should be incorporated therewith, and it is with reference to such a company that section 75, which has been so much discussed, is enacted. Putting it shortly (for I will not read that section again), it prescribes a certain rate of dividend which may not be exceeded, but it provides as a qualification or limitation on that, that there may be a larger dividend required to make up the deficiency of any previous dividend which shall have fallen short of the said yearly rate. Now on the construction of that section, taking the Act of 1847 alone, it is, I think, plain that there can be no deficiency within the meaning of that section except during the period when there is a "prescribed rate."

Then, however, we come to the Act of 1864, by section 27 of which it is enacted that, amongst other things, section 75 of the Act of 1847 shall apply from and after the passing of this Act to the whole of the undertaking and waterworks of the company. Why is section 75 to be interpreted differently in that case from what it would have been interpreted if the company had been for the first time incorporated by that Act of 1864, which by section 27 made the Waterworks Act apply to it. It seems to me that with respect to this company, as to any other, we are bound to say that there can be no deficiency except during the period when there is a prescribed rate.

In my view it is not necessary to express any opinion upon the point which was so ably argued by Mr. Parker. I will assume that he is right, and though it is not necessary to decide it, the inclination of my opinion is that he is right in saying that whatever sum is in any given year taken and permitted to be divided by way of dividend, is divisible among the then shareholders of the company; but the question before us is really the quantum which has to be divided. In my view we are not concerned here with the persons who are entitled as between themselves to receive the amount which is distributed. I only desire to keep a perfectly open mind upon that point whenever the question may arise.

The motion was by consent treated as the trial of the action.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Hollams, Sons, Coward, & Hawksley; Waltons, Bubb, Johnson, & Whatton.

---

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } Jan. 22.

In re RAYER.
RAYER v. RAYER. (a.)

Will—Construction—Annuity without any deduction except legacy duty—Republication after passing of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888—Succession duty—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888 (51 Vict. c. 8), s. 21—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 9.

A testator, by a will made in 1882, gave an annuity to H. for life, and after her death he gave annuities to H.'s children; and he charged all said annuities upon his real estate and directed that they should be paid "without any deductions except for legacy duty and income tax" A codicil, dated the 12*th of July,* 1888, confirmed the will. The testator died in 1892, and H. in 1900.

Held, that the codicil operated as a republication of the will as from the date of the codicil; that therefore there was a direction for the payment of the annuities to H.'s children "without any deduction except legacy duty," made at a time when there was no duty called by that name, another duty called succession duty having been substituted by section 21 of the Inland Revenue Act, 1888, in respect of legacies and annuities charged on the real estate of any person dying after the 1*st of July,* 1888; and that the devisees of the annuities were liable to pay the succession duty.

Held, also, that the estate duty arising under the Finance Act, 1894, was payable out of the testator's residuary personal estate.

This was an administration action which raised the question as to who was liable for the estate and succession duties which became payable on the death of an annuitant.

The testator, whose will was dated the 10th of August, 1882, devised his real estates to trustees upon certain trusts, and subject thereto he gave an annuity of £250 to his sister Frances Harmer for her life, and after her decease an annuity of £100 to each of her children. He charged these annuities on the said real estates, and subject thereto he devised all his real estates in strict settlement. He directed that all the annuities should be paid half-yearly, "without any deductions except for legacy duty and income tax," and he bequeathed all his residuary personal estates to be held upon trusts similar to his real estates.

By a codicil dated the 12th of July, 1888, the testator, after making certain provisions which are immaterial, concluded: "In all other respects I confirm my said will."

The testator died on the 11th of January, 1892.

F. Harmer died on the 22nd of July, 1900, leaving three children, each of whom became entitled to an annuity of £100 per annum.

The Inland Revenue authorities claimed estate duty and succession duty in respect of the three annuities.

The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, s. 21, sub-section 2, provides: "The duties chargeable under the Acts now in force for charging the duties on legacies and shares of the personal estates of deceased persons shall not be levied and paid under such Acts in respect of any legacy payable or having effect or being satisfied out of or charged or rendered a burden upon the real or heritable estate of any person dying on or after the first day of July, 1888, or upon any real or heritable estate, or the rents or profits thereof, which such person shall have had any right or power to charge, burden, or affect with the payment of money, or out of or upon any moneys to arise from the sale, mortgage, or other disposition of any such real or heritable estate, or any part thereof, but the duties under the Succession Duty Act, 1853, and the additional duties under this Act shall be levied and paid in respect of every such legacy (whether given by way of annuity or in any other form) as a succession to personal property."

O. L. Clare, for the plaintiff, the first tenant for life under the settlement.

Butcher, K.C., and Sheldon, for two of the annuitants.

Hewitt, for the third annuitant.

S. B. L. Druce, for the defendant tenants for life in remainder and the residuary legatees.

Withers, for the trustees and the ultimate tenant in tail in remainder.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, stated the facts and read section 21 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, and continued as follows: The effect of sub-section 2 of section 21 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, was that the legacy duties therein mentioned ceased, and succession duties were substituted for them. What the result would have been if the matter had rested there, having regard to what has been said in other cases as to the effect of an Act of Parliament on the construction of a will made prior to the passing of the Act, it is not necessary for me to determine; but Lord Selborne in Jones v. Ogle, 21 W. R. 236, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 192, at p. 195, points out that in such a case the Act of Parliament does not usually affect the construction of the will. It may, however, in some cases affect the expression of the testator's intention, as will be seen, for example, in the case of In re Bridger, 42 W. R. 179, [1894] 1 Ch. 297, a decision under the Mortmain Act of 1891. It is not necessary for me to determine what the effect would have been in the present case, because on the 12th of July, 1888—that is to say, after the Act came into operation, this testator made a codicil by which, after making certain provisions which are immaterial, he expressly confirmed his will. The effect of confirmation is stated by North, J., in In re Champion, [1893] 1 Ch. 101, 41 W. R. Dig. 275, affirmed in the Court of Appeal. He says: "It is settled by authority that the effect of such a phrase as 'I confirm my will in other respects' is a republication of the will, and when under the old law a testator had made a will which would merely pass the property he had at the date of it, and then by a codicil he confirmed and republished his will, the effect was to bring down the date of the will to the date of the codicil, and to make the devise in the will operate in the same way in which it would have operated if the words of the will had been contained in the codicil of later date. There is ample authority on this point"; and then his lordship goes through all the old authorities. Therefore I have, I apprehend, to treat this case as though there had been simply a devise after the Act of these rent-charges or annuities with a direction in the words that I have read that they are to be paid without any deduction except for legacy duty.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I pause here to observe that when the testator died—namely, on the 11th of January, 1892, the succession duty, which had been substituted for legacy duty, was in fact more onerous than and was different in some respects from the legacy duty. There was 1½ per cent. increase, which has since by the Finance Act, 1894, been merged in estate duty (but that was two years after the testator died), and the succession duty is payable by eight half-yearly instalments, and the legacy duty was payable by four equal yearly instalments; so that the duties are by no means identical. This variation would have caused me considerable difficulty if there had been no codicil confirming the will; but the joint effect of will and codicil is that I have a document directing payment of a rent-charge "without any deduction except legacy duty," made at a time when there was no duty called by that name, but another duty recently substituted for it called succession duty; these two duties are frequently confused the one with the other, even by the Somerset House authorities in their letters relating to the present case. Now it is an important principle in construing wills to give effect so far as possible to all the words used I find here that the testator clearly expresses his intention that the devisees shall bear the burden of some duty, and I can give no effect to this expression of intention unless I regard "legacy" as falsa demonstratio, or unless I read "legacy" as equivalent to the succession duty substituted for legacy duty. It is open to me to do this, inasmuch as the word "legacy" is insensible, having regard to existing circumstances, and the words "legacy duty" and "succession duty" are frequently used as interchangeable. I should certainly defeat the expressed intention if I held that the devisees took free from all duty, and I accordingly answer the question by saying that the devisees of the rent-charges must pay the succession duty. The question of estate duty has not been seriously argued; it must, of course, be paid out of the residuary personal estate.

Solicitors, Wood, Bigg, & Nash; Withers & Withers; Clarke & Calkin; Woodcock, Ryland, & Parker.

Chan. Div. } Buckley, J. } May 12, 13, 19.

COOPER v. LAIDLER. (a.)

Easement—Light—Threatened injury—Injunction or damages — Jurisdiction — Special circumstances — Oppression—Lord Cairns' Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 27), s. 2.

The plaintiff was the owner of a cottage possessing ancient lights and adjacent to ground wherein the defendant threatened and intended to erect valuable buildings which would (as the court found) materially obstruct the lights and cause the plaintiff substantial damage. The plaintiff had been unwilling to sell his property for a less sum than the cottage, together with its easement of light, would, having regard to its situation in relation to the adjacent ground, in fact command. In an action for an injunction to restrain the erection of the proposed building,

Held, that the plaintiff's conduct had not been extortionate, and that there were no circumstances such as would induce the court to award him damages in lieu of an injunction.

The dictum in Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co., 43 Ch. D. 316, 38 W. R. Dig. 63, that there is no jurisdiction to grant damages in lieu of a prohibitory injunction, must be considered binding.

This was an action for an injunction to restrain the defendant from erecting buildings on his land in such a manner as to interfere with the plaintiff's ancient lights.

The plaintiff was the owner of a small cottage near Northumberland-street, Newcastle-on-Tyne. The defendant was the owner of a plot of land fronting on Northumberland-street, and situate between that street and the plaintiff's cottage. On this plot the defendant proposed to erect buildings which, in the opinion of the plaintiff, would materially and substantially obstruct the flow of light to certain windows in the cottage.

The erection had not commenced when the plaintiff issued a writ, claiming an injunction. The circumstances are more fully referred to in the judgment.

Astbury, K.C., and Maugham, for the plaintiff.

Hon. F. Russell (Buckmaster, K.C., with him), for the defendant.—Even if the court should find that the plaintiff's lights have been materially obstructed, he has brought this action for the purpose of enabling himself to extort from the defendant more than the property is really worth. His conduct has been vexatious and oppressive, and the case, therefore, is one in which damages should be awarded in lieu of an injunction: Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co., 43 W. R. 238, [1895] 1 Ch. 287, at p. 316. The plaintiff is asking for an injunction, not for the purpose of protecting rights, but in order to extort from the defendant a greater sum than the property is really worth.

Astbury, K.C., in reply.—In a quia timet action there is no discretion to award damages in lieu of an injunction: Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co., 43 Ch. D. 316, at p. 333, 38 W. R. Dig. 63; Martin v. Price, 42 W. R. 262, [1894] 1 Ch. 276. Even if the court has jurisdiction to award damages, the present is a case for an injunction.

He also referred to Holland v. Worley, 32 W. R. 749, 26 Ch. D. 578; Scott v. Pape, 34 W. R. 465, 31 Ch. D. 554; and Greenwood v. Hornsey, 35 W. R. 163, 33 Ch. D. 471.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

O. L. Clare, amicus curiæ, referred to Home and Colonial Stores v. Colls, 50 W. R. 227, [1902] 1 Ch. 302.

BUCKLEY, J., held that the access of light over the defendant's property to the ancient lights of the plaintiff would be substantially and materially interfered with by the defendant's proposed buildings, but reserved judgment on the question whether damages could be, or under the circumstances of the present case ought to be, given to the plaintiff instead of an injunction.

May 19.—BUCKLEY, J.—Lord Cairns' Act was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1883, but by section 5 (b) of that Act the jurisdiction of the court under Lord Cairns' Act was preserved notwithstanding the repeal: Sayers v. Collyer, 32 W. R. 200, 28 Ch. D. 103, at p. 107. The scope and effect of that Act have been frequently the subject of judicial comment and decision. The authorities seem to stand as follows: (1) Where a mandatory injunction is asked, the Act gives jurisdiction to substitute damages for an injunction; (2) where the injunction asked is one to restrain a continuing nuisance—that is, where the act has been done and there is an intention to continue to do it, then it would seem that there is jurisdiction to award damages instead of granting an injunction (Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co., [1895] 1 Ch., at p. 319; but (3) where no wrongful act has been committed, but an injunction is sought to restrain its commission, the Court of Appeal has expressed a clear opinion in Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co., 43 Ch. D., at pp. 333, 342, that Lord Cairns' Act confers no power to give damages in lieu of an injunction. That was the judgment of Bowen, Fry, and Cotton, L.JJ. In Martin v. Price, again in the Appeal Court, the question whether the court has jurisdiction to award damages by way of compensation for an injury not yet committed, but only threatened and intended, was expressed to be by no means free from difficulty, but was not taken as concluded. Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co. was there referred to as having expressed a clear opinion against the existence of such jurisdiction. In Martin v. Price the court did not keep the parties waiting while making up their minds whether the view expressed in Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co. was to be established by decision, but assuming the jurisdiction to exist, held, upon the facts, that an injunction ought to go. The only subsequent reference that I find to the point is in Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co., [1895] 1 Ch., at p. 315. In that case it was stated, correctly so far as I know, although I have not verified it myself, that since Lord Cairns' Act was passed only fourteen cases were to be found in the books in which damages in lieu of an injunction have, against the will of the plaintiff, been awarded, and it was said that all these were cases in which mandatory injunctions were sought. The one case which I have found in which damages were given instead of a prohibitory injunction is Holland v. Worley, before Pearson, J., a decision which has been doubted.

Under these circumstances, I might deal with this case upon the footing that the expression of opinion in the Court of Appeal in Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co. ought, so far as I am concerned, to be treated as concluding the matter, and if so the injunction ought to go. But without resting my judgment wholly upon that, I think that for other reasons, which I proceed to state, an injunction ought equally to go.

An easement of light is a legal right. It is a matter of property, and to quote the well-known words of Lord Kingsdown in The Imperial Gas Light Co. v. Broadbent, 7 H. L. Cas. 600, at p. 612, 8 W. R. H. L. Dig. 4, where the plaintiff has established his legal right, then, "unless there be something special in the case, he is entitled as of course to an injunction to prevent the recurrence of that right's violation." The plaintiff's easement of light is a right at common law. The remedy in equity by way of injunction is a remedy in aid of that legal right. The plaintiff is entitled to an injunction, not in the discretion of the court, but as of course, unless there is something special in the case, such as laches, or that the interference with the right is only trivial or occasional. To quote Lindley, L.J., in Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co., [1895] 1 Ch., at p. 316: "Without denying the jurisdiction to award damages instead of an injunction, even in cases of continuing actionable nuisances, such jurisdiction ought not to be exercised in such cases except under very exceptional circumstances": see further Martin v. Price, [1894] 1 Ch., at p. 285; Home and Colonial Stores v. Colls, [1902] 1 Ch., at p. 309. The court has affirmed over and over again that the jurisdiction to give damages where it exists is not so to be used as in fact to enable the defendant to purchase from the plaintiff against his will his legal right to the easement: see, for example, Dent v. Auction Mart Co., 14 W. R. 709, L. R. 2 Eq. 238, at p. 246; Aynsley v. Glover, 23 W. R. 147, L. R. 18 Eq. 544, at p. 552; Smith v. Smith, 23 W. R. 771, L. R. 20 Eq. 500, at p. 505; Greenwood v. Hornsey, 33 Ch. D., at p. 477. This may be summed up in the language of Lindley, L.J., in Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co., [1895] 1 Ch., at p. 315, thus: "Ever since Lord Cairns' Act was passed the Court of Chancery has repudiated the notion that the Legislature intended to turn that court into a tribunal for legalizing wrongful acts; or, in other words, the court has always protested against the notion that it ought to allow a wrong to continue simply because the wrongdoer is able and willing to pay for the injury he may inflict." To refuse to aid the legal right by injunction, and to give damages instead is in fact to compel the plaintiff to part with his easement for money. The court has no right to compel him so to do: see Lord Halsbury's words in Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co., at p. 311. If the injury be trivial and the damages would be measured by a very small sum—say, £20, as in Dent v. Auction Mart Co., Aynsley v. Glover; or £5 or £6, as in Home and Colonial Stores v. Colls, [1902] 1 Ch., at p. 306, the court may, where there is jurisdiction, give damages instead of an injunction. But except in such cases the owner of the legal right is entitled to the injunction, which is but the equitable remedy to perfect his right.

In the present case the circumstances upon which the defendant relies are, in substance, that his property in Northumberland-street, and the lofty buildings which he proposes to put upon it are much more valuable than the comparatively insignificant cottage property at the back; that the plaintiff purchased the cottage property, or the last few shares in it, recently, because, as the defendant suggests, he knew it would become very valuable and command a high price when the frontager in Northumberland-street wanted to interfere with its easement of light. The defendant has given no evidence, and does not, I think, suggest that the damage will be £20, or any small sum of that kind. I find that the damage will be substantial. The defendant says that the cottage property, as such, is worth a comparatively small sum, say £700, but it appears that when the immediate predecessor in title of the defendant contemplated building, he offered the plaintiff a fancy price, £5,000, for this property, and that the plaintiff refused it. The defendant says that the plaintiff is extorting money by asking for an injunction, and thus compelling the defendant either to buy at an unreasonable price or to keep his buildings down. This argument, I think, rests on a fallacy. It is not extortion to ask a price which the property for exceptional reasons in fact commands. If a neighbouring owner for the improvement of his property requires an adjacent property, he must submit to pay a fancy price if he is determined to acquired it. The value of the adjacent property is in fact the greater by reason of that state of things. Moreover, when the defendant bought, as he did recently, subject to this easement of light existing as a hindrance to a building scheme, he probably paid much less for his property than if there had not been such existing hindrance. Further, the value of the plaintiff's property is not merely the value of the old cottage, but is such sum as it will fetch having regard, amongst other things, to this existing right to an easement of light. It is not, I think, extortion or oppression that the plaintiff should decline to sell his property except for such price as, having regard to the exigencies of the neighbouring property, it will in fact command. It is no more oppressive in the plaintiff to say that he wants the full sum which his property will command, having regard to the existing easement, than it is in the defendant to say that he must be allowed to build in disregard of the easement. Assuming, therefore, without deciding, that there exists in the present case (where the injury is not committed but only threatened) jurisdiction to give damages in lieu of an injunction, I am of opinion that this is not a case in which that course ought to be taken. I think the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction, and I therefore grant an injunction in the usual form.

Solicitors, Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for Cooper & Goodger, Newcastle-on-Tyne; Crossman, Prichard, Crossman, & Block, for Dees & Thompson, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

---

K. B. Div. (Bigham, J.) April 23, 27.

CONTINENTAL CAOUTCHOUC AND GUTTA PERCHA CO. v. KLEINTWORT, SONS, & CO. (a.)

Banker — Customer — Mistake — Money paid under mistake of fact.

The defendants, who were foreign bankers, were in the habit of making advances to K., who then purchased goods which the defendants held as security; when K. found a purchaser he assigned the right to receive the purchase-money to the defendants, who accordingly released the goods. K. also carried on the same system with B. & Co. The plaintiffs bought from K. two parcels, the one released by the defendants and the other by B. & Co. K. instructed the plaintiffs to pay the defendants and B. & Co respectively for the goods so purchased. By mistake the plaintiffs paid both sums to the defendants, who credited K.'s account, notifying K. of their having done so. The defendants acting bonâ fide continued to make advances to K. who knew of the mistake, but did not disclose it, and afterwards became bankrupt. The plaintiffs sought to recover from the defendants the sum which should have been paid to B. & Co. as money paid under mistake of fact.

Held, that the defendants were holding the money to the use of the plaintiffs, and that as the defendants were not prejudiced by such payment the sum was recoverable as money paid under mistake of fact.

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Action tried in Commercial Court.

This was an action brought to recover the sum of £1,480 15s. 11d., money paid by plaintiffs to the defendants under a mistake of fact.

The facts sufficiently appear in the reserved judgment.

Scrutton, K.C., and Mackinnon, for plaintiffs.

Hamilton, K.C., and Chaytor, for defendants.

The following cases were cited: Thomson v. Clydesdale Bank (Limited), [1893] A. C. 282; Simson v. Ingham, 2 B. & C. 65; Buller v. Harrison, Cowper 565; Union Bank of Australia v. Murray-Aynsley, [1898] A. C. 623, 47 W. R. Dig. 9; Coleman v. Bucks and Oxon Union Bank, 45 W. R. 616, [1897] 2 Ch. 243; Kelly v. Solari, 9 M. & W. 54; Newall v. Tomlinson, L R. 6 C. P. 405, 19 W. R. C. L. Dig. 48; Cox v. Prentice, 3 M. & Sel. 344; Marriot v. Hampton, 2 Smith, L.C., 11th ed. 421; Holland v. Russell, 11 W. R. 757, 4 B. & S. 14.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 27.—BIGHAM, J.: This action is brought to recover back a sum of £1,480 15s. 11d. paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants under a mistake of fact. The facts are as follows: A firm of Kramrisch & Co. carried on business in Liverpool as importers of rubber. The defendants, who are foreign bankers, were in the habit of making advances to Kramrisch on the security of the shipping documents of the rubber, and when the rubber arrived in this country the defendants continued the advances, holding the rubber itself as their security. When Kramrisch & Co. sold any part of the goods it was their practice to apply to the defendants for a corresponding delivery order, which the defendants gave them, thereby enabling Kramrisch & Co. to fulfil their contract of sale with their buyer. In exchange for the delivery order Kramrisch & Co. gave to the defendants a letter containing the particulars of the sale, the quantity, the price, and the name of the buyer, and by the same letter they assigned to the defendants the right to receive the purchase-money; this assignment Kramrisch & Co. completed by a written notice to the buyer notifying that the money was to be paid to the defendants. Thus, although when the rubber was sold the defendants parted with the goods, they got in place of the rubber the right to receive the price from the buyer. When the buyer paid the price the defendants credited the amount to Kramrisch's account, and thus the transaction ended. Kramrisch & Co. did business in this way not only with the defendants but also with a firm of Wm Brandt, Sons, & Co. The plaintiffs were customers of Kramrisch & Co., and frequently bought parcels of rubber from them, and following the practice I have described they were in the habit from time to time of paying the price to the defendants or to Brandt & Co. as the case might be in accordance with the directions given to them by Kramrisch & Co. In December, 1902, and January, 1903, the plaintiffs had bought from Kramrisch & Co. several parcels of rubber which had been held by the defendants as security for advances made to Kramrisch. The defendants had parted with these parcels of goods, getting from Kramrisch & Co. an assignment of the right to receive the price, of which assignment express notice in writing had been given to the plaintiffs. The goods were delivered to the plaintiffs, and from time to time in the early part of January the plaintiffs made remittances to the defendants on account of the price. The total price of the different parcels so bought by plaintiffs was £9,505 17s. 3d., and the payments made on account amounted to £8,259 2s. 7d. Thus there remained a balance of £1,246 14s. 8d. to be paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants. It appears that at this time the plaintiffs were also purchasers from Kramrisch & Co. of three other parcels of rubber amounting to £1,480 15s. 11d., against which advances had been made to Kramrisch & Co. by Brandt & Co.; and the plaintiffs were, by virtue of an assignment made by Kramrisch in favour of Brandt, under an obligation to pay the price of these parcels to Brandt. By a blunder on the part of one of the plaintiffs' clerks the fact was overlooked that this £1,480 15s. 11d. was to go to Brandt & Co., and the remittances for the whole amount (the £1,246 14s. 8d. and the £1,480 15s. 11d.) were sent by plaintiffs to the defendants. Thus the defendants received an amount (£1,480 15s. 11d.) which ought to have been sent to Brandt & Co. On the 7th of February Brandt & Co. wrote to the plaintiffs to know why the money for the three parcels of rubber, the £1,480 15s. 11d., had not been remitted to them in accordance with the undertaking created by the assignment. The plaintiffs then discovered the blunder which had been made by their clerk, and on the 10th of February they wrote to the defendants asking to have the matter put right by a return of the money. The defendants refused to return the money, alleging that in effect it had been paid over to Kramrisch & Co. or had been accounted for to them; and further, that on the faith of the representation made by the plaintiffs that the money was available for Kramrisch & Co. in defendants' hands the defendants had been induced to give fresh credit to Kramrisch & Co., and further that whether the plaintiff had or had not induced the giving of fresh credit the state of the accounts between Kramrisch & Co. and the defendants had, in fact, been altered between the dates of the receipt of the money and the notification of the mistake. Shortly after the notification of the mistake Kramrisch & Co. failed; and, thereupon Brandt & Co. called on the plaintiffs to pay the £1,480 15s. 11d. in accordance with the obligation created by the assignment, and the plaintiffs did pay, as, indeed they were bound to do. Thus the plaintiffs had paid the money twice over, the first time in mistake to the defendants, the second time properly to Brandt & Co., and the question now is whether they can recover back from the defendants the amount of the first payment or whether they must be satisfied with a proof against the bankrupt estate of Kramrisch & Co. It seems that before the mistaken remittance was made Kramrisch & Co. had advised the defendants of large sales of rubber to the plaintiffs in addition to those already referred to, and had obtained corresponding deliveries of goods from the defendants. Such sales had in fact been made, but Kramrisch & Co., instead of delivering the goods to the plaintiffs, converted them to their own use so that the plaintiffs owed nothing in respect of them. Of this, however, the defendants were unaware, so that when they received the remittance they believed that it was properly sent to them against the goods with which they had parted. By the letters from the plaintiffs to the defendants in which the remittances were enclosed the defendants were requested to credit the amount to Kramrisch & Co., and in accordance with these letters the defendants did credit Kramrisch & Co.'s account with the remittances, and so advised the plaintiffs when they wrote acknowledging the receipt of the money. Not only did the defendants deal with the remittances in the way they were told to deal with them, but they also advised Kramrisch & Co. of the receipt of the money and that the amount had been passed to their credit. Kramrisch & Co., in answer to this unexpected and agreeable piece of news, wrote back to the defendants saying that they noted the fact and had made entries in their own books in conformity therewith. Of course Kramrisch & Co. knew well that the plaintiffs ought not to have paid the money to the defendants, and that they (Kramrisch & Co) had no right to the credit of which the defendants had sent advice; but they kept their mouths shut. It is necessary to state one other fact. Between the receipt of the money and the notification of the mistake the state of the accounts between Kramrisch & Co. and the defendants underwent considerable changes, the general effect of which was to reduce very considerably the large amount owing by Kramrisch & Co. No doubt in the course of these changes some payments were made by the defendants to Kramrisch & Co., or on their account; but they were far less in amount than the payments in, and they were either made against ample security or were of insignificant amounts. Moreover, not one of the payments to Kramrisch & Co. was in any way induced by the receipt of the money from the plaintiffs. This the defendants themselves admit, and I am myself quite satisfied as a matter of fact that it was so. The receipt of the money in no way caused the defendants to make any payment or to grant any indulgence to Kramrisch & Co. or to favour them in any way. Their business with Kramrisch & Co. would have gone on precisely as it did, even if the money had not been received, for the open account was, at the time of the payment, so large and the subsequent dealings were so small and of such little importance that the mistaken payment could not have influenced, as indeed it did not influence, the defendants in any way. The defendants are still large creditors of Kramrisch & Co.

Then, can the plaintiffs recover back the money from the defendants? I think they can. Certainly, before the defendants had advised Kramrisch & Co. that the money had been credited to their account, it was money in the defendants' hands to the plaintiffs' use. The mere entering of the money to the credit of Kramrisch & Co. by the defendants in their own books gave no title either to the defendants or to Kramrisch & Co. Such entry bound no one. If the mistake had been discovered and notified before the defendants' clerk had made the entry in the defendants' books, the plaintiffs could clearly have insisted on a return of the money. It would not have been competent to the defendants to say that, having received the money with instructions to credit it to Kramrisch & Co., they were either bound as regarded Kramrisch & Co., or entitled as regarded themselves so to deal with it. The notification of the mistake and the countermand of the instructions would have entitled the plaintiffs to a return of the money. The mere entry by a clerk in the books can make no difference; such an act can neither give any right to the defendants, nor until communicated can it give any right to Kramrisch & Co. Then, did the communication to Kramrisch & Co. of the fact of the entry alter this state of affairs; did it vest any right in that firm to the money? If it did, then the money ceased to be money in the hands of the defendants to the use of the plaintiffs, and it became money in the hands of the defendants to the use of Kramrisch & Co. which the defendants were entitled to appropriate toward payment of Kramrisch & Co.'s indebtedness to them. And in that case it is to Kramrisch & Co. that the plaintiffs must look for its return. At this point the difficulty, if there be any, arises. It is said, on behalf of the defendants, that what happened was in fact equivalent to a payment of the money by the defendants to Kramrisch & Co., and a repayment of the money by Kramrisch & Co. to the defendants. And so perhaps it might have been had Kramrisch & Co. thought or supposed that the money was really intended for them. Kramrisch & Co., however, knew quite well that they were not entitled to the money; they knew that the money ought to have gone to Brandt & Co. How, then, could Kramrisch & Co. say that the money was in defendants' hands to their (Kramrisch & Co.'s) use. They knew it was not; and if they had asked the defendants to pay it over they would have been committing a fraud. Kramrisch & Co.'s duty when they were advised of the payment was to tell the defendants that there had been a mistake and that the plaintiffs had paid money into the defendants' hands which they ought not to have paid. Instead of doing this they said nothing. But are the plaintiffs to suffer on this account? I think not. In my opinion this money was paid into the defendants' hands in such circumstances of mistake as to make it money paid by the plaintiffs to their own use, and it has never ceased to have that character. The defendants must therefore pay it back. I have already said that the defendants were not in any way induced to alter their position by reason of the mistaken payment; and the mere fact that the accounts did change in the ordinary course of business before the mistake was discovered is, in my opinion, immaterial. The plaintiffs are therefore not estopped from setting up the truth—namely, that the money is theirs. It would probably have been otherwise if the mistake had led the defendants to alter their position with regard to Kramrisch & Co. to their own disadvantage. The plaintiffs contended that the payment was made not to the credit of Kramrisch & Co. at all, but in discharge of an original liability of theirs to the defendants, arising out of a supposed but non-existent assignment. I doubt whether, having regard to the fact that in the letter containing the remittance it was described by the plaintiffs as sent for Kramrisch & Co.'s account, this contention is sound; but in the view I take of the case it is not necessary for me to deal with it.

Judgment for plaintiffs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Stephenson, Harwood, & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Hollams, Sons, Coward, & Hawksley.

---

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) April 1, 8.

FIELDING v. TURNER. (a.)

Gaming—Using shop for unlawful game—Automatic machine—Unlawful gaming—Gaming Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109), s. 2—Gaming House Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 38), s. 4.

The appellant kept in his shop an automatic machine which was worked by putting a penny in the slot and then pulling down and afterwards releasing a spring, whereby the penny was set in motion and might fall into one of seven compartments; if it fell into the centre compartment a ticket was automatically delivered entitling the recipient to two pennyworth of goods sold in the shop, if it fell into two other compartments the penny was automatically returned, but if it fell into any of the other four compartments it was retained.

Held, that the user of such machine was an unlawful game within the meaning of the Gaming Act. 1845, s. 2, and the Gaming House Act, 1854, and that the appellant had been rightly convicted under section 4 of the latter Act of having opened, kept, and used his shop for the purpose of unlawful gaming.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

Special case stated by justices.

The case stated set out the following facts:

The appellant Fielding, who keeps a shop wherein he sells sweetmeats, herbs, and herb beer, had on his shop counter an automatic machine working on the penny-in-the-slot system. A person desiring to work the machine puts a penny in the slot and then pulls down a spring by means of a knob, and then lets the knob go suddenly and the spring flies up and the penny is thus sent on its journey and may go into one of seven compartments. If it goes into either of two compartments the penny is returned to the sender. If it goes into one of four compartments the penny is retained in the machine, and the sender gets nothing for it If the penny goes into the centre compartment (the bull's-eye, as it is called) the sender receives from the machine a ticket entitling him to receive from the appellant two pennyworth of sweets, or it may be cigars or cigarettes. It was proved by the evidence that numbers of boys visited the shop and put pennies into the slot, some of whom won and some of whom lost, but it was admitted by some of the boys that there was skill in working the machine, and that a person who was accustomed to it might win as frequently as he lost.

Three informations were then laid against the appellant under section 4 of the Gaming House Act, 1894. That section is as follows: "Any person being the owner or occupier or having the use of any house, room, or place, who shall open, keep, or use the same for the purpose of unlawful gaming being carried on therein, and any person who being the owner or occupier of any house or room shall knowingly and wilfully permit the same to be opened, kept, or used by any other person for the purpose aforesaid, and any person having the care and management of any house, room, or place opened, kept, or used for the purpose aforesaid . . . may on summary conviction thereof before any two justices of the peace be adjudged by such justices to forfeit and pay such penalty not exceeding five hundred pounds as to such justices shall seem fit. . . ."

The informations were heard before the Oldham justices, who convicted the appellant and fined him ten shillings, but stated this case.

Llewelyn Davies, for the appellant, contended that he could not be convicted unless something more than mere gaming was proved. It must also be proved that it was unlawful gaming, and that the shop was opened for the purpose of gaming. The use of the machine was not gaming, as it was not a mere game of chance, and skill entered into the competition. It was certainly not unlawful gaming, and the house could not be said to be used as a gaming-house within the meaning of the Act.

He referred to Rex v. Rogier, 2 Dow. & Ry. 431; Jenks v. Turpin, 13 Q. B. D. 505, 32 W. R. Dig. 84, and the numerous statutes cited in that case.

R. B. D. Acland, for the respondent, contended that it was clearly a game of mere chance, and that the shop was kept open for the purpose of gaming. The gaming was rendered unlawful by taking people from their proper avocations.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 8.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., read the judgment of the court, in the course of which, after referring to the facts, he said: It has been argued that this, if a game at all, was a game of skill, but this contention cannot be maintained. In the proper sense of the word, skill has no effect upon the act done by the person who puts the penny into the slot. No doubt practice may enable a person to acquire knowledge as to strength of the spring, but on the first and probably on many successive occasions it must be a question of chance into which compartment the penny would fall. It is then suggested that there is no unlawful gaming, because no person competed with the person who put the penny in the slot; but this involves a fallacy, for the owner of the machine may be said to back his chance of the money falling into one of the four compartments in which it would be retained without return. The owner of the machine backed his chance against the person who used it. It is also contended that keeping such a machine in a shop is not keeping or using a room for the purpose of unlawful gaming; but if the operation was unlawful the appellant was rightly convicted of keeping the room for the purpose.

The only substantial question is whether the operation was unlawful within the Gaming House Act, 1854. That Act in its preamble refers to the Gaming Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109), and section 2 of the latter Act, in our opinion, indicates that a game in which the chances are not alike favourable to all the players, including the person by whom the game was managed, or against whom the players staked, was an unlawful game. The operation of this machine, in our opinion, falls within that definition, and that being so, the operation was one of unlawful gaming, and the appellant knowingly occupied the shop and permitted it to be used for that purpose.

Solicitors, Keith & Humphries; Chester, Broome, & Griffithes, for H. Booth & Sons, Oldham.

---

K. B. Div. (Wright, J.) March 26.

KIRKLAND v. PEATFIELD AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Limitations, Statute of—Mortgage of reversionary interest in really—Action on covenant—Remedy—Period of limitation—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 8.

The limitation of twelve years imposed by section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, to actions and suits for the recovery of money charged on land applies to an action by a mortgagee against mortgagors on a joint and several covenant to repay in a mortgage of a reversionary estate in realty, notwithstanding the fact that the estate is still reversionary at the time when the action is brought.

Case tried before Wright, J., without a jury.

The action was brought to recover the amount of principal and interest due under a joint and several covenant in a mortgage deed. The facts were as follows: Mrs. Lees, by her will dated the 18th of January, 1864, devised her real estate to trustees in trust for her sister, Ann L. Peatfield, for life, and after her death in trust to sell and divide the proceeds between the testatrix's nephews and nieces then living. The defendants were two of such nephews. Mrs. Lees died in August, 1864.

In May, 1881, the nephews and nieces, including the defendants, being entitled to the property subject to the life interest of Ann L. Peatfield, joined in a mortgage of their reversionary interest under the will to the plaintiff to secure the repayment of a sum of money advanced to them by him together with interest.

The mortgage deed contained the usual joint and several covenant by the mortgagors to repay the loan with interest.

Interest was paid up to, but not subsequent to, the 18th of October, 1882.

On the 7th of October, 1902, the plaintiff commenced an action to recover the amount of principal and interest due under the covenant. At this time the tenant for life was still living. The defendants in their defence pleaded that the claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Germaine, K.C. (G. A. Scott with him), for the plaintiff.—In the first place the reversionary interest of the defendants is personalty, as the will directed the real estate to be sold, and therefore the mortgage is a mortgage of personalty and consequently does come within section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, which limits the right of action to twelve years, but comes within section 3 of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42), which limits the right to twenty years: In re Raw, Morris v. Griffiths, 32 W. R. 986, 26 Ch. D. 601. In the next place, even if the mortgage be a mortgage of realty, still the Act of 1874 would not apply. The property mortgaged was property in a reversion, and until the property comes into possession the mortgagee can have no right against the land, therefore section 8 of the Act of 1874 does not apply to the covenant now sued upon. The period of limitation in this case is twenty years as in the case of an ordinary specialty debt.

Stanger, K.C. (F. O. Robinson with him), for the defendants.—The claim is barred by the Statute of Limitations. The action is brought to recover a sum of money which was "charged upon or payable out of any land within the meaning of section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874. That section applies to an action on a covenant in a mortgage as well as to the remedy on the security itself: Bowyer v. Woodman, L. R. 3 Eq. 313, 15 W. R. Dig. Ch. 91; Sutton v. Sutton, 31 W. R. 369, 22 Ch. D. 511. The period for limitation is therefore twelve years and not twenty years, and consequently the plaintiff's claim in this action is barred.

WRIGHT, J.—This is an action against mortgagors on their covenant to repay principal and interest thereon, and it is said that the period of limitation within which this action can be brought is twenty years, and not twelve years. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, does not apply because this mortgage is not a mortgage of land, but a mortgage of personalty. I feel no doubt, however, that it is a mortgage of an interest in land. That being so, why does not section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, apply? That section provides that "no action or suit or other proceeding shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage, judgment, or lien, or otherwise charged upon or payable out of any land or rent . . . but within twelve years next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued . . . unless in the meantime some part of the principal money, or some interest thereon, shall have been paid, or some acknowledgment of the right thereto shall have been given. . . ." It was decided in Sutton v. Sutton—the principle of which case was adopted in In re Frisby, Allison v. Frisby, 38 W. R. 65, 43 Ch. D. 106—that the limitation of twelve years imposed by section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, to actions and suits for the recovery of money charged on land applies to the personal remedy on the covenant in a mortgage deed as well as to the remedy against the land. I do not feel that it is open for me to read into section 8 the words of restriction or exception suggested by counsel on behalf of the plaintiff. The language of the section is wide enough to include an action on a covenant such as this, and there is therefore no reason to cut it down merely because the mortgage is a mortgage of a reversionary interest. There has been no payment of interest within twelve years of the commencement of this action, and the claim is therefore barred.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Judgment for defendants.

Solicitors for plaintiff, Taylor, Stileman, & Underwod, for J. W. & G. E. Kirkland, Nottingham.

Solicitors for defendants, Richard F. & C. L. Smith, for Bescoby & Williamson, East Retford.

---

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Earl of Halsbury, L.C., Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Sir F. Jeune, P.) And K. B. D. (Wright, J.) — Nov. 25, 1901; Jan. 16, 1902; Feb. 4.

SIMPSON v. TEIGNMOUTH AND SHALDON BRIDGE CO. (a.)

Tolls—Bicycle—Carriage hung on springs—5 Geo. 4, c. cxiv. s. 78.

By a private Act of Parliament passed in the reign of George IV. the defendants were empowered to levy tolls (inter alia) for every coach, chariot, hearse, chaise, berlin, landau and phaeton, gig, whiskey car, chair, or coburg, and for every other carriage hung on springs, the sum of sixpence for each wheel, and for each horse or other beast of draught drawing the same the sum of twopence.

Held, by Wright, J., that a bicycle which had a saddle hung on springs was a carriage hung on springs within the meaning of the section, but that the section only referred to carriages drawn by horses or other beasts of draught, and that therefore a bicycle ridden over the bridge was not chargeable within the section.

Held, by the Court of Appeal that a bicycle did not come within the class of carriage in respect of which the Act gave power to levy a toll.

Cannan v. Earl of Abingdon, 48 W. R. 470, [1900] 2 Q. B. 66, commented on.

Trial before Wright, J., without a jury.

The special case, stated by consent and by order of Master Archibald, set out the following facts:

1. In pursuance of an Act passed in the 5th year of the reign of George IV. entitled "An Act for building a bridge over the River Teign at Teignmouth, in the county of Devon, and for making approaches to the same," the defendants erected the bridge now known as the Teignmouth and Shaldon Bridge and constructed an approach thereto at each end of the bridge.

2. By section 78 of the said Act it is enacted among other things: "That the said company shall and may . . . cause to be erected and set up a turnpike gate or gates or toll gate or gates upon the said bridge, and the . . . tolls following shall be demanded . . . before any foot passenger, or any horse, mule, ass, or other beast, or any coach, wagon, cart, or other carriage shall pass or return over the said bridge or through the same—that is to say, for every person on foot, with a wheelbarrow or such-like carriage, the sum of 1d. . . . For every coach, chariot, hearse, chair, or coburg, and for every other carriage hung on springs, the sum of 6d. for each wheel, and for each horse or other beast of draught drawing the same the sum of 2d. For every wagon, timber carriage, wain, dray, truck, cart, or other such-like carriage with or without springs the sum of 6d., and for each horse or beast of draught drawing the same the sum of 2d."

3. The plaintiff is a member of the Cyclist Touring Club, and the defendants are the owners of the bridge, and entitled to take the tolls.

4. On the 17th of December, 1900, the plaintiff was desirous of passing over the bridge, riding a bicycle, and tendered to the defendants' servant, the keeper of the toll-gate, the sum of 1d. The keeper refused to allow the plaintiff to pass over the bridge without payment of 2d. as a toll, and the plaintiff paid such a sum to the keeper, the extra sum of 1d. being paid under duress and under protest, in order to obtain passage over the said bridge.

5. The plaintiff contends that the said Act did not authorize the defendants to charge him with a greater toll than 1d. when riding on a bicycle across the bridge.

6. The question for the opinion of the court is, what toll are the defendants entitled to charge the plaintiff with when passing over the bridge riding on a bicycle?

Macmorran, K.C. (Chester Jones with him), for the plaintiff.

Foote, K.C. (A. B. Shaw with him), for the defendants.

WRIGHT, J.—I do not think that the case of Plymouth, Stonehouse, and Devonport Tramways Co. v. General Tolls Co., 75 L. T. Rep. 467, 45 W. R. Dig. 161, helps me very much in this case. The courts there held that a tramcar drawn by horses was a coach drawn by horses. That was not a very subtle adaptation of the language used in the days when the old Act was passed to the present circumstances. Nor do I think that Cannan v. Earl of Abingdon, 48 W. R. 470, [1900] 2 Q. B. 66, helps me very much, for there the words cover "all other carriages whatsoever." The case of Williams v. Ellis, 28 W. R. 416, 5 Q. B. D. 175, is perhaps most in point, though perhaps not easy to reconcile with Cannan v. Earl of Abingdon. But after all it is necessary to consider the language of the particular Act to see whether, consistently with common sense and without violation of grammar, a bicycle can be said to be within the language of the Act, construed in its general sense. The Act, a local Act of 5 Geo. 4, no doubt uses in some of its sections very general words, and if I were not limited by the particular section which imposes tolls there would be a great deal to be said for the argument that no limitation was to be put on the word carriage, and that everything which for any ordinary purpose could be treated as a carriage, would be within the Act. But the language of the section which imposes the toll is different. It enacts "for every person on foot and if with a wheelbarrow or such-like carriage the sum of 1d."; that seems to be admitted to mean on foot whether with or without a wheelbarrow or such-like carriage. Then after dealing with animals not drawing, it goes on to say: [His lordship here read the passage, and proceeded:] That last part does not apply at all; and I must bring the bicycle, if at all, within the words, "For every other carriage hung on springs the sum of 6d. for each wheel." If I have to determine the case on the consideration of whether a bicycle comes within the words "carriage hung on springs" I must have further facts as to whether this particular bicycle or bicycles generally could be properly described as

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"carriages hung on springs." I think I must decide the case without reference to that for the present, leaving it open in case it should become necessary to be argued in the future.

It seems to me that I cannot, without doing violence to the meaning of the section, consider that the paragraph which is in question here is concerned with any other carriage except those that are drawn by horses or other beasts of draught. There must be some limits to the adaptation of the language of the old Acts of Parliament to modern circumstances. It is impossible that they can be stretched so as to meet everything that can be invented in modern days. The remedy is amending legislation. It seems plain to me that when read in any ordinary reasonable sense the last two paragraphs of this section deal solely with carriages or vehicles drawn by horses or other beast of draught. I do not think I can construe it otherwise, without doing violence to the ordinary rules of construction, and that is the conclusion to which I come. I am not asked to say whether a bicyclist riding his bicycle is a person on foot. That does not arise in this case. Nor does it arise whether he is a person on foot with a wheelbarrow or such-like carriage. There would be a good deal to say on both sides on either of these questions, and I had better say nothing to prejudice the judgment of those who have to decide them. At present it is enough for me to say that the 2d. toll is not justified.

His lordship on the 16th of January, 1902, heard further evidence as to whether the bicycle in question was a carriage hung on springs, and came to the conclusion that it was, but that as it was not intended for animal draught it was not within the section.

The defendants appealed, and the plaintiff also appealed against the latter part of his lordship's decision.

Duke, K.C., and A. B. Shaw, for the appellants.—The point is, is a bicycle fairly within the meaning of the Act? The object of the Act was to give to the company which constructed the bridge a tax on everything that could fairly be called a carriage. Cannan v. Earl of Abingdon decides that a bicycle is a carriage hung on springs. Williams v. Ellis was wrongly decided. There is a real likeness in a bicycle to a carriage with regard to its formation.

They also cited Taylor v. Goodwin, 27 W. R. 489, 4 Q. B. D. 228, and Plymouth, Stonehouse, and Devonport Tramways Co. v. General Tolls Co.

Chester Jones (Macmorran, K.C., with him), for the respondent.—A bicycle was expressly declared to be a carriage for the purposes of the Local Government Act, 1888, by section 85 of that Act. A bicycle does not carry a man; he propels it himself. [He was stopped by the court.]

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I do not see my way to differ from my learned brother Wright on this question. It appears to me that we have the decision of Lush and Bowen, L.JJ., in Williams v. Ellis on words which, for this purpose, I cannot distinguish from the words with which we have to deal, and certainly I feel great difficulty in saying that I entertain any different view from that which they have expressed. The truth is, that when you are dealing with a question of this sort and endeavouring to find out whether a thing is taxable or not under these Acts, or under this particular Act perhaps I ought to say, the first thing to do is to find out whether there is anything which corresponds in the ordinary and natural course of meaning to the language which the Legislature at the particular time used in making the things mentioned the subject of taxation. I do not think it is a question merely of words, whether the thing was called a coach or not if it was intended to fulfil the functions of a carriage according to the description given in the original Act. I quite agree that the mere fact that it was called by a different name would not matter, because the language would have been used by the Legislature in the sense which everybody could understand, and which would comprehend the thing although it might be called by another name. I think this is the meaning of the general words with which the section concludes, and that although there was a known certain form of coach or carriage which was in vogue at that time, yet in effect the Legislature says, "Well, if there are other things of this sort which are made hereafter, or which we have forgotten to enumerate, they will be equally liable to the tax." But in my view the whole substance of the thing is entirely reversed if in order to render the thing taxable you have to analyze the things done by a carriage and take some one or more of them and say, "this is applicable to this new thing." If that had been so, I do not believe the nature of the taxation would have been the same, and I think it is not immaterial to observe what the taxation was. Whether it is in the form of a rate or whether it is in the form of an imperial tax it is equally taking from the subject some money in "respect of something or another which he does or has the use of," and here the taxation would be for every wheel of the bicycle 6d. I omit the question of it being drawn by horses, because it comes within a different category. It is true that this has been modified by the company. I suppose it would be too monstrous to be thought that a bicycle should be charged a shilling because it has two wheels. I think it is not without importance in considering what was the nature of the thing in the contemplation of the Legislature at the time the Act was passed to observe that the tax of 6d. per wheel is placed upon it. I am quite contented with my brother Wright's judgment, confirmed, as I think it is, by the judgment in Williams v. Ellis of Lush, L.J., and Bowen, J., as he was at that time; and it is satisfactory to find that the learned judge (Lush, J.) who decided in Taylor v. Goodwin that a person riding a bicycle furiously might might be convicted of furiously driving a carriage, is the same judge who decided (in Williams v. Ellis) that a bicycle was not within the particular Act of Parliament under which an application was made to tax it; because it marks the distinction which the learned judge seems to have taken between a taxing Act, and something which is contemplated as being for the protection of the public, and to which therefore the widest possible scope must be given to anything which could by any possibility come within the mischief of the Act of Parliament. Nobody can doubt that a bicycle, whether it was a motor-car bicycle or only propelled by human agency, might be a dangerous thing if driven at an undue speed through a public highway. I confess I am not satisfied with the judgment of Phillimore, J. (in Cannan v. Earl of Abingdon), because to my mind I think it proceeded upon a wrong principle of construction. I do not think you can analyze scientifically the different functions and objects of each part of the machinery of what is alleged to be a carriage and say, "On, this carries somebody, and this does not carry somebody, and this is propelled by machinery and the other by human agency, and in this case the man's feet reach the ground, and in another case the man's feet are off the ground." I think that that is not only inapplicable to the matter in hand, but I think it proceeds upon a wrong principle of construction.

The broad principle, shortly, must be this: What would in any ordinary sense be considered a carriage, not by the particular name, but what would be the thing which would be in the contemplation of the Legislature at the time the Act was passed? If the thing so sought to be brought within it would substantially correspond to that thing—called by whatever name you please—I can imagine the tax would apply; but if not, it is not for the court to make an effort by ingenious subtleties to bring within the grasp of the tax something which was not intended—by that I do not mean intended by the word only, but not intended in substance to be the subject of taxation.

Under these circumstances, as I say, I do not at all feel that I can differ from my brother Wright in the conclusion at which he has arrived, and I think, therefore, his judgment ought to be affirmed.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I think it is better I should give my own reasons for concurring, as I do, with the judgment of the Lord Chancellor, because I do not want anything that I say to be cited in any case in which the terms of the Act of Parliament are not the same. I confess if we were in a position to deal with this question by some general description or definition of the word "carriage," while I do not wish to adopt entirely the view taken by my brother Phillimore, I should have great difficulty in saying that a bicycle may not in many Acts of Parliament be a carriage; but it seems to me that Wright, J., has really considered the question from the right point of view in regard to this Act, which is a charging Act. Now the charging section is with regard to any coach, wagon, cart, or other carriage that shall pass or return over the said bridge they have to pay certain tolls. Then come the classifications; the first one is—"For every person on foot, and if with a wheelbarrow or such-like carriage the sum of one penny." Therefore, as has been truly said by Mr. Duke in arguing this case for the purpose of this Act, a wheelbarrow is treated as a carriage. Then there comes the two charging sections at the end: "For every coach, chariot, hearse, chaise, berlin, landau and phaeton, gig, whisky car, chair, or coburg, and for every other carriage hung on springs, the sum of 6d. for each wheel, and for each horse or other beast of draught drawing the same the sum of 2d." Then: "For every wagon, timber carriage, wain, dray, truck, cart, or other such-like carriage with or without springs the sum of 6d. per wheel." Now, when you come to contrast those two it seems to me impossible to say that a bicycle is more ejusdem generis, if I may use that expression, with the last two clauses than it is with the first clause. I think that, as the Lord Chancellor said, looking to the maximum toll on every wheel and the names of the carriages which are there described, and the fact that they are coupled with an extra charge for the beast of burden, other carriages ejusdem generis must be something which were thought at the time this Act was passed would come within that class; in the same way "wheelbarrow or such-like carriage" would have to consist of what would come within that class at the time the Act was passed, and therefore under this Act of Parliament. That is all I wish to decide myself. I think a bicycle does not come within that class of carriage in respect of which the company was empowered to make a separate toll for it as a carriage.

Now there are one or two other matters I ought to mention, I think, in order to avoid misunderstanding afterwards. I have already said, I think, for the purpose of many Acts, that a bicycle may be a carriage, and I also think myself, though we have not heard it argued by the other side at present, that a bicycle described like this may be a carriage which is hung on springs, the word "hung" meaning "supported by." One knows the history of the word, and it does not mean hung in the ordinary sense of the word.

With regard to the two cases that have been cited, of course the decision of Lush, L.J., in Williams v. Ellis really turns entirely upon the same view of ejusdem generis, because, although the words were "every other carriage of whatever description," Lush, L.J., considered that as referring to a description of the carriage which had been mentioned in the earlier section, and that it must be "such other carriage of the like description with the carriage previously specified." Now as to the case of Cannan v. Earl of Abingdon before Phillimore, J., while I have already said that I do not want to be thought as accepting or entirely differing from his definition, the words there were very different indeed. The words were, "for every coach, chariot, berlin, hearse, chaise, chair, cabash, wagon, wain, dray, cart, car, or other carriage whatsoever," and I am by no means sure that if that had been the only charging section in this Act I should not have come to the same conclusion. I think, however, the judgment of Wright, J., is correct, because when you contrast the two charging sections and endeavour to apply the language cited in those two charging sections to the particular article proposed to be taxed here, I am by no means satisfied it comes within the charging section under which the charge was made. I think, therefore, the appeal should be dismissed.

Sir F. JEUNE, P.—I agree with the decisions which have just been given, and I only wish to add that it seems to me that Wright, J., was substantially right on the main ground on which he proceeded. There are three categories in this Act, and I quite agree that what we have to look at is the actual language in this Act. The first category is: "For every person on foot and if with a wheelbarrow or such-like carriage the sum of one penny." Then there are the other two, the first of which applies to a coach, carriage, chariot, hearse, and so on hung on springs, and the second obviously applies to carriages or carts used for the purpose of conveying heavy material which may be moved with or without springs. Now, within which of these three categories does a bicycle most fairly come? I do not feel disposed to hold it comes within any; but if it does come within any, I confess it appears to me to come more within the words "a wheelbarrow or such-like carriage" than it does within any other, for this reason, that the other categories apply only to carriages drawn by horses or other animals.

I agree with the view of Wright, J. The fact that horses are mentioned directly afterwards shews that the class of carriage which the Legislature had in its mind is that of a carriage which in its ordinary way would be drawn by a horse or other beast of burden. It is impossible to get away from that, and that is the view, as I understand it, on which Wright, J., proceeded. As regards the description of a carriage hung on springs I do not wish to express any difference of opinion from the Lord Chief Justice on that point, but I must confess I have very great difficulty in following, although it is a finding of fact, the statement which makes a bicycle, which has a seat supported on a spring, a carriage hung on springs. It appears to me to be a very forced mode of description, and one which would not be resorted to except for the apparent necessity of endeavouring to get a vehicle of this sort—of this somewhat peculiar description—within this particular section. I think that is all that is necessary for me to say, except that I think the judgment of Wright, J., is right, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, S. J. Williams.

Solicitors for the defendants, Bush, Mellor, & Norris.

[NOTE.—The question as to whether the bicycle was a carriage hung on springs was not argued in the Court of Appeal.]

---

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) March 19.

SMITH v. KYNNERSLEY AND OTHERS. (a.)

*Tolls—Bridge—"Sledge, drag, or such-like carriage"—Bicycle—*39 Geo. 3, c. xxviii., s. 11.

By section 11 of 39 Geo. 3, c. xxviii. the owners of a bridge across the Severn were empowered to take the following, amongst other, tolls for passage over the bridge: "For every coach, chariot, landau, berlin, hearse, chaise, calash, chair, or other such-like carriage" a certain sum according to the number of horses drawing it; "for every sledge, drag, or such-like carriage, the sum of 6*d."*

Held, that a bicycle was not a "such-like carriage" to a sledge or drag, and was not therefore chargeable with a toll of 6*d.*

Appeal from the judgment of Wright, J., upon a special case stated by consent for the opinion of the court.

Under 39 Geo. 3, c. xxviii., which was an Act passed in 1799 for building a bridge across the River Severn from or near Cressage, in the county of Salop, to the opposite shore, and for making roads and avenues thereto, and which recited that the passage over the Severn by a ford and ferry was often obstructed by floods, and was inconvenient and not suited to the accommodation of passengers from either side, the trustees named in the Act were empowered to erect a bridge known as the Cressage Bridge across the River Severn at a place where there had formerly been a ford and ferry, with approaches thereto; and the trustees accordingly constructed the bridge and the approaches.

By section 11 of the Act the bridge was vested in the trustees, and the trustees were empowered to take the following tolls for passage over the bridge: "For every coach, chariot, landau, berlin, hearse, chaise, calash, chair, or other such-like carriage drawn by six horses, mares, geldings, or mules, the sum of two shillings; and drawn by four horses, mares, geldings, or mules, the sum of one shilling and sixpence; and drawn by two horses, mares, geldings, or mules, the sum of one shilling; and drawn by one horse, mare, gelding, or mule, the sum of sixpence. For every horse, mare, gelding, mule, or ass, and for every pair or yoke of oxen or horned cattle, drawing or harnessed, or yoked, and intended to draw in any wagon, wain, cart, or other such like carriage, the sum of threepence. For every horse, mare, gelding, mule, or ass laden or unladen, and not drawing, the sum of one penny halfpenny. For every horse, mare, gelding, mule, or ass carrying double, the sum of twopence. For every drove of oxen, cows, or neat-cattle, the sum of tenpence per score; and so in proportion for any less number. For every drove of calves, hogs, sheep, or lambs, the sum of fivepence per score; and so in proportion for any less number. For every sledge, drag, or such-like carriage, the sum of sixpence. And for every foot passenger, one penny."

By section 29, when and as often as the bridge should receive such damage from unforeseen accidents that the passage thereof might become dangerous and impracticable, the trustees might provide a ferry across the river, and take the same tolls therefor as the Act authorized in the case of the bridge. By section 33 the bridge was not to be rated or assessed to any public or parochial rate or tax at any other or higher rate or value than the ferry stood rated for the year 1796, nor was the bridge to be deemed a county bridge, so as to subject the county to the repair or support thereof.

The plaintiff was a member of the Cyclists' Touring Club, and the defendants were the trustees of the bridge under the Act, and were entitled to demand and take the tolls. On the 7th of June, 1901, the plaintiff, desiring to pass over the bridge, riding on a bicycle, tendered to the keeper of the toll-gate one penny. The keeper refused to allow the plaintiff to pass over with his bicycle or riding on the same without payment of sixpence as a toll; and the plaintiff paid the sixpence, the extra sum of fivepence being paid under duress and under protest, in order that the plaintiff might obtain passage over the bridge with or riding on his bicycle.

The question for the opinion of the court was what toll the defendants were entitled to charge the plaintiff. If the court should be of opinion that the toll was 1d., judgment was to be entered for the plaintiff for the sum of 5d. with costs; if the court should be of opinion that the toll charged was correct, judgment was to be entered for the defendants with costs.

Wright, J., held that a bicycle did not come within the words "sledge, drag, or such-like carriage" in section 11 of the Act, and he gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Danckwerts, K.C., and R. Cunningham Glen, for the defendants.—A bicycle comes within the words of section 11 of 39 Geo. 3, c. xxviii., "sledge, drag, or such-like carriage," and is therefore liable to a toll of 6d. A sledge is a well-known form of carriage without wheels for carrying passengers or goods. "Drag" is defined in Johnson's Dictionary, 1755 edition, as "a kind of car drawn by the hand. The drag is made somewhat like a low car; it is used for the carriage of timber, and then is drawn by the handle by two or more men." A "such-like carriage" must be one having something in common with "sledge and drag." It must be a carriage, with or without wheels, intended to carry passengers or goods. A bicycle fulfils that condition. Secondly, the bridge is vested in the trustees and is not a public highway. No one therefore has a right to cross the bridge except the right given by implication in section 11 upon payment of a toll. The fact that section 33 of the Act made the bridge rateable shows that the trustees have an occupation of the bridge, because the mere right to take tolls without any occupation is not rateable: Rex v. Eyre, 12 East 416. Unless, therefore, a bicycle comes within section 11, a person was not entitled to bring it across the bridge. That is a strong argument to show that a bicycle must come within section 11.

They referred to Plymouth, Stonehouse, and Devonport Tramways Co. v. General Tolls Co., 14 Times L. R. 531; Taylor v. Goodwin, 27 W. R. 489, 4 Q. B D. 228; Williams v. Ellis, 28 W. R. 416 5 Q. B. D. 175; Cunnan v. Earl of Abingdon 48 W. R. 470 [1900] 2 Q. B. 66; Simpson v. Teignmouth and Shaldon Bridge Co., ante, p. 545, [1903] 1 K. B. 405.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Macmorran, K.C., and Chester Jones, for the plaintiff.—The words "sledge, drag, or such-like carriage" describe carriages without wheels. A sledge is clearly a carriage without wheels. A drag is defined in Murray's Dictionary as an "overland conveyance without wheels; a rough kind of sledge." It is a vehicle used for drawing timber. A sledge and drag are both drawn by power. A "such-like carriage" is therefore a carriage without wheels. A bicycle therefore does not come within that description.

Danckwerts, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I do not think that we ought to differ from the decision of my brother Wright. The only question we have to decide is whether a bicycle comes within the class or category specified in section 11 of 39 Geo. 3, c. xxviii., "sledge, drag, or such like carriage." I am not quite sure whether the canon of construction laid down by the Lord Chancellor in Plymouth, &c., Tramways Co. v. General Tolls Co. is quite identical with that laid down by him in Simpson v. Teignmouth and Shaldon Bridge Co. I think, however, that I am bound to assume that there is nothing inconsistent between the two canons of construction. Mr. Danckwerts has called our attention to the fact that the Act that was under consideration in Simpson v. Teignmouth and Shaldon Bridge Co. had not the same sort of provisions that the Lord Chancellor was dealing with in Plymouth, &c., Tramways Co. v. General Tolls Co. The latter case seems to me to be more like the present than Simpson's case. At the same time, I do not think that the distinction is such as to require us to apply any different rule from that laid down in Simpson's case; and I therefore propose to apply the rule of construction laid down by the Lord Chancellor in that case, where he said: "The broad principle of construction put shortly must be thus: What would, in an ordinary sense, be considered to be a carriage (by whatever specific name it might be called) in the contemplation of the Legislature at the time the Act was passed?" In that passage the Lord Chancellor used the words "carriage in the contemplation of the Legislature." In the present case we have to speak of a "sledge or drag in the contemplation of the Legislature." I do not think that we should leave out of consideration the fact that the schedule of tolls in section 11 was drawn in the form of dividing the vehicles therein mentioned into various categories. Upon looking at the schedule one finds that the carriages mentioned in the first clause and the last clause but one are different. I look to see what are the particular characteristics of the carriages mentioned in the first clause. It is obvious to my mind that the characteristics of the carriages there mentioned are that they are drawn by horses or other animals. When I look at the last clause but one I ask myself what are the characteristics of the carriages there described. It is common to both the earlier and the later categories that the carriages should be drawn. I am not quite clear that the Act intended to draw a distinction in the two categories between carriages with wheels and carriages without wheels. But whichever category one takes it is clear that the carriages intended to be described are carriages to be drawn. Upon that view I do not think that a bicycle comes within the words "sledge, drag, or such-like carriage."

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether an ordinary bicycle is chargeable with a toll of 6d. under the words "sledge, drag, or such-like carriage." It is clearly not a sledge or drag. To be chargeable with the toll the carriage must be a "such-like carriage"—that is to say, a carriage ejusdem generis with sledge or drag. Is an ordinary bicycle a thing of the same nature as a sledge or drag? In deciding that question we have to apply the principle laid down by the Lord Chancellor in Simpson v. Teignmouth and Shaldon Bridge Co.—namely, to ascertain "what would, in an ordinary sense, be considered to be a carriage in the contemplation of the Legislature at the time the Act was passed." I ask myself whether a bicycle is of such a character as in an ordinary sense is like a sledge or drag, and the only answer I can give is no.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We cannot discard the ordinary rules of construction in construing this section. The clause in the section on which the defendants rely is "sledge, drag, or such-like carriage." To my mind those words were never intended to and do not properly include a bicycle. A bicycle is not ejusdem generis with sledge or drag.

Appeal dismissed

Solicitor for the plaintiff, Leslie J. Williams.

Solicitors for the defendants, Gustavus Thompson & Son.

---

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — March 3.

In re MAUNDER. (a.)
MAUNDER v. MAUNDER.

Will—Construction—Gift over—Death "before becoming entitled"—Entitled "in right" or "in possession"—Vesting.

A testatrix gave real estate to her son R. for his life, and after his death specifically among her grandchildren, R.'s sons and daughters, but in the event of any of her grandchildren dying "before becoming entitled" then over.

Held, upon the construction of the will, that the words "becoming entitled" meant "entitled in possession."

Decision of Joyce, J. (ante, p. 31, [1902] 2 Ch. 875), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Joyce, J. (reported in ante, p. 31, [1902] 2 Ch. 875).

Mary Maunder, by her will dated in 1889, gave her real and personal estate to trustees upon trust for her son R. for his life, and on his decease she made specific devises of parts of her real estate among her eight grandchildren, the sons and daughters of R. absolutely. The will continued as follows: "If there shall be any residue of my trust estate not disposed of, I direct my said trustees to pay the income thereof to my said son's wife for her life, and after her death to realize such residue and divide the net proceeds amongst all the children of my said son. And in the event of either of my grandchildren dying before becoming entitled to any share of my estate hereinbefore in any way disposed of, I direct that the child or children of such deceased grandchild shall take the parent's share, or, if there shall be no such child or children, then that such share or devise or bequest hereinbefore contained shall vest equally in all my surviving grandchildren."

The testatrix died in 1891, leaving her son R. and seven of her said eight grandchildren her surviving; another grandchild who survived the testatrix, and was also a son of R., had been (in effect), by a codicil made in 1890, substituted as a beneficiary in the place of the grandchild who had died, and there were thus eight surviving grandchildren claiming under the dispositions of the testatrix.

(a.) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Upon a summons taken out by R., the plaintiff and sole acting executor, to determine the construction of the above clause, Joyce, J., held that dying "before becoming entitled" meant dying before becoming "entitled in possession," and that the gift over might therefore take effect at any time prior to the death of the tenant for life.

One of the grandchildren appealed.

Warrington, K.C., and George Cave, for the appellant, referred to the cases cited in the court below.

P. F. Wheeler, Manby, Gatey, and W. H. Cozens-Hardy, for the various respondents, were not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—Upon the construction of this will, I think it clear that the decision of Joyce, J., was right. The clause by which the testatrix directs that after the death of her son's wife the residue is to be divided "amongst all the children of my said son" includes grandchildren who may be born after the death of the testatrix, and this shows that the words "dying before becoming entitled" cannot mean only dying before the testatrix, but must mean dying during the life of the tenant for life. The appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Solicitors, Oldfield, Bartram, & Oldfield; Leslie Antill & Arnold; Marshall & Co.; Young & Sons.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Byrne, J. } May 7, 8.

GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE BOOTLE UNION v. GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE WHITEHAVEN UNION AND OTHERS. (a.)

Local government—Portion of one parish added to another—Order of county council confirmed by Local Government Board—Poor law union of added portion—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c 41), s. 57.

A portion of a parish in one poor law union being added to another parish in another poor law union by an order of the county council, confirmed by the Local Government Board under section 57 of the Local Government Act, 1888, it follows as a legal consequence that the portion added to the parish becomes included within the poor law union of the parish to which it is added.

The question in this case was whether a portion of another parish which had been added to the parish of Seascale belonged to the poor law union to which Seascale belonged or still remained in its former union.

The old parish of Seascale, in the county of Cumberland, adjoined that of Drigg and Carleton in the same county. The former parish was wholly situate within the poor law union of Whitehaven, and the latter parish within the union of Bootle. Seascale was also within the rural sanitary district of Whitehaven, and Drigg and Carleton within that of Bootle.

It was desired to alter the boundaries of the parish of Seascale, and application was accordingly made to the county council of Cumberland, which made an order to that effect in 1901, which order with certain modifications was confirmed by the Local Government Board by an order called "The County of Cumberland (Seascale, Drigg and Carleton) Confirmation Order, 1901," under section 57 of the Local Government Act, 1888.

By article 1 of this order (which article was not modified by the board) there was to be added to the parish of Seascale so much of the adjacent parish of Drigg and Carleton as was contained within certain boundaries described in the article, and marked on the map therein mentioned.

Article 2 (which was also not modified) provided that the whole of the parish of Seascale as so extended by that order should be included in and form part of the Bootle rural sanitary district, and that the then boundaries of the Bootle and Whitehaven rural districts should be altered accordingly.

Article 3 provided for the then members of the respective parish councils continuing in office till the next ordinary day of retirement and fixed the future numbers of councillors.

Article 4, as modified by the confirmation order, provided that the person holding the office of rural district councillor for the existing parish of Seascale should continue to hold such office for the enlarged parish upon the Bootle Rural District Council instead of upon the Whitehaven Rural District Council.

There was no provision in the confirmation order expressly dealing with the poor law union of the enlarged parish or of its added portion.

Under these circumstances the guardians of the poor of the Whitehaven Union issued precepts to the overseers of the parish of Seascale requiring them to contribute to the common fund of the Whitehaven Union certain sums calculated as the contribution from the parish as extended by the order—that is, upon the footing that the added portion formed part of the Whitehaven Union, and the overseers of Seascale accordingly made rates, which they proposed to levy, to answer those precepts in which all the rateable hereditaments within the added portion of the parish were assessed.

The guardians of the poor of the Bootle Union thereupon brought this action against the guardians of the poor of the Whitehaven Union and the overseers of the parish of Seascale, claiming a declaration that the added portion of the parish of Seascale was situate within and formed part of the Bootle poor law union, and an injunction to restrain the defendant union from causing the rates to be levied, and the defendant overseers from levying them, upon the occupiers within the added portion of the parish.

Levett, K.C., and R. C. Glen, for the plaintiffs.—The order does not purport to make any change in the union of the added portion of the parish. If it did so purport it would be inoperative, as the county council has no such power, nor has the Local Government Board in the circumstances of the case. The case of Reg. v. Keighley, Local Government Chronicle, 1897, p. 47, shows that a portion may be added to a parish without the burial district of the added portion being changed to that of the parish to which it has been added. The same principle applies to the area of a poor law union.

Macmorran, K.C., and Naldrett, for the defendant guardians.—The added portion comes within the same union as the parish to which it has been added as a legal consequence of the addition, because it has become part of the parish to which it is added. The identity of that parish is not destroyed (West Ham Union v. London County Council. 50 W. R. 275, [1902] 1 K. B. 562), and the enlarged parish remains in the same union as the old parish: Reg. v. Durham County

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Council, reported in Local Government Chronicle, 1897, p. 70. A parish cannot be in two unions at once: Poor Law Amendment Act, 1831, ss. 26, 32.

BYRNE, J.—The order in this case was made under section 57 of the Local Government Act, 1888. It is pointed out that there is no power under the Act for a county council to make an order altering the area of a poor law union as such, though there is power given by section 58 for the Local Government Board to make certain orders with reference to poor law unions where the union is situate in more than one county, and there are other Acts of Parliament expressly enabling the board under certain circumstances to deal with these areas. Now what is the consequence with reference to the area of the poor law union of the addition of this portion of the parish of Drigg and Carleton to that of Seascale? A poor law union consists, and as far as I know always has consisted, of parishes, and in the Acts of Parliament to which I have been referred these unions were made with reference to parishes. I have not been told whether some modern Acts may not have modified this in special cases, but generally speaking the statement is true. Does that mean that a poor law union must consist of parishes not only of the same area, but also of the identical areas of which it consisted at the time of its creation, unless expressly altered by some authority having power to alter its area? In West Ham Union v The County Council of London, where by an order of the Local Government Board a portion of a parish had been added to another parish in which a pauper had acquired a settlement, and where the question was raised whether the order had destroyed the identity of the parish which had been added to, the present Master of the Rolls said, "This case seems to me to fall outside the line of cases cited as authorities for the appellants' contention, which do not prevent us from saying that a mere accretion of a small portion of the parish of Wanstead to the parish of West Ham, where such accretion does not purport to destroy the identity of West Ham, does not in fact have that effect." And Romer, L.J., said, "The parish of West Ham has not been destroyed, but still exists as a parish notwithstanding that some portion of another parish has been added to it." And Mathew, L.J., takes a similar view. So that you may have a parish added to by virtue of an order, yet remaining the same parish with the same name. I think that that is the case here. The poor law union of Whitehaven still includes the parish of Seascale. That parish is of different dimensions from those of which it formerly consisted, but the identity of the parish has not been destroyed, and I do not see my way to hold that a portion only of the parish of Seascale is included within the area of the union of Whitehaven. But it is said that, there being no express power to change the area of the union, the county council and Local Government Board could not by this procedure do anything which would have that effect. The answer is that although the actual acreage of the union is enlarged, the area reckoned by parishes is not increased. Why, then, should not the legal consequences of the addition of a portion to the parish follow? It is true that there is no express power given by the Act to alter the area of the poor law union, but there are no words in the Act to negative the legal consequences arising from the addition made under statutory authority. Certain anomalies result from the position created, but I understand that Local Government Board can deal with matters of that description, and, I suppose, an application can at any time be made to invoke those powers should these anomalies prove burdensome. I ought not to part with this case without referring to to the case of Reg. v. Keighley, where the learned judge came to the conclusion that no direction to alter a burial district had been given by an order altering the parish boundaries. That case does not apply here, because here the county council could not have ordered the poor law area to be altered.

Action dismissed.

Solicitors, Leonard H. West, for John Clark, Broughton-in-Furness; Speechley, Mumford, & Craig, for Atkinson & Bennett, Whitehaven.

---

Chan. Div. } March 18, 19.
Farwell, J. }

ROBINSON v. GIFFARD AND OTHERS. (a.)

Estate tail—Grant by Crown for services rendered—Consideration—Reversion in Crown—Power to disentail—Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74), s. 18—34 & 35 Hen. 8, c. 20, s. 2.

An estate tail granted by the Crown to a subject "for divers good causes and considerations" (with reversion to the Crown in case of lack of heirs who can take under the grant) comes within the exceptions mentioned in section 18 of the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833, and 34 & 35 Hen. 8, c. 20, and is therefore not barrable.

Special case.

By a grant by a writ of Privy Seal, dated the 24th of July, 1675, King Charles II. "for divers good causes and considerations us hereunto especially moving and of our especial grace, certain knowledge and mere motion" gave and granted certain fee farm rents issuing out of lands in certain counties to trustees upon trust, as to £100 per annum, part thereof, for the use of Mary, relict of Richard Pendrell, for life, and after her death for the use of the heirs of the body of Richard Pendrell, and for want of such heirs for the use of his Majesty. It was not stated in the grant for what consideration it was made, but it was alleged that Richard Pendrell had assisted King Charles II. in his escape from the battle of Worcester in 1651.

By a decree made on the 10th of December, 1846, in Giffard v. Withington (unreported) it was declared that the annuities specified in the deed of grant were of the nature of real estate and well entailed by the deed.

On the 5th of November, 1856, Robert McLaren, one of the heirs of the body of Richard Pendrell, purported to execute a disentailing assurance of a third part of the annuity in favour of George Robinson, and similar deeds were executed by James Withington on the 7th of November, 1857, and by McLaren and Withington on the 18th of March, 1859, by which the remaining two-thirds were granted to George Robinson.

Robinson died in 1880, having devised all his real and personal estate to the plaintiff, Walter Robinson, who was in receipt of the annuity till 1900, when payment was stopped by the defendant, Walter Giffard, who was the trustee of the deed of grant of 1675.

Robert McLaren was still living, and his grandson, Robert McLaren, was added as defendant to represent the heirs of the body of Richard Pendrell other than the elder McLaren.

The questions submitted for the opinion of the court were:

(1) Whether the several indentures of the 5th of November, 1856, the 7th of November, 1857, and the

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

18th of March, 1859, were effectual for the purpose of barring and defeating all and every or any of the estates in tail either at law or in equity of Robert McLaren and James Withington of and in the annuity of £100, and the estates in tail in remainder expectant on the determination of such estates.

(2) Whether Walter Robinson was entitled under or by virtue of the said indentures to payment of the annuity during the joint lives of Robert McLaren and James Withington, and to payment of a moiety or any and what other portion thereof during the life of either of them.

Upjohn, K.C., and Martelli, for plaintiff.

Underhill, for Giffard.

H. M. Humphry, for the other defendants.—Though the services rendered were not stated in the grant, there was ample record in existence in the state papers of the reign of Charles II. and on the tomb of Richard Pendrell, as to what those services were. The services would be presumed by the court. In the case of Duke of Grafton v. The London and Birmingham Railway Co., 5 Bing. N. C. 27, the estate tail was granted by the king in consideration of natural love and affection, not for services rendered to the Crown, as in this case.

FARWELL, J., said that the first point raised, whether the estate was an estate tail, was concluded by the decree of the Vice-Chancellor in the case of Giffard v. Withington, so that it must be deemed that there was an estate tail created by the grant. The second point raised, whether that estate tail could be barred or not, depended on section 18 of the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833, which ran as follows: "The power of disposition hereinbefore contained shall not extend to tenants of estates tail, who, by an Act passed in 34 & 35 Hen. 8, intituled 'an Act to embar feigned recovery of land wherein the king is in reversion,' or by any other Act are restrained from barring their estates tail." He was therefore thrown back to 34 & 35 Hen. 8, c. 20. Two points were taken on this. It was said that, taking the Act of Parliament and the reading in Co. Litt. 372, b 6, together, Charles II., at the time he received the services of the Pendrells after the battle of Worcester was not king de facto, and that they were not therefore subjects within the meaning of the Act, because he was a fugitive, and the power of the Crown was really in the hands of the Protector. In his opinion that was not the true view. Subsequent legislation when Charles II. was restored proceeded to wipe out the legislation of the Commonwealth, and declared what was still believed the law, that the assent of the king was necessary to an Act of Parliament, and accorded with a statement in 3 Inst., at pp. 6, 7, that "there must always be a king by law." In his opinion, therefore, Charles was, for the purposes of the Act under discussion, a king to whom services might be rendered within the meaning of the Act. A reference had been made to the Statute of Treasons and to the distinction between a king de facto and de jure. But this particular case was not of that class of cases, and depended on other matters. It really became necessary during the Wars of the Roses and the various civil wars which took place in earlier times that there should be some security for people who wanted to live quietly, and that they should not be deemed traitors in one year and loyal in the next. Consequently provision was made to enable allegiance to be rendered to a king de facto, who was not king de jure then, but might become so afterwards. It could not be said, therefore, that the terms of the Act of Henry VIII. had not been complied with. There was this, of course, to be considered, that, unless the king de jure did in due course become king de facto, he never could have made a grant which would have had any effect on the revenues of the Crown. But inasmuch as he did become king de facto, then having regard to the legislation which he had referred to, he was king de jure from the death of Charles I., and therefore services might be rendered to him by subjects within the meaning of the Act.

The other point was this: It was said that the wording of the grants produced from the Record Office showed that there was consideration for the earlier grants, but that the grant of 1675 was simply "for divers good causes and considerations." But the answer to that seemed to be that it must be inferred from the evidence that these "divers good causes and considerations" were the services referred to in the former grants. It was a matter of common knowledge and perhaps of judicial cognizance that when the king first returned there were certain difficulties in finance, and he could not grant rewards to his subjects then, but time had to elapse and they had to take what they could get. The true results of the documents before the court was that the grant of 1675 was a final grant to which the others were temporary, and up to which they led. The result was that the grant was within the exception in section 18 of the Fines and Recoveries Act, and within 34 & 35 Hen. 8, c. 20, and was therefore not barrable.

It was not arguable, however, that each individual had not the right during his life to dispose of his interest. The grant would be good during the lifetime of the grantor. As to one moiety the grantor was still alive, and the plaintiff was entitled to that moiety during the life of the grantor, but as regards the other grantor there was no evidence whether he was alive or dead, and there must be an inquiry.

Solicitors for plaintiff, Francis & Johnson.

Solicitors for Giffard, Nussey & Fellowes.

Solicitors for defendants, Petch & Co.

---

Chan. Div.
Buckley, J. } Feb. 25, 26.

In re D'ESTE'S SETTLEMENT TRUSTS.
POULTER v. D'ESTE. (a.)

Conflict of laws—Power of appointment—Execution—Domiciled foreigner—Will valid by law of domicil but invalid by English law—General bequest—Construction—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 27.

Although a will executing a power takes effect as operating on the instrument containing the power, and must be read as if it was interpolated into that instrument, yet being a will, it must, in the absence of a contrary intention, be construed according to the law of the domicil of the testator. In such construction, if the domicil of the testator be foreign, section 27 of the Wills Act, which is a rule for the construction only of wills of which an English court is the court of construction, has no place, in the absence of any express direction that the will is to be construed according to English law.

A French subject domiciled in France, having a power of appointment over a fund under an English instrument, left all her property to her husband by a will which was valid according to French, but invalid according to English law. The will contained no express reference to the power, and no express direction that it was to be construed according to English law. Administration with the will annexed was granted in England.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the power had not been exercised.

In re Price, 48 W. R. 373, [1900] 1 Ch. 442, distinguished.

Adjourned summons.

By the marriage settlement, dated the 17th of August, 1874, of the Baroness D'Este, trustees were directed to stand possessed of certain British and colonial investments transferred to them by the Baroness in contemplation of her marriage, on trust for herself and her husband for their respective lives, and after the death of the survivor for the issue of the marriage as therein mentioned, and if there should be no such issue, as she should (if covert) by will appoint, and in default of appointment, in the event which happened, for her next-of-kin according to the statute as if she had died possessed thereof domiciled in England, intestate, and without having been married.

She married Baron D'Este in England on the 18th of August, 1874. He was at that time, and has ever since continued to be, a French subject, domiciled in France. At the date of the marriage she was a British subject, domiciled in England.

Baroness D'Este died, during a temporary visit to this country, on the 17th of February, 1902. There never was any issue of the marriage.

On the 12th of September, 1876, she had made an unattested holograph will in French form and in the French language. The relevant passage was translated as follows: "I appoint Baron D'Este my general and universal legatee. I consequently bequeath him all the personal and real property that shall belong to me at my decease and shall compose my estate. He shall enjoy and dispose of the same absolutely as from the day of my death."

On the 28th of August, 1902, administration with the will annexed was granted to the Baron by the Probate Division.

At the date of her death the only property of the Baroness, other than that over which she had the power of appointment, consisted of cash standing to her credit at her bankers in England, and certain property in France.

Baron D'Este claimed the capital of the property comprised in the settlement. The trustees accordingly took out the present summons asking whether the power had been validly exercised.

It appeared that the will had been, according to French law, validly executed. A power of appointment is foreign to the principles of French law, and, consequently, there are no rules of construction applicable to a French will, by virtue of which general expressions would be held to exercise a power. In general, therefore, if a French court had to determine the question whether certain words or phrases exercised a power conferred by an English instrument, it would apply English law. If, however, the will had to be construed according to French law, the words used would exclude property over which the testatrix had only a power of appointment.

Ingpen, K.C., and Ashworth James, for the trustees.

Astbury, K.C., and F. A. Milne, for Baron D'Este.—According to French law the will was well executed, and on that footing administration with the will annexed has been granted in England. The will, in addition to its testamentary effect, operates as an exercise of a power; to that extent it must be read as part of the settlement creating the power, and must be construed according to the law of the settlement, which is English: D'Huart v. Harkness, 13 W. R. 513, 34 Beav. 324. Section 27 of the Wills Act is now part of the law of England, and applies to all testamentary exercises of English powers: In the Goods of Alexander, 8 W. R. 451, 29 L. J. P. & M. 93. The same doctrine was laid down in In re Price, 48 W. R. 373, [1900] 1 Ch. 442, and the particular words in the will in that case were immaterial to the decision.

They also referred to In the Goods of Joys, 30 L. J. P. & M. 169, 9 W. R. Pro. Dig. 7; In re Kingdon, 34 W. R. 634, 32 Ch. D. 604; Povey v. Hordern, [1900] 1 Ch. 492, 48 W. R. Dig. 208; Barretto v. Young, [1900] 2 Ch. 339, 48 W. R. Dig. 143; De Nicols v. Curlier, 48 W. R. 269, [1900] A. C. 21; and Bremer v. Freeman, 5 W. R. 618, 10 Moo. P. C. 306.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Maugham, for persons entitled in default of appointment.—The document must be construed according to the law of the domicil of the testator, which was French. By French law it did not exercise the power. The Wills Act is not applicable to the wills of foreigners: Bremer v. Freeman.

T. T. Methold, in the same interest.

Astbury, K.C., replied.

BUCKLEY, J., stated the facts, and continued: At her death the general power of appointment existed. The question I have to decide is whether by her French will she has exercised that power.

In the first place, it is plain that where an English instrument contains a power exercisable by will, that power may be exercised either by a will executed in accordance with the law of this country or by any instrument recognized by the law of this country as being a will. A will executed by a domiciled foreigner according to the law of his domicil is in this country recognized as a valid will although it is not executed in accordance with the law of this country. Accordingly the will of this French lady is a valid will, and, as such, has been admitted to probate. The question, then, is whether that will has exercised the power. The will refers neither to the power nor to the property, and, unless this French will can have the benefit of section 27 of the Wills Act it cannot be contended that it exercised a power. The question, therefore, resolves itself into this, is section 27 available?

In the next place, it will be noticed that for the purpose of such a will as this you must exclude sections 9 and 10 of the Wills Act, otherwise the thing would be no will. According to section 9 the will must be attested by two witnesses. This will was not. According to section 10, to exercise the power of appointment it must be executed in the manner required for the execution of a will. It is not so executed; therefore if sections 9 and 10 apply, this is not a will at all. But it is said although sections 9 and 10 are excluded, as they are plainly by reason of the fact that our law recognizes a will not executed according to our law, but executed according to the law of the domicil of the testatrix, that to such a will section 27 is nevertheless applicable. It appears to me that that is not the case. Section 27, as I understand it, is a rule of construction. It is a section which requires that in reading a document you shall attribute to its language a meaning which, but for that section, it would not bear. It is a rule of construction applicable to documents as to which this court is a court of construction. What would be the court of construction to determine the effect of this French will? In my opinion, this being a foreign instrument executed by a foreigner in her domicil, primâ facie it would have to be considered according to the law of the domicil. That is not, indeed, disputed. But it is said, and said truly, that where you have a power executed by will, the thing which you look at must no doubt be a will, for otherwise it is not an exercise of the power; but when you have got it and read it, it takes effect, not as a will, because, ex hypothesi, the property does not belong to the testator, but it operates with reference to the settlement containing the power. To an extent that is true. Then it is said that I must take this French document and read it, not as a will in the sense in which I have explained, but as if the directions contained in that document were introduced into the instrument which contained the power. That is quite right; but how must I read it? I have to introduce into the instrument which contains the power referentially a foreign document. I have to see that the power was exercised according to the meaning expressed by the donee of the power. Now, how am I to ascertain the meaning of the donee of the power? I must ascertain it according to the law of the place applicable to the document and to the domicil of the person executing the document, and that is to be taken as the law governing its construction. If I do that, I have then to read the French will and say on the principle of French construction, excluding, therefore, section 27, which is a rule for English construction, what the testatrix meant. The evidence as to the French law is that powers of appointment are unknown in France. If a court of construction in France were to read this document it would have to be informed by evidence what a power of appointment is in our law; and having learned what it is it would have to apply the proper principles of construction in France to ascertain whether or not this property has passed under this instrument. Section 27, which is a rule of construction here and not there, as it appears to me, would have no place in the discussion. You may state the proposition in either one of two ways. Sections 9 and 10 of the Wills Act must be excluded, or otherwise this is not a will at all. If you exclude those you exclude them because, although they form part of the Wills Act, they do not apply to such a will as this, and you must exclude also section 27. Or you may state it in the other form, that in a French court the rule of construction under section 27 is not a rule applicable at all.

I have thus discussed the matter upon principle; but the point really is governed, I think, by the decision of Stirling, J., in In re Price, 48 W. R. 373, [1900] 1 Ch. 442. I do not propose to deal with any of the earlier authorities; the learned judge went through them there. As I understand the decision in In re Price, the learned judge decided, in the first place, that a will valid according to the law of the domicil of the testator is a valid will for the purpose of the power contained in an English instrument giving power to dispose of property by will; and secondly, he decided that, inasmuch as that will contained the words "It shall thus be considered in England the same as in France," that the testatrix had said or might say in effect, if you choose you are to read the language of this my will upon those principles of construction which would be applicable in England to a will. If she had said so, she would in effect have said, "for the purpose of this my will you may take it I am meaning to dispose of not only my property, but also of that which I have by way of power; in other words, I mean you to introduce section 27." In the absence of those words, as I understand the learned judge, he would have arrived at a contrary conclusion. If there had not been words to introduce the English rule of construction he would have thought that the will did not deal with it. He says upon this last point that the question is one of construction; "in general a will is to be construed according to the law of the domicil of the testator," and then he cites from Dicey (Conflict of Laws, p. 695): "But this is a mere canon of interpretation which should not be adhered to when there is any reason, from the nature of the will or otherwise, to suppose that the testator wrote it with reference to the law of some other country." And then, as to that the learned judge goes on to say that there is in the will something to show that the testatrix wrote it with reference to the law of England, because the testatrix had said it was thus to be considered in England the same as in France. He says: "I think it is indicated upon the face of the will that she wrote it with reference to the law of England as well as the law of France. Therefore I think that I am entitled to apply the rules of construction which would by English law be applied." And he applies it; but I think in the absence of these words he could not have so applied English rules of construction.

I hold, therefore, that this lady's will did not exercise the power.

Solicitors, Nicholl, Manisty, & Co.; Burne & Wykes; McC. Poulter; T. D. Boulton.

---

K. B. Div. (Bigham, J.) — May 6, 13.

BOARD OF TRADE v. SAILING SHIP GLENPARK (LIMITED). (a.)

Ship — Seaman — "Distressed Seamen" — "Sufficient evidence"—Merchant Shipping Acts, 1894, (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 44).

The owners of a vessel which had been wrecked paid the shipwrecked crew the balance of wages due to them. Some of the crew were maintained and provided with a passage to the United Kingdom by the Governor of South Australia, acting by the Marine Board of South Australia, on behalf of the Crown. The wages paid were in excess of the expense thus incurred.

The Board of Trade, on behalf of the Crown, under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 193, sued the shipowners to recover the expenses so incurred.

Held, that such seamen were "distressed seamen" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1894 and 1898, and that the possession of wages was immaterial; "sufficient evidence" in section 193, subsection 3, of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, means conclusive evidence.

Action tried in Commercial Court.

This was an action brought by the Board of Trade under sections 193 of 57 & 58 Vict. c. 60. to recover a sum of money from the owners of The Glenpark, being expenses incurred in maintaining and sending a party of shipwrecked sailors from Australia to England.

The facts appear from the following statement:

1. The defendants were at all material times the registered owners of The Glenpark, a British ship within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. 2. In May, 1900, The Glenpark left Barry (Cardiff) on a voyage to Cape Town and (or) any ports or places within the limits of 75 deg. north and 60 deg. south latitude, the maximum time to be three years' trading in any rotation and to end in the United Kingdom or Continent of Europe between the Elbe and Brest inclusive, at master's option. 3. On the 29th of January, 1901, The Glenpark, in the course of the said voyage, left Port Germein, in South Australia, on a voyage to Algoa Bay, her crew consisting of twenty-six hands all told—namely, master, two mates, cook, steward, carpenter, sailmaker, boatswain, five apprentices (one of whom acted as third mate), twelve A.B.'s, and one ordinary seaman. 4. On the 1st of February, 1901, The Glenpark struck on a sunken rock near Wedge Island, in Spencer Gulf, South Australia, and became a total wreck. The crew lost the whole of their effects except the clothes they were wearing, but were saved and taken in the ship's boats to Port Victoria, in South Australia, arriving there on the 2nd of February, 1901. The log and agreement with the crew were lost with the vessel. 5. Between the 2nd of February and the 4th of February, 1901, the crew were subsisted at Port Victoria by the Governor of South Australia on behalf of the Crown, acting by the Marine Board of South Australia, at a cost (excluding that incurred in respect of the master) of £13 1s. 6d. On the 4th of February, 1901, the crew were provided with passages from Port Victoria to Port Adelaide by the same authority at a cost (excluding that incurred in respect of the master) of £20 16s. 7. The crew on their arrival on the 4th of February at Port Adelaide were (except the master) subsisted there by the same authority at a cost of £26 5s., and were also provided by the same authority with necessary clothing. 8. On the 6th of February, 1901, the representatives of the owners of The Glenpark at Port Adelaide, in the presence of the superintendent of the Mercantile Marine Board of South Australia, paid each member of the crew the balance of wages due to him under the agreement with the crew up to to time the vessel was lost. 9. The majority of the said crew obtained employment at Port Adelaide, but eight members thereof failed to obtain any employment and were provided with passages to the United Kingdom by the same authority at a cost of £63 2s. 6d. 10. As regards each member of the crew (excluding the master) the total expenses incurred on his behalf by the said authority are altogether the sum of £236 5s. 1d. 11. The Board of Trade, on behalf of the Crown, paid the said sum of £236 5s. 1d. to the said authority as money due to them in respect of expenses incurred on account of distressed seamen within the meaning of section 193 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and the Board of Trade contend that they are entitled, on behalf of the Crown, to recover the whole of that sum from the defendants under the same section. 12. The defendants have paid to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs have accepted, both without prejudice, various sums amounting in all to £136 6s. 2d. in respect of the expenses of members of the crew, fourteen in number, and with regard to the expenses of such members the defendants have admitted liability; and no question of further payment in reference to such members now arises. As regards these fourteen members of the crew, the wages so paid to them were in every case less than the amount expended on their behalf as hereinbefore mentioned. The said sum of £136 6s. 2d. is, in fact, greater by £1 5s. 6d. than the amount of the said expenses, but the difference is for the purpose of this case to be treated as immaterial. The balance of the total sum of £236 2s. 1d. mentioned in paragraph 10 of this case—namely, £99 18s. 11d., has never been paid to the plaintiffs by the defendants in whole or in part, and the plaintiffs now claim such balance from the defendants in this action. Such balance represents the amount of expenses incurred on behalf of the eleven remaining members of the crew other than the fourteen members above mentioned, the wages paid to whom as aforesaid were in every case greater than the expenses so incurred.

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., Sir E. Carson, S.G., and Sutton.—The seamen were "distressed seamen" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act; the possession of wages makes no difference; and the provision in section 193, sub-section 3, of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, as to the production of the account and proof of payment for and on behalf of the Board of Trade being "sufficient evidence that the expenses were incurred or repaid under this Act by or on behalf of the Crown" means the evidence to be conclusive evidence.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Leslie Scott.—If a seaman has sufficient money—that is, sufficient money to support himself—he cannot be a "distressed" seaman. To be "distressed" a sailor must be in distress, and by reason of one of the causes—e.g., shipwreck. A sailor need not be distressed the whole time; it is possible for one to cease to be distressed and afterwards to again become distressed. "Sufficient evidence" (sub-section 3 of section 193) means sufficient in absence of proof to the contrary. These words are not strong enough to enable the Board of Trade to shut out evidence: Barraclough v. Greenhough, 15 W. R. 21, L. R. 2 Q. B. 612. The Board of Trade can pay in some cases where they cannot impose the liability on the owners.

The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 190, provides that: "The Board of Trade may make regulations with respect to the relief, maintenance, and sending home of seamen and apprentices found in distress abroad, and may by those regulations in this Act referred to as the distressed seamen regulations . . . make such conditions as they think fit with regard to that relief, maintenance, and sending home, and a seamen shall not have any right to be relieved, maintained, or sent home except in the cases and to the extent and on the conditions provided by those regulations." Section 191 provides: "The following authorities . . . governors of British possessions, British consular officers of her Majesty in foreign countries shall . . . provide for the maintenance until a passage home can be procured of . . . seamen who by reason of having been discharged or left behind or shipwrecked from any British ship are in distress in any place abroad." Sub-section 4: "The authority shall be paid in respect of the expenses of the maintenance and conveyance of distressed seamen such sum as the Board of Trade may allow, and those sums shall, on the production of the bills of disbursements with the proper vouchers, be paid as hereinafter provided." Section 193: "(1) Where any expenses on account of any such distressed seaman or apprentice as follows—namely (a) . . . (b) . . . either for his maintenance, necessary clothing, conveyance home, or, in case of death, for his burial, or otherwise in accordance with this Act are incurred by or on behalf of the Crown, or are incurred by the government of a foreign country, and repaid to that government by or on behalf of the Crown, those expenses, together with the wages, if any, due to the seaman or apprentice, shall be a charge upon the ship, whether British or foreign, to which such distressed seaman or apprentice belonged, and shall be a debt to the Crown from the master of the ship or from the owner of the ship for the time being, and also, if the ship be a foreign ship, from the person, whether principal or agent, who engaged the seaman or apprentice for service in the ship. (2) The debt, in addition to any fines which may have been incurred, may be recovered by the Board of Trade on behalf of the Crown either by ordinary process of law or in the court and manner in which wages may be recovered by seamen. (3) In any proceeding for such recovery the production of the account (if any) of the expenses furnished in accordance with this Act or the distressed seamen regulations, and proof of payment of the expenses by or on behalf of the Board of Trade, shall be sufficient evidence that the expenses were incurred or repaid under this Act by or on behalf of the Crown."

The Merchant Shipping Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 44), s. 4: "Section 193 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (which relates to the recovery of expenses incurred on account of distressed seamen) shall extend to expenses incurred under that Act on account of any distressed seamen within the meaning of that Act, except where it is certified, in pursuance of section 188 of the Act, that the cause of a seaman being left behind is desertion or disappearance, and paragraphs (a) and (b) in sub-section one of the said section one hundred and ninety-three shall be repealed."

Cur. adv. vult.

May 13.—BIGHAM, J., read the following judgment: The first question which I have to determine in this case is whether those men who received wages in excess of the expenses incurred on their behalf were "distressed seamen" within the meaning of the Act of Parliament (the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, 57 & 58 Vict. c. 60). The defendants say that they were not, upon the ground that the Act was not intended to assist men who are in a position to assist themselves. It is necessary, therefore, to look at the terms of the Act. Part II. deals with the rights and duties of owners, masters, and crews of seagoing ships registered in the United Kingdom. One sub-division of this part is headed "Distressed Seamen," and it comprises sections 190 to 193 of the Act inclusive. By section 190 the Board of Trade is empowered to make regulations for the relief, maintenance, and sending home of seamen found in distress abroad; and the section enacts that no seaman shall have any right to be relieved, maintained, or sent home except in the cases provided by those regulations. In pursuance of the directions in this section the Board of Trade has made regulations, and by No. 86 it is declared that the persons to be relieved shall include seafaring persons who, having been engaged in merchant ships, are shipwrecked and found in distress in foreign ports. No relief, however, is to be afforded to shipwrecked seamen who refuse to work their passage home or who refuse to accept reasonable employment (regulation No. 90), nor are shipwrecked seamen who stand by the wreck to salve property to be considered as distressed seamen during the time they are so earning money (regulation No. 95). Thus the regulations mention who are and who are not to receive relief. Then section 191 of the Act directs how distressed seamen are to be relieved. The duty of affording relief is cast upon governors, consular officers, and others who are named in the section, and who are referred to in the Act as the authorities. This section directs such an authority to find a passage home for, and in the meantime to maintain, any seaman who, by reason of having been shipwrecked, are in distress in any place abroad, and enacts that the authority shall be paid, in respect of the expenses incurred, such sums as the Board of Trade may allow. Section 193, as amended by section 4 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 44), directs that the amount of such expenses shall be a debt to the Crown from the shipowner and shall be recoverable by the Board of Trade on behalf of the Crown by ordinary process of law. These are all the material provisions, and there is nothing in any of them which in terms excludes from the category of distressed seamen those who, being shipwrecked, happen at the date of the disaster to be entitled to arrears of wages. Nor do I find anything from which I can imply such an intention. In a sense, no doubt, a shipwrecked sailor who happens to have money in his pocket or a valuable ring on his finger or a right to arrears of wages is not in so bad a plight as his shipmate who has none of these advantages; but both of them are, in my opinion, "seamen who by reason of having been shipwrecked are in distress" within the meaning of section 191 and of regulation No. 86. If the Legislature had intended to exclude from the benefits of the Act men who had means of their own at their command I think it would have said so. In the connection now under consideration the definition of distress is not to be found in the man's slender purse, but in the fact that he has been cast from his ship in a foreign country. I therefore come to the conclusion that all the men mentioned in this case were "distressed seamen" within the meaning of the Act.

Another question was raised during the argument—namely, whether the production of the account of the expenses, together with proof of payment thereof by the Board of Trade, was not of itself conclusive against the defendants. Having regard to the view I take on the first point, it is not necessary for me to decide this question; but I think it better to do so, for I may thereby save difficulty in future cases. By sub-section 3 of section 193 of the principal Act it is provided that in any proceedings for the recovery of the debt the production of the account (if any) of the expenses furnished in accordance with this Act or the distressed seamen regulations, and proof of payment of the expenses by or on behalf of the Board of Trade shall be sufficient evidence that the expenses were incurred or repaid under this Act by or on behalf of the Crown. I think "sufficient evidence" here means conclusive evidence, and for these reasons: The authority who makes the payments in the first instance acts in the interest of the shipowner as well as in that of the seaman. This is shown by such regulations as the 91st, 96th, and 97th, which direct the authority to confine the relief to what is actually necessary. And by sub-section 4 of section 191 the Board of Trade has a right to revise the account and to disallow in favour of the shipowner such items as it may think fit. The authority abroad and the Board of Trade at home are both to protect the shipowner from any undue burden. With provisions such as these for his protection I do not think the Legislature meant to allow the shipowner to dispute either the propriety of the demand made upon him or its amount. The production of the account and proof of its payment are therefore, in my opinion, meant by sub-section 3 of section 193 to be conclusive of the right of the Board of Trade to recover.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitor for Board of Trade, R. E. Cunliffe.

Solicitors for defendants, Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for Hill & Dickinson, Liverpool.

---

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) — April 29.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO. v. HINCHCLIFFE. (a.)

Railway—Passenger—Fare—Travelling beyond station to which ticket is taken—Fare for whole distance more than sum of intermediate fares—Right of company to charge difference between fare paid and the through fare.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant, who intended to travel from Huddersfield to Manchester, took a ticket only to Stalybridge, an intermediate station. The fare from Huddersfield to Manchester was 2s. 3d., and to Stalybridge 1s. 6d., and the fare from Stalybridge to Manchester 7d. At Stalybridge the collector took defendant's ticket and demanded 9d., being the difference between the fare which the defendant had paid and the through fare from Huddersfield to Manchester. This the defendant refused to pay, but tendered 7d., the local fare between Stalybridge and Manchester. This was not accepted, but he was permitted to proceed by the same train to Manchester. By the regulations printed in the company's time-tables a passenger using a ticket for any other station than that for which it was issued was liable to pay the difference between the sum actually paid and the fare between the stations from and to which he travelled; and passengers could not re-book at an intermediate station by the same train. In an action by the company to recover 9d.,

Held, that the conditions were part of the contract, and that the defendant was bound to pay the difference between the sum he had paid and the through fare from Huddersfield to Manchester.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of his Honour Judge J. Heaton Cadman, sitting at the Huddersfield County Court.

The action was brought by the railway company for the purpose of having it determined whether or not persons travelling from Huddersfield to Manchester were entitled to take a ticket to an intermediate station and then, travelling on by the same train, pay the fare from the intermediate station to Manchester.

The facts were as follow:

The defendant, intending to travel from Huddersfield to Manchester, took a ticket to Stalybridge, an intermediate station, gave up his ticket there, and then offered the fare (7d.) from Stalybridge to Manchester. This was refused, and the defendant travelled on by the same train to Manchester. The fare from Huddersfield to Manchester was 2s. 3d.; from Huddersfield to Stalybridge 1s. 6d.; and from Stalybridge to Manchester 7d. Therefore, by taking two tickets, one from Huddersfield to Stalybridge (1s. 6d.), and one from Stalybridge to Manchester (7d.), the fare for the whole distance would be 2s. 1d., or 2d. less than the fare if one ticket had been taken from Huddersfield to Manchester. The company sued the defendant for 9d., and he thereupon paid 7d. (the local fare between Stalybridge and Manchester) into court.

The county court judge held that as the defendant continued his journey from Stalybridge to Manchester, the company were entitled to assume that he did so on the company's terms—namely, to pay 2s. 3d. for the entire journey, and, therefore, that they were justified in treating the payment of 1s. 6d. to Stalybridge as part payment only or payment on account of the through fare from Huddersfield to Manchester, and were entitled to payment from the defendant of the difference—namely, 9d. He accordingly gave judgment for the company for 2d. with leave to take the 7d. out of court, and granted leave to appeal.

Among the "General Regulations and Conditions" printed in the company's time-tables were the following: "Using ticket for any other station.—Any passenger using or attempting to use a ticket for any other station than that for which it is available will be required to pay the difference between the sum actually paid and the fare between the stations from and to which the passenger has travelled, or, at the option of the company, the fare from the station to which he has booked to the end of his journey." "Tickets must be shown to the company's servants, and delivered up to them when demanded. . . . Parties cannot re-book at an intermediate station by the same train. . . ."

Lowenthal, for the defendant.—The only contract that existed between the parties to which any of the printed regulations and conditions applied, and subject to which the ticket was issued, was that to carry the defendant to Stalybridge. When he arrived there the contract was at an end, and after that time the company could have treated him as a trespasser and have had him removed from the train (Butler v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., 36 W. R. 726), but they did not do that, and must therefore be taken to have waived the tort. By permitting him to travel on by the same train there arose an implied contract by the company to carry him to Manchester, on which contract the company could sue him on a quantum meruit for the legal fare between Stalybridge and Manchester. That being so, the company were only entitled to recover the amount of the fare between the two last-named stations.

He cited Great Western Railway Co. v. Pocock, 28 W. R. 49, 41 L. T. Rep. 415, and London and Brighton Railway Co. v. Watson, 27 W. R. 614, 4 C. P. D. 118, and submitted that the present case was distinguishable from Great Northern Railway Co. v. Palmer, 43 W. R. 316, [1895] 1 Q. B. 862.

Gregson v. Potter, 27 W. R. 840, 4 Ex. D. 142, was also referred to, and sections 109 and 145 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845.

Montague Shearman, K.C. (E. G. Hills with him), for the company.—The defendant had entered the train with the intention of travelling the whole distance, and was therefore bound to pay the full amount of a through ticket. The company relied on conditions as to using a ticket for a different station than that to which it was issued, and if the defendant merely accepted the company's offer to carry him to Stalybridge, and the contract, as the defendant would have it, came to an end there, then the defendant was in this dilemma, that he had accepted the offer subject to the condition of the company that if he used his ticket for any other station he must pay the full fare from Huddersfield to that station. In either view of the contract, therefore, the company were entitled to charge him 9d. for travelling on from Stalybridge to Manchester.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case, whatever may be the result of other proceedings, I think the judgment of the county court judge was right. The company were really suing on a quantum meruit. They might have sued the defendant for trespass, but they waived the tort, which possibly they were entitled to do, and decided not to turn him out of the carriage because he had not a ticket. Therefore, having elected to carry him, the question is whether or not the quantum meruit on that contract under those circumstances is limited to the 7d. which is the local fare from Stalybridge to Manchester. It seems to me the local fare from Stalybridge to Manchester is only applicable to the matter of a common law contract with a person who has booked from Stalybridge to Manchester, and apart from any rights the passenger has under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act. It cannot be said the person who has come in a train intending for this purpose to travel from Huddersfield to Manchester, and who has remained in the train and has never re-booked, and has therefore availed himself of a contract which the company held out to carry passengers by that train at the fare of 2s. 3d. from Huddersfield to Manchester, is entitled to say, "I

